The plea, indeed, is supported by the affi- [317] davit of one of the defendants that it is true in point of fact. But the oath of the party to its truth in point of fact is added only for the same purpose as the certificate of counsel that in their opinion it is well founded in matter of law, in order to comply with the 31st Rule in Equity, the object of which is to prevent a defendant from delaying or evading the discovery sought, without showing that the plea is worthy of the consideration of the court. Ewing v. Bright, 3 Wall. Jr. 134; Wall v. Stubbs, 2 Ves. & B. 354. An answer under oath is evidence in favor of the defendant, because made in obedience to the demand of the bill for a discovery, and therefore only so far as it is responsive to the bill. Seitz v. Mitchell, 94 U. S. 580 [24: 179]. But a plea which avoids the discovery prayed for is no evidence in the defendant's favor, even when it is under oath and negatives a material averment in the bill. Hearth v. Corning, 3 Paige, 566.

The allegations of the bill that the plaintiff, at all times, to the best of his knowledge and ability, gave full and true answers to all inquiries made by Kennedy or any of the trustees or bondholders, or any person interested in the property under his charge as receiver and as manager, and in all things acted honestly and in good faith towards all persons interested in it, were not denied by the plea, and therefore, for the purposes of the hearing thereon, were conclusively admitted to be true. So much of the plaintiff's testimony as tended to show that he intentionally concealed his interest from the stockholders and from the court, was outside of the averments of the plea, and therefore irrelevant to the issue to be tried.

The plaintiff having neither moved to set aside the plea as irregular for want of an answer supporting it, nor set down the case for hearing upon the bill and plea only, but having replied to the plea, and the only issue of fact thus joined having been determined by the evidence in his favor, it is unnecessary to consider whether the averments of fact in the second part of the plea ought to have been supported by an answer, or whether, if proved, they would have made out a defense to the bill.

The averments in the third part of the plea that, by reason of the plaintiff's position as re- [318] ceiver and general manager of the railroads, his entering into the agreement sued on and engaging in the enterprise of purchasing the bonds and thereby acquiring the railroads were unlawful, and did not entitle him to the aid of a court of equity to enforce the agreement or any rights growing out of it, were averments of pure matter of law, arising upon the plaintiff's case as stated in the bill, and affecting the equity of the bill, and therefore a proper subject of demurrer, and not to be availed of by plea.

The result is that the principal question considered by the court below and argued at the bar is not presented in a form to be decided upon the record before us; and that, for the reasons above stated, and as suggested in behalf of the plaintiff at the reargument, the plea was erroneously sustained, and must be overruled, and the defendants ordered, in accordance with the 34th Rule in Equity, to answer the bill.

Decree reversed and case remanded, with directions to overrule the plea, and to order the defendants to answer the bill.

LOUISVILLE, EVANSVILLE AND ST. LOUIS RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

S. P. MEYER ET AL., Partners, as MEYER, HAY & COMPANY.

Fraudulent estimates of engineer—jurisdiction at law—contract—"water excavation"—questions for jury.

1. Where the plaintiffs contracted to do certain work on sections of a railroad line, estimates to be made by the engineer of the Railroad Company, of its quantity, character and value, which should be conclusive, without recourse or appeal, and the plaintiffs sued at law, alleging that in pursuance of a fraudulent combination between the defendant Railroad Company and its chief and resident engineers to injure and defraud plaintiffs, the resident engineer made a false, untrue and fraudulent estimate by classifying excavation in water as "rock excavation," and the defendant did not plead to the jurisdiction, or demur for that reason, but denied the fraud or collusion, and admitted the estimates as inaccurate, and set up other estimates made by its present engineer, who was not such engineer when the work was accepted, and on the trial, when evidence was offered that estimates were inaccurate and fraudulently made, objected that the issue could not be tried at law, but claimed that the estimates were final until set aside in equity, the circuit court overruled the objection, holding, that waiving the delay in making the objection and the fact that defendant admitted the estimates were inaccurate, yet if for any cause, not the fault of the plaintiffs, the contemplated estimate, as a condition precedent, becomes impossible, an action could be maintained.

2. The court also overruled the objection of defendants to the introduction of the testimony of experts to prove that certain work was excavation in water, under the definition thereof in the contract; and the court refused to instruct the jury that "water excavation" was not the making of a cut for the road bed of defendant, but the deepening of the channel of a running stream for the purpose of continuing such channel to carry off water.

3. The court also refused to put certain questions to the jury, as to whether the estimates were the result of fraudulent combination, and whether the excavation was done in deepening channels in running water.

4. The judges of the supreme court being equally divided in opinion, the judgment of the circuit court stands affirmed.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky.

This case has not been reported below, and the facts are stated in the opinion, delivered in the circuit court on motion for a new trial, which is as follows:

Barr, J.:

The plaintiffs are contractors, and agreed with defendant to do certain work on sections 5, 6 and 7 of its road. The parties made a written contract, in which the prices for the work was specified by classifications. The contract, after providing that during the progress of the work, and until its completion, monthly estimates should be made by the engineer of the defendant of the quantity, character and value of the work, and that 80 per cent of this estimate should be paid as the work progressed, and that the work when completed shall be estimated by the engineer according to the terms of the agreement, provided as follows: And it is expressly agreed between the parties to this contract that the monthly and final estimates of the engineer shall be conclusive, the former for the time being and the latter for all time, without recourse or appeal. The plaintiff sued at law in Jefferson Court Common Pleas, and this suit was, upon the petition of defendant, transferred to this court. The plaintiffs alleged that they had done their work according to contract, and that the same has been accepted by the defendant. They alleged that the resident engineer, Mr. Bradford, has made an estimate of the work done by them on section 5, which is correct as to quantity and classification, and that he has also made estimates of their work on sections 6 and 7, which are correct as to quantity, but false as to classification.

These, they alleged, are the final estimates and "that the resident engineer, under the influence and direction of the chief engineer of defendant, and pursuant to a fraudulent combination between defendants and the engineers aforesaid to injure and defraud plaintiffs, made in the estimate of said section 6 a false, untrue, and fraudulent entry and estimate of 855 cubic yards of shaft excavation done by plaintiffs on said sections as aforesaid by classifying same as solid rock excavation; whereas, in truth and fact, it should have been reported as shaft excavation and estimated accordingly; and made in the estimate of said section 7 a false, untrue, and fraudulent entry and estimate of 9,525 cubic yards of excavation of water done by plaintiffs by classifying same as solid rock excavation, and including same in the item of that denomination in his said estimates; whereas, in truth and in fact, it should have been reported as excavation in water and estimated accordingly; and they say each and both of said false, untrue and fraudulent estimates were had, made, and obtained by the fraud of defendants." The defendant answered and traversed this allegation of fraud and collusion, but admitted the estimates were inaccurate, and filed and set up estimates made by Mr. Rice, who was at that time defendant's chief engineer, though he was not at the time the work was done or accepted.

The plaintiffs claimed a large balance due them after crediting defendant for the amounts paid, and the defendant claimed according to the revised estimates. There was a small overpayment for which it asked judgment. If the estimates filed by plaintiffs were assumed to be final and correct, there was still due plaintiffs $1,999.48; but if Mr. Rice's estimates are final and correct, the balance would be in favor of defendant. The defendant did not plead to the jurisdiction or raise the question by demurrer; but when plaintiffs offered evidence tending to prove the estimates were incorrect, and fraudulently made, the defendant objected, because, as they claimed, that issue could not be tried at law.

This objection was overruled, and after the evidence was all in the jury were asked to find whether or not the estimates made of the work done by plaintiffs on sections 6 and 7 by the resident engineer were fraudulent, and if fraudulent, how many cubic yards, if any, of the excavation done by plaintiffs under their contract on section 6 was shaft excavation as defined in the contract, and how many cubic yards of the excavation done by them on section 7 was excavation in water as defined in said contract.

The jury found these estimates were fraudulent ones, and that 855 cubic yards of the excavation done by plaintiffs on section 6 was shaft excavation, and 3,016 cubic yards of excavation on section 7 was excavation in water.

The defendant has moved for a new trial, and filed several grounds for this motion; I will only consider those which were argued by counsel.

It is insisted that even on plaintiffs' own showing the estimates made by the resident engineer are final unless they are fraudulent, and that no recovery can be had unless they are set aside for fraud, and that cannot be done in an action at law. Waiving the consideration of the time when this objection to the jurisdiction of the common-law court was first made, and the fact that defendant does not in its pleadings claim that these estimates of the resident engineer are binding and conclusive on the plaintiffs, let us examine the question of jurisdiction.

The authorities have left the question in doubt.

In the absence of a statute an award cannot be impeached for fraud in the arbitrators, except in a court of equity. The reason for this is much weaker now than when the rule was established, but we assume it is still the law. The question in this case is whether the final estimates of the engineer are awards or are in the nature of awards, and are like judgments conclusive upon the parties until set aside in equity. The weight of the English cases is to the effect that a covenant to settle all controversies, which may thereafter arise under a contract, is against public policy, because it is an effort to oust the courts of the jurisdiction. 1 Wils. 129; 8 Term. Rep. 139. See also Randel, Jr. v. Chesapeake & Del. Canal Co. 1 Harr. 233; Haggart v. Morgan, 4 Sand. Sup. Ct. 198. The majority of the judges recognized this as settled law, in Scott v. Avery, 5 H. L. 811, and drew a distinction, which the Chancellor, Lord Cranworth, stated thus: If I covenant with A not to do particular acts, and it is agreed between us that any question which might arise should be decided by an arbitrator, without bringing an action, then a plea to that effect would be no bar to an action; but if we agreed that J. S. was to award the amount of damages to be recoverable at law, then if such arbitration did not take place no action could be brought.

Bramwell, B., in a subsequent case, 2 L. R. Exch. 345, states this distinction—he was one of the counsel, and says: "We scarcely cited a case, but laid down a proposition which was almost immediately adopted by the judges below and by the House of Lords. That proposition was that if two persons, whether in the same or a different deed from that which creates the liability, agree to refer the matter upon which the liability arises to arbitration, that agreement does not take away the right of action. But if the original agreement is not simply to pay a sum of money, but that a sum of money shall be paid, if something else happens, and that something else is that a third person shall settle the amounts, then no cause of action arises until the third person has so assessed the same."

In the agreement sued on the prices of the work are fixed, and only the quantity and classification is left to the decision of the engineer. It is therefore within the distinction taken. It is not an award, although so far as the engineer exercises his judgment in classifying the work, it is in the nature of an award. These estimates are properly conditions precedent to a recovery, and bind the parties to the contract, if honestly and impartially made.

The engineer is not a disinterested third party, but an employee selected and paid by the Railroad Company. If the Company have no engineer to make such an estimate, or if from any other cause, not the fault of plaintiffs, this condition precedent becomes impossible, an action could be maintained, although the condition precedent has not been performed.

The contract requires that the Railroad Company should employ and keep an engineer who can make these estimates, and I think also requires that these estimates shall be honestly made, and at least not fraudulently made by the collusion of the Company. This perhaps is not distinctly said in any common case, but the Chief Justice in Clarke v. Watson, 114 Eng. Com. Law, 282, said, in an action where the breach alleged was that the surveyor's certificate was wrongfully withheld by the collusion of the defendant: "If it had been alleged that the defendants fraudulently colluded with the surveyor to cause the certificate to be withheld, they could not have sheltered themselves by their own wrongful act."

In Batterbury v. Vyse, 2 Hurlst. & C. Exch. 44, the court overruled a demurrer to a declaration filed by a contractor against the owner of a building. The contract provided that no payment was due unless upon the production of the architect's certificate; and the declaration alleged performance, but that the architect unfairly and improperly neglected to certify, and so neglected in collusion with the defendant, and by his procurement, whereby plaintiff was unable to obtain payment.

See also Livingston v. Ralli, 5 El. & Bl. 132.

Considering these estimates as condition precedent to a recovery, if the performance is fraudulently permitted by the defendant, then a recovery should be had for the work done at the contract prices, and not merely damages. If these estimates were in fact fraudulent, plaintiffs should be in the same condition they would have been had they demanded estimates to be made, and they had been refused by defendant. A fraudulent estimate made by defendant's engineer should be without binding force upon the plaintiffs. Yet the fact that such a fraudulent estimate has been made should be sufficient, without requiring a new demand and new estimates to be made, before bringing an action.

If this suit had been brought in equity and the estimates been found fraudulent, that court would not simply have set aside the fraudulent estimate and required the plaintiffs to have had new estimates made by the defendant's engineer, and another suit, but it would have disregarded the fraudulent estimates, and had accounts taken between the parties, and a decree entered according to the rights of the parties under the contract. Ambrose v. Dunmow Union, 9 Beav. 506. This I understand to be admitted by one of the learned counsel, and is clearly sustained by the authorities.

This relief in equity must be upon the theory that the estimates having been made by the defendant's engineer fraudulently, none other will be required of him, and the court will go on and enforce the contract just as if no estimates had been required to be made before suit could be brought. If this can be done in equity, no good reason is perceived why it cannot be done at law. There is another test as to the jurisdiction of a court of law or equity, and that is whether there is a plain, adequate and complete remedy at law. This is the test which the Act of Congress makes. R. S. § 723. In this case there were two issues which were clearly legal ones, and which could not have been tried, equity excluding the issues upon the estimates alleged to be fraudulent. But if these had not been in the case, this court would have had jurisdiction, if I am right in thinking that these estimates, if fraudulent, put the plaintiffs in the same legal position as if they had properly demanded of the defendant the estimates of the work to be done, and that had been refused.

The result of this trial shows that the remedy at law is plain, adequate and complete. That is, if the findings of the jury are correct the remedy following is plain and adequate.

It is true that there are many cases in which the estimates of engineers have been set aside for fraud, mistake or partiality, by courts of equity, but it is equally true that in many of these cases the jurisdiction of the court has been earnestly controverted. The only American case which announces that courts of equity have exclusive jurisdiction in cases like the one at bar is Herrick v. Belknap and Vt. C.R.R.Co. 27 Vt. 678, and in that case the jurisdiction of the court of equity was earnestly contested, and that was the question. The jurisdiction at common law in cases like this have been sustained in Wilson v. York and Maryland R. R. Co. 11 Gill & J. 71. See also Canal Trustees v. Lynch, 5 Gilm. 526; Snell v. Brown, 71 Ill. 135; Crawford v. Wolf, 29 Iowa, 575. I am therefore still of the opinion that this court had jurisdiction of the question of fraud or no fraud in the making of these estimates. The resident and chief engineer in this contract meant, I think, the engineers in the employ of the Company when the work was done, or at least the engineer in its employment when the work was accepted and received; and I do not think I erred in rejecting Mr. Rice's estimates, who did not become chief engineer until some time after the work was accepted and received, and who did not make the estimates until after the suit was filed.

The finding of the jury on the question of fraud in the estimates of the work done by plaintiffs on section 7 was perhaps different from that which I would have favored had I been trying the issue, but the issue was clearly made and presented to the jury, and there was evidence before it which tended to sustain the finding. The jury are properly the judges of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence, and, in the exercise of that judgment upon conflicting evidence, they should not be revised by the court.

This, however, is not true, as to the finding of the jury on the question of fraud in the estimates on section 6.

There was no evidence given which sustains this finding of the jury. The utmost the plaintiffs proved upon this point was that, in the opinion of the resident engineer, Mr. Bradford, the 855 cubic yards of excavation done on this section should have been classified as shaft excavation. The contract provided that the chief engineer's judgment should control when there was a difference of opinion between him and the resident engineer. Mr. Morris', the chief engineer's, statement upon this subject is perfectly clear and satisfactory, and is rather confirmed than contradicted by Mr. Bradford. He says that the shafts had been made many years before, but that the cribbing at the top of the shaft had become in such a condition that the contractors were afraid to work in the tunnel below, and that at their request he had the débris cleaned out, and the top opening of the shaft enlarged for the purpose of building a house or new cribbing over it. This was done as extra work, and an account of the time and expense of the work was kept. The contract provided that extra work which was not in the specification was to be done by the contractors, and they were to be paid therefor the costs thereof, with 10 per cent added. He says that when the estimates were made out, enough of the excavation was reported solid rock excavation as would make an amount equal to the cost, with 10 per cent added. This was done to avoid the trouble of making out an extra bill of this work. No one contradicts this statement, although, if untrue, it could readily have been shown to be untrue. Mr. Bradford, plaintiffs' only witness upon this subject, sustains Mr. Morris by stating that he kept the time of the men while they were engaged in this work.

The finding of the jury should be set aside as to section No. 6, and a new trial granted, unless plaintiffs will abandon of record that part of their claim. If they abandon this part of their claim, the motion for a new trial will be overruled, and judgment go upon the other special findings of the jury.

Messrs. Alexander Pope Humphrey and E. F. Trabue, for plaintiff in error:

The contract provides that the contractors are to be paid according to the estimates of the engineer, and such estimates are declared final and conclusive on both parties without further recourse or appeal. In the petition were found estimates made by the engineer; but the contractors proposed to set aside these estimates and to have other amounts fixed as the measure of their recovery. They claim that the estimates are fraudulent and must therefore be annulled, and the true amounts fixed by the jury. We contend that the very nature of the relief claimed places it beyond the power of a court of law. Such contracts are not opposed to the rule that unexecuted agreements for arbitration will not be enforced.

Scott v. Avery, 5 H. L. 811; Elliott v. Royal Exchange Assur. Co. L. R. 2 Exch. 245.

This decision by the engineer, of what character and quality of work has been performed, is not a mere condition precedent to a right of action, for here the determination is essential to the cause of action. Until the determination is made there is no sum to which the employer's promise can apply.

M'Intosh v. Great Western R. Co. 13 Jur. 92, reported on appeal. 2 McN. & G. 74.

It being necessary to annul this judgment, we inquire, how can this be accomplished? Legal remedies are very few. A law judgment may be rendered for a specific sum or specific property. A court of law cannot annul any instrument. It may hear proof as to jurisdiction of subject matter or person in a suit on a judgment, or of illegality in promise, or consideration in an action on a covenant, or a fraud in the factum of any obligation. Such evidence is to show that the instrument never had validity. A court of equity alone is capable of applying the remedy of cancellation as a relief against fraud.

Bigelow, Frauds.

The agreement was that the engineer was to fix the amount, and that such determination should be "conclusive" without further "recourse or appeal."

Bigelow, Frauds, 172; 2 Story, Eq. 1452-3; Barlow v. Todd, 3 Johns. 367; Fletcher v. Hubbard, 43 N. H. 58.

We contend for the substance of the contract, and insist that the parties selected the engineer as the judge between them, and agreed that his decision in the very matter he has decided should be conclusive.

M'Intosh v. Great Western R. Co. supra; Monongahela Nav. Co. v. Fenlon, 4 Watts & S. 211; Stevenson v. Watson, L. R. 4 Com. Pleas Div. 162; Waring v. Manchester S. & L. R. Co. 14 Jur. 614; Baron de Worms v. Mellier, L. R. 16 Eq. 557; Pawley v. Turnbull, 3 Giff. 70, 7 Jur. N. S. 792; Kemp v. Rose, 1 Giff. 258, 4 Jur. N. S. 924; Mansfield & S. C. R. R. Co. v. Veeder, 17 Ohio, 385; Kihlbury v. U. S. 97 U. S. 401 (24:1107).

These cases show that the engineer is likened to the arbitrator, is required to exercise good faith and an honest judgment, and his decision is upheld as final unless impeached for fraud. There is no reason why an award must stand until set aside by a direct attack in equity, and such a judgment as the contract here provides be incidentally disproved and annulled.

Herrick v. Belknap's Estate, 27 Vt. 679.

Among the cases cited to sustain the opposite view are Clarke v. Watson, 114 Com. Law, 278, but this was a case where the architect was not to determine the amount due, but simply whether the work had been done.

In Batterbury v. Vyse, 2 Hurls. & C. 443, the declaration was one in case, and there was no decision or award to be vacated, but simply a failure to make any award at all. We say therefore from the English books that no action at law can be maintained on such a contract as this, unless the parties are willing to take the certificate of the engineer as final; that without the certificate of the engineer, even fraudulently withheld, no action at law can be maintained, because the contract is to pay only such an amount as may be certified by the engineer.

That the relief is to be found in equity is shown not only from the cases we have cited, but from the many others found in the argument and opinion in Scott v. Corporation of Liverpool, 3 DeGex & J. 334. The American authorities cited by the learned district judge are not more conclusive against us.

In Wilson v. York & Md. S. R. R. Co. 11 Gill & J. 78, assumpsit was maintained, but the question of jurisdiction was not raised.

In Canal Trustees v. Lynch, 5 Gilm., the petition was dismissed and no question of jurisdiction was made.

In Snell v. Brown, 71 Ill. 135, no question of jurisdiction was raised and the judgment for the plaintiff was reversed.

In Crawford v. Wolf, 29 Iowa, 575, the defendant refused to recognize the contract.

The remedy here sought is of a twofold nature, pertaining in each respect to the exclusive jurisdiction of equity. The contractors seek concellation and specific performance. A court of equity could at once cancel a fraudulent award and by its master have a new one made, the latter being a substituted specific performance of the contract carried out under the direction of the court.

1 Story, Eq. § 692; 1 Pom. Eq. § 140, note.

Messrs. William Stone Abert, E. E. McKay and F. P. Straus, for defendants in error:

The action can be supported as an action of assumpsit upon a quantum meruit, the allegations of excuse for nonperformance being equivalent to performance of the contract.

U. S. v. Peck, 102 U. S. 64 (26:46); Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. (Va.) 447, 462; Lynn v. Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. 60 Md. 411.

The petition is sufficient as to form.—In an action ex delicto, for damages for a breach of the contract by the defendant in putting an end to the contract and preventing the plaintiffs from obtaining an honest certificate from the engineer, the value of the work is the measure of damage.

Batterbury v. Vyse, 2 Hurls. & C. 43.

The petition would have been adjudged sufficient on demurrer, and any pretended defect is cured by the verdict.

Lincoln v. Cambria Iron Co. 103 U. S. 412 (26:518).

As the defendant permitted plaintiffs to finish the work, it was evidence of a promise to pay for it; and in such a case if the original contract was under seal the action of indebitatus assumpsit is maintainable on the defendant's implied obligation; but the defendant may be allowed a recoupment for the damages he may have sustained from the negligence of the plaintiff.

Dermott v. Jones, 64 U. S. 23 How. 234 (16: 448); Jewell v. Schroeppell, 4 Cow. 564; Phillips etc. Construction Co. v. Seymour, 91 U. S. 650 (23:343); Fresh v. Gilson, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 334 (10:984).

If the contract be laid as an inducement only, it seems that case, for an act, in its nature a tort or injury, afterwards committed in breach of the contract, may often be adopted.

1 Chitty, Pl. p. *152, 16 Am. ed.

And although the plaintiff declares as for a tort, still, so far as a tort rests on contract, the same rules are to govern as would if the contract itself had been declared on.

1 Chitty, Pl. 152; R. R. Co. v. Brauss, 70 Ga. 368; Smith v. Eubanks, 72 Ga. 286.

The Kentucky Code while abolishing the forms leaves the principles which govern actions unchanged. The Code changes the question simply into whether the petition shows a right of action in any form. If a right to recover at law before the adoption of the Code is shown, the court cannot refuse a recovery upon the same principles now.

Hill v. Barrett, 14 B. Mon. 85.

In the late English case decided in 1872 (Mast v. Goodson, 8 Wils. Rep. 348), the action was for wrongfully obstructing and hindering the plaintiff from landing goods upon a wharf contrary to a written agreement between him and the plaintiff; and it was held that the declaration was founded upon tort and not upon contract.

In Hulle v. Heighman, 2 East, 145, the plaintiff could not recover upon the contract because he had not completed the voyage; he should have declared specially for the injury preventing him from completing the voyage.

Chitty, Cont. *581, 5th Am. ed.; U. S. v. Behan, 110 U. S. 346 (28:171); 2 Hilliard, Torts, 292.

The doctrine that fraud in the engineer in making such estimates will vitiate them, and allow the contractor to recover against the defendant upon other proof of the quality and value of the work and services is established by the following authorities:

Lynn v. Balt. & O. R. R. Co. and Balt. & O. R. R. Co. v. Polly, supra; Balt. & O. R. R. Co. v. Lafferiye, 14 Gratt. 485.

In actions at law the courts of the United States may proceed according to the forms of practice in the state courts.

Thompson v. R. R. Co. 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 188 (18: 767); Rev. Stat. U. S. § 914.

The absence of a plain and adequate remedy at law is the only test of equity jurisdiction; and a resort to chancery was not necessary to recover against the defendant for work and labor it had accepted.

Thompson v. R. R. Co. supra.

Section 8 of the Kentucky Code of Practice provides that an error of the plaintiff as to the form of action shall not be cause for abatement or dismissal, but merely for an amendment of the pleadings and transfer to the proper docket. Section 10 authorizes this change to be made on motion of the defendant. Section 15 provides that an error as to the kind of proceedings adopted in the action is waived by failure to move for its correction in the manner prescribed.

The assignment of errors has specified the objections of the defendant; and omitting the question of jurisdiction, it must be considered that all others not specified were waived, or that there was no ground upon which others could stand.

Evanston v. Gunn, 99 U. S. 665 (25: 307).

In the cases, recently decided by this court, of Martinsburg & P. R. R. Co. v. March, 114 U. S. 549 (29: 255); Sweeney v. U. S. 109 U. S. 618 (27: 1058), both actions were brought upon the contract, and there was no allegation in either case "of fraud or such gross mistake as would necessarily imply bad faith or failure to exercise an honest judgment" on the part of the engineer. Quantum meruit can be sustained where defendant prevented performance.

Jones v. U. S. 96 U. S. 27 (24: 646); Humaston v. Telegraph Co. 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 27 (22: 280); U. S. v. Peck, supra; Chicago v. Tilley, 103 U. S. 146 (26: 371).

The jurisdiction exists at law as well as in equity.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 489-502.)

Constitutional law—regulation of interstate commerce—power of Congress—interstate commerce cannot be taxed—state tax on "drummers," invalid.

1. The power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce is exclusive when its subjects are national in character, or admit only of one uniform system or plan of regulation.

2. Where its power is exclusive, the failure of Congress to make express regulations indicates its will that the subject shall be left free from any restrictions or impositions.

3. A State cannot levy a tax, or impose any other restriction upon the citizens or inhabitants of other States for selling or seeking to sell their goods in such State before they are introduced therein.

4. The negotiation of sales of goods which are in another State, for the purpose of introducing them into the State in which the negotiation is made, is interstate commerce. Such commerce is not subject to state taxation, even though there be no discrimination between it and domestic commerce.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Tennessee. Reported below, 13 Lea, 303. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court and in the dissenting opinon by the Chief Justice. See also the following case of Corson v. Maryland.

Messrs. Luke E. Wright and F. T. Edmonson, for plaintiff in error:

The Act in question is in violation of that part of article 1, section 8, of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several States."

Congress is vested with the exclusive power to regulate commerce with foreign Nations and among the States.

County of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691 (26: 238); Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. 7 How. 283 (12: 702); Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. 196 (29: 158).

Congress has not only the right but it is the duty of Congress to take care that commerce is not obstructed by state legislation.

Pensacola Tel. Co. v. W. U. Tel. Co. 96 U. S. 1 (24: 708).

It is settled that a tax directly on commerce or aimed at commerce is unconstitutional.

State Freight Tax Case, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 232 (21: 146); State Tax on R. Gross Receipts, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 284 (21: 164).

The effect of the Act complained of is to draw a distinction between resident and nonresident merchants. Its object is not revenue, but exclusion. It allows the merchants of the Taxing District to do business on terms more favorable than nonresident merchants, and forbids the latter from coming into equal and fair competition with the former.

The right to tax carries with it the right to exclude, so that, if this stands, the Legislature can declare that no person shall, on any terms, offer to sell goods in said District, unless he first establish a commercial house therein.

Mr. S. P. Walker, for defendant in error:

The statute makes no reference whatever to the place of residence of the "drummer." He is equally subject to the tax whether he be a resident of the taxing district, or a resident of some other portion of the State, or of some other State. In any and all cases the privilege tax is alike imposed. Given the vocation of "drummer," and the statute applies, without any distinction or discrimination whatever. There is clearly, therefore, no violation of section 2, article 4, upon which the decision in Ward v. Maryland, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 418 (20: 449), was rested. The statute is not directed against the "drummer's" principal, but against the "drummer" himself, as pursuing a particular vocation declared to be a taxable privilege. But if the statute be looked upon as an effort to tax the principal through the agent (for which view, we submit there is no foundation), it would still be free from objections urged against it, for that it equally applies to all "drummers," without reference to principal's place of residence. "The general power of the State to impose taxes, in the way of licenses, upon all pursuits and occupations within its limits," is unquestionable.

Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 278 (23:348).

The language of this court, in Osborne v. Mobile, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 479, 481 (21: 470, 473), is equally pertinent here: "There was no discrimination in the taxation of Alabama between it (the plaintiff in error) and the corporations and citizens of that State. The tax for license was the same by whomsoever the business was transacted. There is nothing in the case, therefore, which brings it within the case of Ward v. Maryland. It seems rather to be governed by the principles settled in Woodruff v. Parham, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 123 (19: 382)."

As is fully shown in the opinion of the state court, the classification of the statute is based on the character of the pursuit, and not on the fact of residence; and it is not subject to the objections that were sustained in Ward v. Maryland, supra.

This case originated in the following manner: Sabine Robbins, the plaintiff in error, in February, 1884, was engaged at the City of Memphis, in the State of Tennessee, in soliciting the sale of goods for the firm of Rose, Robbins & Co., of Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio, dealers in paper, and other articles of stationery, and exhibited samples for the purpose of effecting such sales,—an employment usually denominated as that of a "drummer." There was in force at that time a Statute of Tennessee, relating to the subject of taxation in the taxing districts of the State, applicable, however, only to the Taxing District of Shelby County (formerly the City of Memphis), by which it was enacted, amongst other things, that "All drummers, and all persons not having a regular licensed house of business in the Taxing District, offering for sale or selling goods, wares, or merchandise therein, by [491] sample, shall be required to pay to the county trustee the sum of ten dollars ($10) per week, or twenty-five dollars per month, for such privilege; and no license shall be issued for a longer period than three months." Act of 1881, chap. 96, § 16.

The business of selling by sample and nearly sixty other occupations had been by law declared to be privileges, and were taxed as such, and it was made a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $50, to exercise any of such occupations without having first paid the tax or obtained the license required therefor.

Under this law Robbins, who had not paid the tax nor taken a license, was prosecuted, convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of $10, together with the state and county tax, and costs; and on appeal to the Supreme Court of the State, the judgment was affirmed. This writ of error is brought to review the judgment of the supreme court, on the ground that the law imposing the tax was repugnant to that clause of the Constitution of the United States which declares that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several States.

On the trial of the cause in the inferior court, a jury being waived, the following agreed statement of facts was submitted to the court, to wit:

"Sabine Robbins is a citizen and resident of Cincinnati, Ohio, and on the — day of ——, 1884, was engaged in the business of drumming in the Taxing District of Shelby County, Tenn.—i. e. soliciting trade by the use of samples for the house or firm for which he worked as a drummer, said firm being the firm of 'Rose, Robbins & Co.,' doing business in Cincinnati, and all the members of said firm being citizens and residents of Cincinnati, Ohio. While engaged in the act of drumming for said firm, and for the claimed offense of not having taken out the required license for doing said business, the defendant, Sabine Robbins, was arrested by one of the Memphis or Taxing District police force and carried before the Hon. D. P. Hadden, president of the Taxing District, and fined for the offense of drumming without a license. It is admitted the firm of 'Rose, Robbins & Co.' [492] are engaged in the selling of paper, writing materials, and such articles as are used in the book stores of the Taxing District of Shelby County, and that it was a line of such articles for the sale of which the said defendant herein was drumming at the time of his arrest."

This was all the evidence, and thereupon the court rendered judgment against the defendant, to which he excepted, and a bill of exceptions was taken.

The principal question argued before the Supreme Court of Tennessee was as to the constitutionality of the Act which imposed the tax on drummers; and the court decided that it was constitutional and valid. [13 Lea, 303.]

That is the question before us, and it is one of great importance to the people of the United States, both as it respects their business interests and their constitutional rights. It is presented in a nutshell, and does not, at this day, require for its solution any great elaboration of argument or review of authorities. Certain principles have been already established by the decisions of this court which will conduct us to a satisfactory decision. Among those principles are the following:

1. The Constitution of the United States having given to Congress the power to regulate commerce, not only with foreign Nations, but among the several States, that power is necessarily exclusive whenever the subjects of it are national in their character, or admit only of one uniform system, or plan of regulation. This was decided in the case of Cooley v. Board of Wardens of Phila. 53 U. S. 12 How. 299, 319 [13: 996, 1004], and was virtually involved in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1 [6: 23], and has been confirmed in many subsequent cases, amongst others, in Brown v. Md. 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419 [6: 678]; Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. 7 How. 283 [12: 702]; Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 35, 42 [18: 745, 746]; Ward v. Md. 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 418, 430 [20: 449, 452]; State Freight Tax Cases, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 232, 279 [21: 146, 162]; Henderson v. Mayor of N. Y. 92 U. S. 259, 272 [23: 543, 549]; R. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 469 [24: 527, 529]; Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 697 [26: 238, 239]; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. 196, 203 [29: 158, 161]; Wabash, etc. R. Co. v. Ill. 118 U. S. 557 [ante, 244].

2. Another established doctrine of this court is that, where the power of Congress to regulate is exclusive, the failure of Congress to make express regulations indicates its will that the subject shall be left free from any restrictions or impositions; and any regulation of the subject by the States, except in matters of local concern only, as hereafter mentioned, is repugnant to such freedom. This was held by Mr. Justice Johnson in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 222 [6: 23, 76]; by Mr. Justice Grier, in the Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. 7 How. 283, 462 [12: 702, 777]; and has been affirmed in subsequent cases. State Freight Tax Cases, and R. R. Co. v. Husen, [supra]; Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 282 [23: 347, 350]; County of Mobile v. Kimball [supra]; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 631 [29: 257, 260]; Walling v. Mich. 116 U. S. 446, 455 [29: 691, 694]; Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34 [29: 785]; Wabash, etc. R. Co. v. Ill. [supra].

3. It is also an established principle, as already indicated, that the only way in which commerce between the States can be legitimately affected by state laws is when, by virtue of its police power, and its jurisdiction over persons and property within its limits, a State provides for the security of the lives, limbs, health and comfort of persons and the protection of property; or when it does those things which may otherwise incidentally affect commerce, such as the establishment and regulation of highways, canals, railroads, wharves, ferries and other commercial facilities; the passage of inspection laws to secure the due quality and measure of products and commodities; the passage of laws to regulate or restrict the sale of articles deemed injurious to the health or morals of the community; the imposition of taxes upon persons residing within the State or belonging to its population, and upon avocations and employments pursued therein, not directly connected with foreign or interstate commerce or with some other employment or business exercised under authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States; and the imposition of taxes upon all property within the State, mingled with and forming part of the great mass of property therein. But in making such internal regulations a State cannot impose taxes upon persons passing through the State, or coming into it merely for [494] a temporary purpose, especially if connected with interstate or foreign commerce; nor can it impose such taxes upon property imported into the State from abroad, or from another State, and not yet become part of the common mass of property therein; and no discrimination can be made, by any such regulations, adversely to the persons or property of other States; and no regulations can be made directly affecting interstate commerce. Any taxation or regulation of the latter character would be an unauthorized interference with the power given to Congress over the subject.

For authorities on this last head it is only necessary to refer to those already cited.

In a word, it may be said that in the matter of interstate commerce the United States are but one country, and are and must be subject to one system of regulations, and not to a multitude of systems. The doctrine of the freedom of that commerce, except as regulated by Congress, is so firmly established that it is unnecessary to enlarge further upon the subject.

In view of these fundamental principles, which are to govern our decision, we may approach the question submitted to us in the present case, and inquire whether it is competent for a State to levy a tax or impose any other restriction upon the citizens or inhabitants of other States, for selling or seeking to sell their goods in such State before they are introduced therein. Do not such restrictions affect the very foundation of interstate trade? How is a manufacturer, or a merchant, of one State, to sell his goods in another State, without, in some way, obtaining orders therefor? Must he be compelled to send them at a venture, without knowing whether there is any demand for them? This may, undoubtedly, be safely done with regard to some products for which there is always a market and a demand, or where the course of trade has established a general and unlimited demand. A raiser of farm produce in New Jersey or Connecticut, or a manufacturer of leather or wooden ware, may perhaps safely take his goods to the City of New York and be sure of finding a stable and reliable market for them. But there are hundreds, perhaps thousands, of articles which no [495] person would think of exporting to another State without first procuring an order for them. It is true, a merchant or manufacturer in one State may erect or hire a warehouse or store in another State, in which to place his goods, and await the chances of being able to sell them. But this would require a warehouse or a store in every State with which he might desire to trade.

Surely, he cannot be compelled to take this inconvenient and expensive course. In certain branches of business, it may be adopted with advantage. Many manufacturers do open houses or places of business in other States than those in which they reside, and send their goods there to be kept on sale. But this is a matter of convenience, and not of compulsion, and would neither suit the convenience nor be within the ability of many others engaged in the same kinds of business, and would be entirely unsuited to many branches of business. In these cases, then, what shall the merchant or manufacturer do, who wishes to sell his goods in other States? Must he sit still in his factory or warehouse, and wait for the people of those States to come to him? This would be a silly and ruinous proceeding.

The only other way, and the one, perhaps, which most extensively prevails, is to obtain orders from persons residing or doing business in those other States. But how is the merchant or manufacturer to secure such orders. If he may be taxed by such States for doing so, who shall limit the tax? It may amount to prohibition. To say that such a tax is not a burden upon interstate commerce is to speak at least unadvisedly and without due attention to the truth of things.

It may be suggested that the merchant or manufacturer has the postoffice at his command, and may solicit orders through the mails. We do not suppose, however, that anyone would seriously contend that this is the only way in which his business can be transacted without being amenable to exactions on the part of the State. Besides, why could not the State to which his letters might be sent, tax him for soliciting orders in this way, as well as in any other way?

The truth is that, in numberless instances, the most feasible, if not the only practicable, [496] way for the merchant or manufacturer to obtain orders in other States is to obtain them by personal application, either by himself, or by some one employed by him for that purpose; and in many branches of business he must necessarily exhibit samples for the purpose of determining the kind and quality of the goods he proposes to sell, or which the other party desires to purchase. But the right of taxation, if it exists at all, is not confined to selling by sample. It embraces every act of sale, whether by word of mouth only, or by the exhibition of samples. If the right exists, any New York or Chicago merchant visiting New Orleans or Jacksonville, for pleasure or for his health, and casually taking an order for goods to be sent from his warehouse, could be made liable to pay a tax for so doing, or be convicted of a misdemeanor for not having taken out a license. The right to tax would apply equally as well to the principal as to his agent, and to a single act of sale as to a hundred acts.

But it will be said that a denial of this power of taxation will interfere with the right of the State to tax business pursuits and callings carried on within its limits, and its right to require licenses for carrying on those which are declared to be privileges. This may be true to a certain extent; but only in those cases in which the States themselves, as well as individual citizens, are subject to the restraints of the higher law of the Constitution. And this interference will be very limited in its operation. It will only prevent the levy of a tax, or the requirement of a license, for making negotiations in the conduct of interstate commerce; and it may well be asked where the State gets authority for imposing burdens on that branch of business any more than for imposing a tax on the business of importing from foreign countries, or even on that of postmaster or United States Marshal. The mere calling the business of a drummer a privilege cannot make it so. Can the State Legislature make it a Tennessee privilege to carry on the business of importing goods from foreign countries? If not, has it any better right to make it a state privilege to carry on interstate commerce? It seems to be forgotten, in argument, that the people of this country are citizens of the United States, as well as of the individual States, and that they have some rights under the Constitution and laws of the [497] former, independent of the latter, and free from any interference or restraint from them.

To deny to the State the power to lay the tax, or require the license in question, will not, in any perceptible degree, diminish its resources or its just power of taxation. It is very true that if the goods when sold were in the State, and part of its general mass of property, they would be liable to taxation; but when brought into the State in consequence of the sale they will be equally liable; so that, in the end, the State will derive just as much revenue from them as if they were there before the sale. As soon as the goods are in the State and become part of its general mass of property, they will become liable to be taxed in the same manner as other property of similar character, as was distinctly held by this court in the case of Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622 [29: 257]. When goods are sent from one State to another for sale, or, in consequence of a sale, they become part of its general property, and amenable to its laws; provided that no discrimination be made against them as goods from another State, and that they be not taxed by reason of being brought from another State, but only taxed in the usual way as other goods are. Brown v. Houston, qua supra; Machine Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676 [25: 754]. But to tax the sale of such goods, or the offer to sell them, before they are brought into the State, is a very different thing, and seems to us clearly a tax on interstate commerce itself.

It is strongly urged, as if it were a material point in the case, that no discrimination is made between domestic and foreign drummers—those of Tennessee and those of other States; that all are taxed alike. But that does not meet the difficulty. Interstate commerce cannot be taxed at all, even though the same amount of tax should be laid on domestic commerce, or that which is carried on solely within the State. This was decided in the case of The State Freight Tax Cases [supra]. The negotiation of sales of goods which are in another State, for the purpose of introducing them into the State in which the negotiation is made, is interstate commerce. A New Orleans merchant cannot be taxed there for ordering goods from London or New York, because, in the one case, it is an act of foreign, and, in the other, of interstate commerce, both of which are subject to regulation by Congress alone.

It would not be difficult, however, to show [498] that the tax authorized by the State of Tennessee in the present case is discriminative against the merchants and manufacturers of other States. They can only sell their goods in Memphis by the employment of drummers and by means of samples; whilst the merchants and manufacturers of Memphis, having regular licensed houses of business there, have no occasion for such agents; and if they had, they are not subject to any tax therefor. They are taxed for their licensed houses, it is true; but so, it is presumable, are the merchants and manufacturers of other States in the places where they reside; and the tax on drummers operates greatly to their disadvantage in comparison with the merchants and manufacturers of Memphis. And such was undoubtedly one of its objects. This kind of taxation is usually imposed at the instance and solicitation of domestic dealers, as a means of protecting them from foreign competition.

And in many cases there may be some reason in their desire for such protection. But this shows in a still stronger light the unconstitutionality of the tax. It shows that it not only operates as a restriction upon interstate commerce, but that it is intended to have that effect as one of its principal objects. And if a State can, in this way, impose restrictions upon interstate commerce for the benefit and protection of its own citizens, we are brought back to the condition of things which existed before the adoption of the Constitution, and which was one of the principal causes that led to it.

If the selling of goods by sample and the employment of drummers for that purpose, injuriously affect the local interest of the States, Congress, if applied to, will undoubtedly make such reasonable regulations as the case may demand. And Congress alone can do it; for it is obvious that such regulations should be based on a uniform system applicable to the whole country, and not left to the varied, discordant or retaliatory enactments of forty different States. The confusion into which the com-[499] merce of the country would be thrown by being subject to state legislation on this subject, would be but a repetition of the disorder which prevailed under the Articles of Confederation.

To say that the tax, if invalid as against drummers from other States, operates as a discrimination against the drummers of Tennessee, against whom it is conceded to be valid, is no argument; because the State is not bound to tax its own drummers; and if it does so whilst having no power to tax those of other States, it acts of its own free will, and is itself the author of such discrimination. As before said, the State may tax its own internal commerce; but that does not give it any right to tax interstate commerce.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Tennessee is reversed, and the plaintiff in error must be discharged.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite, dissenting:

I am unable to agree to this judgment. The case, as I understand it, is this:

In January, 1879, the State of Tennessee abolished the charter of the City of Memphis and created the Taxing District of Shelby County as its successor. By a statute passed April 4, 1881, to provide means for the support of the Taxing District, it was, among other things, enacted "That all drummers and all persons not having a licensed house of business in the Taxing District, offering for sale or selling goods, wares, or merchandise therein by sample, shall be required to pay to the county trustees the sum of ten dollars per week, or twenty-five dollars per month, for such privilege, and no license shall be issued for a longer period than three months."

Sabine Robbins, a citizen of Ohio, employed by the firm of Rose, Robbins & Co., also citizens of Ohio, engaged in business as merchants at the City of Cincinnati, in that State, has been convicted of a violation of this statute because he solicited trade for his firm in the Taxing District, by the use of samples, without a license. This it is now decided was wrong because the statute under which the conviction [500] was had, in so far as it applies to the business in which Robbins was engaged, is a regulation of interstate commerce, and, therefore, repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. To this I cannot give my assent.

The license fee is demanded for the privilege of selling goods by sample within the Taxing District. The fee is exacted from all alike who do that kind of business, unless they have "a licensed house of business" in the District. There is no discrimination between citizens of the State and citizens of other States. The tax is upon the business, and this I have always understood to be lawful, whether the business was carried on by a citizen of the State under whose authority the exaction was made, or a citizen of another State, unless there was discrimination against citizens of other States. In Osborne v. Mobile, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 481 [21 : 472], it is said "The whole court agreed that a tax on business carried on within the State, and without discrimination between its citizens and the citizens of other States, might be constitutionally imposed and collected." And I cannot believe that if Robbins had opened an office for his business within the Taxing District, at which he kept and exhibited his samples, it would be held that he would not be liable to the tax, and this whether he stayed there all the time or came only at intervals. But what can be the difference in principle, so far as this question is concerned, whether he takes a room permanently in a business block of the District where, when he comes, he sends his boxes and exhibits his wares, or engages a room temporarily at a hotel or private house and carries on his business there during his stay? Or even whether he takes his sample boxes around with him to his different customers and shows his wares from them? In either case he goes to the District to ply his trade and make his sales from the goods he exhibits. He does not sell those goods, but he sells others like them. It is true that his business was to solicit orders for his principals, but in doing so he bargained for them, carried on business for them in the District by means of the samples of their goods, which had been furnished him for that purpose. To all intents and purposes he had his goods with him for sale, for what he sold was like what he exhibited as the subjects of sale. I am unable to see any difference in principle between a tax on a seller by sample and a tax on a peddler; and yet I can hardly believe it would be contended that the provision of the [501] same statute now in question, which fixes a license fee for all peddlers in the District, would be held to be unconstitutional in its application to peddlers who came with their goods from another State and expected to go back again.

As the law is valid so far as the inhabitants of the State are concerned, no inhabitant can engage in this business unless he pays the tax. If citizens of other States cannot be taxed in the same way for the same business, there will be discrimination against the inhabitants of Tennessee and in favor of those of other States. This could never have been intended by the Legislature, and I cannot believe the Constitution of the United States makes such a thing necessary. The Constitution gives the citizens of each State all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States; but this certainly does not guarantee to those who are doing business in States other than their own immunities from taxation on that business to which citizens of the State where the business is carried on are subjected.

This case shows the need of such authority in the States. This Taxing District is situated on the western boundary of Tennessee. To get into another State it is only necessary to cross the Mississippi River to Arkansas. It may be said to be an historical fact that the charter of Memphis was abolished and the Taxing District established because of the oppressive debt of Memphis, and the records of this court furnish abundant evidence of the heavy taxation to which property and business within the limits of both the old corporation and the new have been for many years necessarily subjected. Merchants in Tennessee are by law required to pay taxes on the amount of their stocks on hand and a privilege tax besides. Under these circumstances it is easy to see that if a merchant from another State could carry on a business in the District by sending his agents there with samples of his goods to secure orders for deliveries from his stock at home, [502] he would enjoy a privilege of exemption from taxation which the local merchant would not have unless in some form he could be subjected to taxation for what he did in the locality. The same would be true in respect to all inhabitants of the State who were sellers by sample in this District, but who had no place of business there. And so they, like citizens of other States, were required to pay for the privilege. Thus all were treated alike, whether they were citizens of Tennessee or of some other State, and under these circumstances I can see no constitutional objection to such a taxation of citizens of the other States for their business in the District.

I have treated the case as a conviction of a "drummer" for selling goods by sample. That is what Robbins was found guilty of, and that is what this statute makes an offense. The license is only required of "drummers and all persons not having a licensed house of business in the Taxing District, offering for sale or selling goods, wares or merchandise therein by sample." The Supreme Court of Tennessee decided that this means nothing more than that any person who sells by sample shall pay the tax, and to that I agree. It will be time enough to consider whether a nonresident can be taxed for merely soliciting orders without having samples when such a case arises. That is not this case.

Mr. Justice Field and Mr. Justice Gray concur in this dissent.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of Maryland. Reported below, 57 Md. 251. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Henry D. Loney and S. T. Wallis, for plaintiff in error:

The power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States, whether legislatively exercised or not, in respect to any specific matter in controversy, is held to be exclusive without exception; save in matters of a local character and without any national bearing or application.

Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622 (29: 257).

Of course, the case now under consideration belongs to the sphere of national commerce and control, if it is at all within the scope of the constitutional provision. The license here is imposed upon citizens and residents of other States than Maryland, contracting in respect to property situate beyond the limits of Maryland, and to be transported to that State, under the contract, by the usual channels of interstate commerce. If the legislation impeached interferes with the commerce, by which the goods sold and being in New York are to be transported to Baltimore, for the purpose of being mingled with the mass of property in Maryland, and before they are so mingled, it is plainly a state regulation of commerce and forbidden by the Constitution.

Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 281 (23: 347, 349).

"Commerce with foreign countries and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation, and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale and exchange of commodities. For the regulation of commerce, as thus defined, there can be only one system of rules applicable alike to the whole country, and the authority which can act for the whole country can alone adopt such a system. Action upon it by separate States is not, therefore, permissible."

County of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691 (26: 238).

Nor is the application of this principle to be varied or escaped by the substitution of a license for direct taxation of the merchandise sold and transported.

NOTE.—Constitutional law; interstate commerce; regulation of; power of Congress; how far exclusive. See Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. bk. 29, 158, note.

Cook v. Pa. 97 U. S. 570 (24: 1016); Machine Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 678 (25: 755).

The State of Maryland has no more right to tax the goods of a New Yorker, in New York, than those of an Englishman, in London. Nor can the temporary stay or residence of the foreign citizen in Maryland, without change of his residence or place of business, and without any removal of his goods to Maryland, render the taxation of those goods, by the latter State, any more allowable. This court has already held that illegal taxation is one of those deprivations of property which are within the scope of constitutional protection.

R. R. Co. v. Jackson, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 262 (19: 88); State Tax on Foreign Held Bonds, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 300 (21: 179); Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. 111 U. S. 701 (28: 569).

Messrs. Charles B. Roberts, Atty-Gen. of Maryland, and Charles J. M. Gwinn, for defendant in error:

The court of Appeals of Maryland decided, in this cause, that the provisions of the Maryland Code, amended by the Maryland Act of 1880, chapter 349, under which the particular indictment was found, required that all persons, whether residents or nonresidents of the State of Maryland, before offering to sell or selling, by sample in that State, packages of tea or other merchandise stored within the limits of any other State, should obtain the license so to do from the State of Maryland, which was required by article 56 of the Code of that State, as amended by the Act of 1880, chapter 349. The construction thus given by the Court of Appeals of Maryland to the scope of the license laws of Maryland, which are in controversy here, is authoritative in this court.

Christy v. Pridgeon, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 196, 203 (18: 322, 325); Aicardi v. State, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 635, 639 (22: 215, 216); Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 33, 34 (27: 359, 365); Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. 371, 379 (27: 966, 970).

It is in general within the constitutional power of every State to tax occupations, within the control of a State, by requiring persons who wish to pursue them, to obtain, before doing so, a license from certain designated officers.

Nathan v. Louisiana, 49 U. S. 8 How. 80 (12: 995); Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 278 (23: 348).

Such license is a tax. No employment thus under state control is absolutely exempt from the liability to be thus taxed. "The necessities of the goverment may require that the lowest employment, as well as the most lucrative, shall contribute to its support; and, if any are exempted, motives of policy will govern the discrimination."

Cooley, Tax. 1st ed. 385; Burr. Tax. § 77; License Tax Cases, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 472, 473 (18: 501).

The selling of goods by sample within any particular State is conducting a business in such State. As a business it is subject to taxation, unless there be some constitutional reason exempting it from the burden.

Cooley, Tax. 1st ed. 384; McCulloch v. Md. 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 428, 429 (4: 607); State Tax on Foreign Held Bonds, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 319 (21: 186); Shepherd v. Sumter Co. Comrs. 59 Ga. 535.

The provisions of the Maryland Code, which are in controversy in this case, as amended by the Maryland Act of 1880, chapter 349, were not in violation of article 4, section 2, subsection 1, of the Constitution of the United States, because their provisions apply equally to citizens of the State of Maryland and to citizens of the other several States.

Machine Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 679 (25: 755).

The vendor appropriated the specific quantities of teas sold for the benefit of the vendee, and engaged that such specific quantities should be shipped to him. The vendee assented to the appropriation made by the vendor and upon his terms. The property in the goods therefore passed to the vendee.

Chitty, Cont. 11 Eng. ed. 857; Gillett v. Hill, 2 Cromp. & M. 535; Dixon v. Yates, 5 B. & Ad. 313; 27 E. C. L. 90; Thompson v. Balt. & O. R. R. Co. 26 Md. 405.

There was not only a constructive but also an actual delivery of the property in Maryland.

Magruder v. Gage, 33 Md. 348; Kribs v. Jones, 44 Md. 406.

Under such circumstances the effect of the sale to Kenney of the particular tea, and of its shipment to him as a purchaser, was to bring the property, thus sold and shipped, within the jurisdiction of the State of Maryland; to incorporate and intermix it with the mass of property in the State; to deprive it of its distinctive character as an import, and to subject it to the taxing power of that State.

Howell v. State, 3 Gill, 23; Providence Bank v. Billings, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 564 (7: 956); Brown v. Md. 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 441–2 (6: 686); Pervear v. Commonwealth, 72 U. Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court: [505]

This case does not differ materially from that of Robbins v. Taxing District of Shelby County, [ante, 694], just decided. The Code of Maryland, as amended in 1880, provides that "No person or corporation other than the grower, maker or manufacturer shall barter or sell, or otherwise dispose of, or shall offer for sale any goods, chattels, wares, or merchandise within this State, without first obtaining a license in the manner herein prescribed." A violation of this law was made an indictable offense; and the plaintiff in error, a citizen and resident of New York, was indicted for offering to sell and for selling by sample, in the City of Baltimore, without license, certain goods for a New York firm, to be shipped from New York directly to the purchaser. The plaintiff in error demurred to the indictment, but it was sustained both by the court of original jurisdiction and by the Court of Appeals of Maryland on writ of error. The constitutionality of the law was duly raised, and the law was sustained.

The same principles apply to this case which were considered in that of Robbins, and the same result must be declared. [506]

The judgment of the Court of Appeals of Maryland is reversed, and the plaintiff in error must be discharged.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite concurring:

Mr. Justice Field, Mr. Justice Gray, and myself agree to this judgment, but on different grounds from those stated in the opinion of the court. It is not denied that the Statute of Maryland requires a nonresident merchant desiring to sell by sample in that State to pay for a license to do that business a sum to be ascertained by the amount of his stock in trade in the State where he resides and in which he has his principal place of business. This differs materially from the Statute of Tennessee, which was considered in Robbins v. Taxing District of Shelby County, just decided, and is in its effect, as we think, a tax on commerce among the States. The charge for the privilege to the nonresident is measured by his capacity for doing business all over the United States, and without any reference to the amount done or to be done in Maryland.

[517] COUNTY OF CARTER, Plff. in Err.,
v.
DAVID SINTON.

Constitutional law—division of county after incurring indebtedness—Kentucky Act of January 30, 1878, authorizing county court to compromise—validity of—title, sufficient—parties—practice.

1. The provision of the Constitution of Kentucky, requiring that "No law enacted by the General Assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title," should receive a reasonable and not a technical construction. It is enough if the law has but one general effect, and that effect is fairly expressed in the title.

2. The Act of the General Assembly of Kentucky, of January 30, 1878, authorizing the County Court of Carter County to act for the parts of the Counties of Boyd and Elliott taken from Carter County, in compromising a bonded debt due from the old County, is valid; said parts of the Counties of Boyd and Elliott being still a part of Carter County for the purposes of the debt.

3. The County Court of Carter County had authority to issue negotiable securities under said Act.

4. An action lies on such securities against Carter County alone, and binds said parts of Boyd and Elliott Counties.

5. An objection to the form of the declaration not raised below cannot be considered by this court.

Submitted Jan. 7, 1887. Decided March 7, 1887

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky. Reported below, 23 Fed. Rep. 535. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. William Lindsay and Alvin Duvall, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. George Hoadly, Edgar M. Johnson, Edward Colston, George Hoadly, Jr., and James O'Hara, for defendant in error.

This was a suit brought against the County of Carter to recover the amount due on certain bonds and interest coupons, issued under the following circumstances: By an Act of the General Assembly of Kentucky, "To incorporate the Lexington and Big Sandy Railroad Company," approved January 9, 1852, and an Act amendatory thereof, approved March 1, 1854, the County of Carter was authorized to subscribe $75,000 to the stock of the company, and to issue its bonds to raise the money to pay therefor. Under this authority the subscription was made and seventy-five bonds of $1,000 each issued by the County. These bonds were in the usual form of negotiable coupon bonds, payable to the order of the railroad company thirty years from date, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, semi-annually at the Bank of America, New York. The railroad company indorsed them in blank, and all but one afterwards came into the hands of Joseph C. Butler and L. Worthington, citizens of Ohio, as purchasers for value before maturity. [519]

In 1859, after this subscription was made, and while the bonds issued on that account were outstanding, the County of Boyd was created by the General Assembly of Kentucky, which included within its boundaries a part of the original County of Carter. In 1869 the County of Elliott was created, and this took in another part of Carter, but in each of the Acts creating the new counties it was provided:

"That nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to release the citizens and property now subject, or which may hereafter become subject, to taxation within the boundaries of Carter County, included in the first section of this Act, from being held and made liable for the bonds and interest, issued to the Lexington and Big Sandy Railroad Company, as though this Act had never been passed."

Default having been made in the payment of interest on the bonds, suits were brought by Butler against Carter County for the recovery of the amount due on coupons attached to the bonds he held. The suits resulted in judgments against the County. Afterwards the following Act, approved January 30, 1878, was passed by the General Assembly of Kentucky:

"An Act Authorizing the County of Carter, and Those Parts of Boyd and Elliott Taken from Carter County, to Compromise and Settle with the Holders of the Bonds and Coupons of Interest Executed by Carter County in Its Subscription to the Capital Stock of the Lexington and Big Sandy Railroad Company, and to Levy and Collect a Tax for That Purpose.

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky:

"Sec. 1. That power and authority is hereby given to the County of Carter, and those parts of the Counties of Boyd and Elliott taken from Carter County, to compromise and settle with the holders of the bonds and coupons of interest executed by Carter County in its subscription to the capital stock of the Lexington and Big Sandy Railroad Company. Said compromise and settlement shall be made by the Carter County Court, composed of the county judge and a majority of the justices of the peace in commission of Carter County, for and on behalf of the County of Carter, and those parts of the Counties of Boyd and Elliott taken from Carter County. Said court may make said compromise through a commission appointed for [520] that purpose; but before the same shall become binding on the County of Carter it shall be approved by the Carter County Court, constituted as county levy courts are required by law to be constituted. Said court may execute to the holders of said bonds and coupons of interest, severally, the obligations of the County of Carter and those parts of the Counties of Boyd and Elliott taken from Carter County in their formation, which shall be signed by the county judge of Carter County, and attested by the clerk of said court. Said obligations shall contain such stipulations as to interest as may be agreed upon by the court and holders of said bonds and coupons of interest, or either of them, but not at a greater rate than 6 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually. Said obligations shall be due and payable at such times, and be for such amounts, as may be agreed for by the court and holder or holders of said bonds and coupons."

The next three sections of the Act contain provisions for the levy and collection of taxes, to pay the interest and principal of the compromise bonds, upon persons and property within the limits of Carter County, as it was when the debt was originally created. The fifth and last section is as follows:

"Sec. 5. This Act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage; but nothing in this Act shall be so construed as to affect or make more valid the bonds and coupons of interest given by Carter County in its subscription to the capital stock of the Lexington and Big Sandy Railroad Company than they were before the passage of this Act."

[521] Under the authority of this statute a compromise was made with the holders of the original bonds, by which the County Court of Carter County issued one hundred and nineteen new bonds of the County of Carter and those parts of the Counties of Elliott and Boyd taken from Carter County, each for the sum of $1,000, payable to Henry Peachey and Richard O. Butler, executors of Joseph C. Butler, or bearer, with semi-annual interest warrants at the rate of 6 per cent per annum attached. The principal of the bonds was made payable at different dates.

David Sinton, the defendant in error, purchased nine of these bonds for value before maturity, and five hundred and forty of the coupons, and this suit was brought to recover the amount due thereon. Originally the suit included other bonds and coupons; but as it was discontinued so far as they were concerned, before judgment, no questions arise in this court as to them.

To a petition setting forth the foregoing facts the County demurred: 1, because the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and 2, because the petition shows a defect of parties, plaintiff and defendant. This demurrer was overruled. Sinton v. County of Carter, 23 Fed. Rep. 585. The defendant then filed an answer, some paragraphs of which were stricken out on motion, and others demurred to, and the demurrer sustained. As no point is made on this branch of the case, a further statement of it is not necessary.

The court gave judgment against the County for $29,121.64, and to reverse that judgment this writ of error was brought.

The principal points presented by the argument of the plaintiff arise on the demurrer to the petition, and they may be stated thus:

[522] 1. The Act of January 30, 1878, is void by the Constitution of Kentucky, because the subject to which it relates is not clearly expressed in its title.

2. The Act is also unconstitutional and void because it vests in the County Court of Carter County the power to bind the parts of Elliott and Boyd Counties which had been set off from Carter.

3. The Act gave no authority to the County Court of Carter County to issue negotiable securities which pass by delivery and in the hands of innocent holders are free from defenses which would be good as between the original parties.

4. There is a defect of parties defendant, because Carter County is sued alone without joining "those parts of Boyd and Elliott Counties taken from Carter."

1. As to the title of the Act.

The provision of the Constitution of Kentucky relied on is article II, section 37, as follows:

"No law enacted by the General Assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title."

Undoubtedly the design of this provision was, as is said in Pennington v. Woolfolk, 79 Ky. 20, "to prevent the use of deceptive titles as a cover for vicious legislation, by enabling members of the General Assembly to form such opinion of the nature of a bill by merely hearing it read by its title;" but as early as 1859 the court of appeals said in Phillips v. Covington & Cin. Bridge Co. 2 Met. (Ky.) 221: "This prohibition should receive a reasonable and not a technical construction; and looking to the evil intended to be remedied, it should be applied to such Acts of the Legislature alone as are obviously within its spirit and meaning. None of the provisions of a statute should be regarded as unconstitutional when they all relate directly or indirectly to the same subject, have a natural connection, and are not foreign to the subject expressed in its title." This is in accord with the decisions of this court in Montclair v. Ramsdell, 107 U. S. 147 [27: 431], where we followed the rulings of the Supreme Court of New Jersey upon a similar provision in the Constitution of that State; in Jonesboro City v. Cairo & St. L. R. R. Co. 110 U. S. 192 [28: 116], and Mahomet v. Quackenbush, 117 U. S. 509 [29: 962], where the Constitution of Illinois and the decisions of the Supreme Court of that State were considered; and in Otoe County v. Baldwin, 111 U. S. 1 [28: 331], which had reference to the Constitution of Nebraska and the settled rule of decision in that State, and in Ackley School Dist. v. Hall, 113 U. S. 135 [28: 954], which arose in Iowa. It is enough if the law has but one general object and that object is fairly expressed in its title. Cooley, Const. Lim. 1st ed. 144, § 2; 4th ed. 175.

[523] Here the title is "An Act Authorizing the County of Carter, and Those Parts of the Counties of Boyd and Elliott Taken from Carter County, to Compromise and Settle with the Holders of the Bonds and Coupons of Interest Executed by Carter County in Its Subscription to the Capital Stock of the Lexington and Big Sandy Railroad Company, and to Levy and Collect a Tax for That Purpose." This clearly and distinctly expresses the whole object of the legislation, and there is nothing in the body of the Act itself which is not in every way germane to what is there expressed. No one interested in the subject matter of the law could be put off his guard by hearing the bill read by its title. True, it does not state that the County Court of Carter County is to act as the representative of the parts of Boyd and Elliott Counties, as well as the County of Carter, in making the compromise, or that bonds are to be issued for the purpose of carrying it out; but all this is matter of detail, suitable to the single purpose the Legislature had in view; namely, a settlement and compromise with the holders of bonds issued by Carter County before its division, and for which the present Carter County and those parts of Boyd and Elliott which were taken from the old county were liable. It is difficult to see how the subject of the legislation could be stated more clearly without making the title of the Act "a detailed statement, or an index or abstract of its contents," which all agree is not necessary. Montclair v. Ramsdell, 107 U. S. 155 [27: 438].

2. The authority of the County Court of Carter County to bind "those parts of the Counties of Boyd and Elliott taken from Carter County."

[524] If we understand correctly the position of the County as to this branch of the case, it is that the Legislature had no power to authorize the County Court of Carter County to act for these parts of counties in compromising the old debt for which they were held, because they were no longer parts of that County, and no opportunity was given them to participate in the arrangement. These parts of counties have no separate organization of their own, corporate or otherwise. For all county purposes, except this debt contracted by Carter County when they were included within its boundaries, they are subject to the government of the counties to which they now respectively belong; but for the debt, they still remain a part of Carter. Such is clearly the effect of that provision in the Acts establishing the new counties which declared that the liability of citizens and property in the territory set off from Carter for taxation on account of the bonds and interest should continue the same "as though this Act had never been passed." Had the Acts never been passed, no one would doubt the power of the Legislature to give the County Court of Carter the authority to make the settlement in the same way now provided for, even though these parts of the County did not have a justice of the peace in commission to take part in the deliberations. And this because the county court was made the agent of the County, and of those whose property was subject to taxation, for the transaction of this business. The Legislature might have appointed a commission for the same purpose, or it might have selected any other suitable agency. In order to bind the county or the taxpayers, it was not necessary that the taxpayers should vote on the subject, or that they should participate in an election of the body that was to act in the matter. All that was properly within the discretion of the Legislature. No new debt was to be created, and no new subscription to the stock of a railroad company was to be made. All that had to be done was to compromise and settle an existing debt, and to substitute new liabilities on terms to be agreed on for an old one. Certainly it was within the power of the Legislature to designate a suitable agency for that purpose, and what could be more suitable than that department of the governing body of Carter County which was entrusted with the management of [525] its financial affairs? The cases of Allison v. Louisville & H. C. & W. R. Co. 9 Bush, 253; S. C. 10 Bush, 1; Scuffletown Fence Co. v. McAllister, 12 Bush, 312; Cypress Pond Draining Co. v. Hooper, 2 Met. (Ky.) 350; and Mercer Co. Court v. Kentucky River Nav. Co. 8 Bush, 300, referred to in the argument of counsel, all relate to the creation of new liabilities, not to the settlement of old ones.

3. The right to issue negotiable securities.

It is no doubt true that, without sufficient legislative authority, a municipality cannot issue commercial paper which will be free from equitable defenses in the hands of innocent holders; Claiborne Co. v. Brooks, 111 U. S. 400 [28: 470]; but, in our opinion, that authority was given here. The County of Carter was authorized to borrow money and to issue its bonds therefor to pay its subscription to the stock of the railroad company. This, all agree, was sufficient authority to issue bonds which were negotiable, and the averments in the declaration are that the bonds which were in fact issued had that character. The debt to be compromised, therefore, under the Act of 1878, was a debt which had been created by the issue of such bonds, and the authority was to execute to the "holders of said bonds and coupons of interest" "the obligations of said County of Carter and those parts of the Counties of Boyd and Elliott taken from Carter County in their formation, which shall be signed by the county judge of Carter County and attested by the clerk of said court." They were to contain such stipulations as to interest, not exceeding 6 per cent per annum, and to be made due and payable at such times as might be agreed on. As the new obligations were to be executed to take up and cancel old negotiable securities to a large amount, and were to be made payable at a future time, there cannot be a doubt of the intention of the Legislature to authorize the execution of "obligations" negotiable in form and in law, if necessary to secure a settlement. The authority to include in the obligations such stipulations as to interest as might be agreed on [526] clearly implies authority to attach interest coupons, and everything indicates a purpose to invest the court with all the powers as to the form of the obligations that were necessary to enable it to meet the requirements of the holders of the outstanding bonds and coupons in this particular.

4. The want of parties.

As we have already said the parts of Boyd and Elliott Counties which are interested in this matter have no separate organization of their own, and they remain for all the purposes of this debt a part of Carter County. A suit against Carter County on the bonds is therefore a suit against them, and a judgment against that County will be payable out of taxes collected within the boundaries of the original county under the provisions of the Act of 1878

A suggestion was made in the argument for the County of a variance between the bond described in the declaration and that which was actually issued; but this is a matter which we cannot consider, as there is no copy of the bond as issued in the record.

Another objection is made to the form of the declaration in that it does not meet the requirements of section 113 of the Civil Code of Kentucky, and set out distinctly in separate paragraphs each one of the sixty separate causes of action sued on. That objection cannot be taken by general demurrer, and besides it does not seem to have been made below.

The objection to the action of the court in respect to the answer is so little relied on that it is only necessary to say we see no error in what was done.

The judgment is affirmed.

v.
HARRISON B. SCHULER.

HARRISON B. SCHULER, Appt.,
v.
LACLEDE BANK AND J. T. CRAIG, Assignee, etc.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 511-517.)

Banking—check as equitable assignment—notice to bank, necessary to bind fund.

*1. Without deciding the mooted question whether a check or draft of a person on a bank in which he has deposits operates as an equitable assignment of the fund, so on deposit, to the holder of the check to the amount of it, it is clear that such check or draft does not bind the fund in the hands of the bank until it has notice of the draft or check by presentation for payment, or otherwise.

2. Until then, other checks drawn afterward may be paid, or other assignments of the fund, or part of it, may secure priority by giving prior notice.

Submitted Jan. 7, 1887. Decided Mar. 7, 1887.

APPEAL and cross appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. Reported below, 27 Fed. Rep. 424. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court. See also the following case of Schuler v. Israel.

Mr. David P. Dyer, for Schuler:

Drawing and delivery of the check set out in the bill was an appropriation of so much money of J. N. Israel in the custody of the Laclede Bank as was called for by the check.

Chouteau v. Rouse, 56 Mo. 65; Union Bank v. Oceana Co. Bank, 80 Ill. 212; Merchants Bank v. State Bank, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 647 (19: 1019); Morrison v. McCartney, 30 Mo. 187.

J. N. Israel, prior to this assignment, had already surrendered control of the deposit by drawing and delivery of the check; and his assignee took the bank account as well as all other property of the assignor in its exact condition at the time of the assignment, subject to all legal and equitable claims.

The drawing of the check to Schuler operated in equity to transfer so much of the funds of J. N. Israel in the Laclede Bank as would pay the check.

Walker v. Siegel, 2 Cent. L. J. 108; German Sav. Inst. v. Adae, 8 Fed. Rep. 106; First Nat. Bank v. Coates, 8 Fed. Rep. 540.

As between the assignor and assignee, the claim of the assignee cannot rise higher than the right transferred to him by the assignor. He stands in the shoes of the assignor as to all property conveyed by the assignment, subject to the legal and equitable rights of all other persons.

Burrill, Assignments, § 391; Rumsey v. Town, 20 Fed. Rep. 558; Stewart v. Platt, 101 U. S. 738, 739 (25: 818).

As between Schuler and the Laclede Bank, the rights of Schuler are those existing on the morning of October 26, having relation back to the time of drawing the check by Israel. The right of set-off on the part of the Laclede Bank was defeated by the giving of the check.

Myers v. Davis, 22 N. Y. 489; Xenia Bank v. Stewart, 114 U. S. 224 (29: 101); McGrade v. German Sav. Inst. 4 Mo. 330.

The law will make application of the money in the hands of the Laclede Bank, according to its own notion of justice.

Nat. Bank v. Mechanics Nat. Bank, 94 U. S. 439 (24: 178).

The assignment of Israel to Craig is void under the laws of Texas.

Mr. J. E. McKeighan, for the Laclede Bank and Craig:

The drawing of the Schuler check did not operate to transfer to Schuler any portion of the debt of the Laclede Bank to Israel, or to give him any lien thereon. There was no privity between Schuler and the drawee Bank. A single cause of action cannot be split up without the assent of the debtor.

Mandeville v. Welch, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 277 (5: 87); Bank of the Republic v. Millard, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 152 (19: 897); Dickenson v. Coates, 79 Mo. 250; Rosenthal v. Mastin Bank, 17 Blatchf. 318.

There is no assignment either at law or in equity where there is any power of revocation in the assignor, or where the holder of the fund cannot be compelled to pay although forbidden by the assignor. An order or check is not an equitable assignment, unless it is to pay out of a specified fund specified in the order.

A check is simply the written order of the depositor on his bank to make a certain payment. It is executory, and, as such, it is of course revocable at any time before the bank has paid it or committed itself to paying it.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal and cross appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri.

Harrison B. Schuler, a citizen of the State of Kansas, brought his bill in that court against the Laclede Bank, a corporation under the laws of the State of Missouri, and J. T. Craig, a citizen of the State of Texas. The substance of the bill is that the plaintiff is the owner and holder of a draft, or bank check, drawn by C. W. Israel & Co. on the Laclede Bank, for the sum of $11,250, dated at Henrietta, Texas, October 20, 1885, in favor of the plaintiff, which was duly presented for payment on the 26th day of that month; and that payment was refused, as the Laclede Bank alleged, on the ground that C. W. Israel & Co., the drawers of the draft, had, on October 24, 1885, made an assignment under the laws of Texas for the benefit of their creditors, of which the said Laclede Bank had been advised by telegraph. The bill proceeds upon the idea that there were funds in the hands of the Laclede Bank to the credit of C. W. Israel & Co. on the presentation of said check for payment, which ought to be applied for that purpose, and charges that, notwithstanding the general assignment for the benefit of creditors made by C. W. Israel & Co. on October 24, 1885, the check in question, made in favor of the plaintiff on October 20, 1885, was an assignment or appropriation of so much of those funds to the benefit of complainant, which he is entitled to enforce in this suit.

J. T. Craig, who had become substituted for Davidson, the assignee of C. W. Israel & Co., was also made a party to the suit, and appeared and filed an answer.

The answer of the Laclede Bank, while admitting most of the statements made in the bill, is very long and recites many things not material to the issue as we look upon it, but relies upon two substantial defenses to the suit. The first of these is that, on the morning of the 26th day of October, 1885, it received the following telegram from C. W. Israel & Co.: "Henrietta, Texas, 24 (meaning the 24th of October), Laclede Bank, St. L.: We assigned this day in favor of S. Davidson; hold funds subject to his order. C. W. Israel & Co." It alleges that this telegram was forwarded to the Bank as a night message on Saturday night, and, although duly received at the telegraph office, was only delivered at 8 o'clock on Monday morning, and that the check in favor of complainant was presented at the opening of the Bank at 10:15 on the same morning, which was the first notice that they had of it. The answer insists that the general assignment, with the notice of it by telegraph, was a complete revocation of the Schuler check, as well as all other checks drawn against this defendant by C. W. Israel & Co., and that the assignment, with this prior notice to the Bank, vested in the assignee the better right to any funds of said C. W. Israel & Co. in the hands of the Bank. The answer also sets up transactions between C. W. Israel & Co. and the Bank by which said C. W. Israel & Co. would be indebted on a settlement of the transactions between the two Banks to the Laclede Bank, in a sum beyond anything which they then held on deposit to the credit of C. W. Israel & Co. A part, however, of the transactions which go to make up this claim of set-off against C. W. Israel & Co. consisted of a note or notes discounted by the Laclede Bank for said C. W. Israel & Co., but which had not yet matured. The answer also sets up that C. W. Israel & Co. and the Laclede Bank were corresponding Banks, one being in Texas and the other in Saint Louis, Missouri, and that there had been a long course of dealing between them, and for this reason they had discounted the notes of C. W. Israel & Co. without any other sufficient security.

Craig, as assignee for C. W. Israel & Co., filed a separate answer, in which he sets out mainly the same matters found in the answer of the Laclede Bank, and he also makes a part of his answer the assignment of C. W. Israel & Co. to Davidson for the benefit of all their creditors.

There were no replications to either of these answers, but a stipulation is filed in regard to facts that are agreed upon by the parties, which closes with this paragraph: "All other facts in the bill and answer not inconsistent herewith are to be taken as part of this agreed statement."

The decree of the court was as follows:

"This cause came on for hearing at this term of the court on the bill of complaint, answers of defendants, and stipulations on file, and the court, being fully advised concerning the premises, finds that at the date of the presentation to the said Laclede Bank of the check set out in the bill of complaint there was to the credit of the account of C. W. Israel & Co. in said Bank the sum of $5,912.41 subject to the payment of said check, and that said check operated in equity as an assignment of said sum as against said defendants to said complainant.

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said complainant have and recover of and from said defendants the said sum of $5,912.41, together with interest at 6 per cent per annum from the 26th day of October, 1885, amounting to $6,073.99; and it is further ordered that execution issue therefor against said defendant, the Laclede Bank."

From this decree both Schuler and the Bank appealed. The assignee, Craig, did not appeal.

The question of how far and under what circumstances a check of a depositor in a bank will be considered an equitable assignment, to the payee of the check, of all or any portion of the funds or deposits to the credit of the drawer in the bank, is one which has been very much considered of late years in the courts, and about which there is not a unanimity of opinion. In this court it is very well settled that such a check, unless accepted by the bank, will not sustain an action at law by the drawee against the bank, as there is no privity of contract between them. Marine Bank v. Fulton Bank, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 252 [17: 785]; Bank of Republic v. Millard, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 152 [19: 897]; Bank v. Whitman, 94 U. S. 343 [24: 239].

But while this may be considered as the extablished doctrine of this court in regard to the rights of the parties at law, and is probably the prevailing doctrine in nearly all the courts, it is urged in this case, and several respectable courts have so decided, that such a check is an appropriation of the amount for which it is drawn of the funds of the drawer in the hands of the bank. Roberts v. Austin, Corbin & Co. 26 Iowa, 315; Forgarties v. State Bank, 12 Rich. L. R. (S. C.) 518; Munn v. Burch, 25 Ill. 35; German Sav. Inst. v. Adae, 1 McCrary, C. C. 501.

But however this doctrine may operate to secure an equitable interest in the fund deposited in the bank to the credit of the drawer after notice to the bank of the check, or presentation to it for payment—a question which we do not here decide—we are of opinion that, as to the bank itself, the holder of the fund, and its duties and obligations in regard to it, the bank remains unaffected by the execution of such a check until notice has been given to it or demand made upon it for its payment.

[515] In the case before us it is a conceded fact that before the Bank had any knowledge or notice whatever of the check on which the plaintiff brings this suit, it had received a distinct notification from the drawer of that check that he had made a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors, with an express direction to hold the funds subject to the order of the assignee. Therefore, even if the check could be considered as an attempt on the part of C. W. Israel & Co. to assign or appropriate this amount in the hands of the Bank to Schuler, the general assignment for the benefit of all their creditors of all their assets, including those in the hands of the Bank, was made and brought to the attention of the Bank with directions to turn them over to this assignee, before it had any notice of the check in favor of Schuler.

The learned judge who decided the case on the circuit rested his judgment, in an opinion which is found in the record, on the proposition that, as between these two equities,—namely, the equities of the general creditors under the assignment to Davidson, and this implied assignment in equity by the drawing of the check, —the latter was superior. In this it would seem that he was somewhat influenced by the fact that he was enabled to trace the sources of some of the deposits to the credit of C. W. Israel & Co., in the Laclede Bank, to money which in a roundabout way had been collected for the payment of a debt to Schuler, and had finally been deposited to the credit of C. W. Israel & Co. in the Laclede Bank. But there is no allegation in the bill, nor any evidence in the testimony, nor any reason to believe that the Bank knew anything of this connection between the sums received from several of the banks with which Israel was connected at different times and the debt of Schuler. This is expressly denied, and we can see no reason why the Bank should be held in any way to regard the deposit made by C. W. Israel & Co. as, in law or in equity, funds in which Schuler had an interest. It must therefore be left entirely out of the argument in the contest between the Bank and Schuler.

[516] Apart from this matter, it is not easy to see any valid reason why the assignment of an insolvent debtor, for the equal benefit of all his creditors, of all his property, does not confer on those creditors an equity equal to that of the holder of an unpaid check upon his banker. The holder of this check comes into the distribution of the funds in the hands of the assignee for his share of those funds with other creditors. The mere fact that he had received a check, a few days before the making of the assignment, on the Bank, which had not been presented until after the general assignment was made and notified to the Bank, does not seem, in and of itself, to give any such superiority of right. The assignment was complete and perfect, and vested in the assignee the right to all the property of the assignor immediately upon its execution and delivery, with due formalities, to the assignee, and the check of this assignee, like the check of Israel & Co., could have been paid by the Bank with safety, if first presented. The check given by the same assignor a few days before was only an acknowledgment of a debt by that assignor, and became no valid claim upon the funds against which it was drawn until the holder of those funds was notified of its existence. This, we think, is the fair result of the authorities on that subject.

In the case of Spain v. Hamilton's Admr. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 624 [17: 625], this court says:

"Any order, writing, or act which makes an appropriation of a fund amounts to an equitable assignment of the fund. The reason is that the fund being a matter not assignable at law, nor capable of manual possession, an appropriation of it is all that the nature of the case admits of, and therefore it is held good in a court of equity. As the assignee is generally entitled to all the remedies of the assignor, so he is subject to all the equities between the assignor and his debtor. But in order to perfect his title against the debtor it is indispensable that the assignee should immediately give notice of the assignment to the debtor, for otherwise a priority of right may be obtained by a subsequent assignee, or the debt may be discharged by a payment to the assignee before such notice."

The same principle is also laid down in Christmas v. Russell, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 69 [20: 762]; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1047, 1057, 1085*a*. See especially the authorities cited in note 1 to this latter section. See also Ward v. Morrison, 25 Vt. 599, and Loomis v. Loomis, 26 Vt. 198. [517]

For these reasons we are of opinion that at the time of the presentation of the check to the Bank, the Bank held no funds subject to its payment, whether we consider the delivery of it by C. W. Israel & Co. to Schuler as intended to create an equitable assignment or not. An earnest effort is made in the argument of counsel in this court to impeach the general assignment as being void under the laws of Texas where it was made, and also the State of Missouri where this fund was. As there is nothing in the Statute of Missouri which would make this assignment absolutely void, and there is nothing brought to our attention to prove that it was void by the laws of Texas, and as the assignment, though mentioned in the original bill of complainant, is not assailed, nor any ground set forth to show its invalidity, we do not think there is any reason why it should not be held in this proceeding to be a valid assignment. As this assignment had the effect when the Bank was notified of it to transfer to the assignee all right to any funds in its hands which Israel could assert, we need not consider the other questions connected with the case.

The result of these views is that the decree against the Bank must be reversed and the case remanded, with instructions to dismiss the bill.

[506] HARRISON B. SCHULER, Plff. in Err.,
v.
J. N. ISRAEL AND THE LACLEDE BANK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 506-510.)

Judgment as a bar—merger—defense of garnishee against attachment—insolvency of debtor.

*1. A judgment recovered in one court may be pleaded as a defense to a suit on the same cause of action pending in another when by law the cause of action is merged in the judgment.

2. A garnishee has a right to set up any defense against the attachment process which he could have done against the debtor in the principal action; and if the debtor be insolvent, and owes the garnishee on a note not due for which he has no sufficient security, he is not bound to risk the loss of his debt in answer to the garnishee process.

Submitted Jan. 10, 1887. Decided Mar. 7, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. Reported below, 27 Fed. Rep. 851. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court. See the preceding case of the Laclede Bank v. Schuler.

Mr. David P. Dyer, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. E. McKeighan, for defendants in error.

The plaintiff in error, who was plaintiff below, brought two separate suits in the Circuit Court of the City of Saint Louis, Missouri, on the same day against C. W Israel and J. N. Israel, as partners in the banking business. One case was brought upon a note for the sum of $10,000, and the other upon a draft made by C. W. Israel & Company for $11,250, on the Laclede Bank, on which payment was refused when presented at the Bank and the draft duly protested.

In each of these cases a writ of attachment was issued at the commencement of the suit, which was served by way of garnishment on the Laclede Bank, also of Saint Louis. An order of publication was made in the state court against C. W. Israel and J. N. Israel on account of their being nonresidents, and the two suits were removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri, upon the application of the plaintiff, upon the ground that he was a citizen of the State of Kansas and the two Israels were citizens of the State of Texas. They were there consolidated and heard as one case.

*Head notes by Mr. Justice MILLER.

J. N. Israel appeared and filed an answer for himself alone, in which he made no defense to the suit on the check, but set up as a defense to the suit on the note, that before the institution of the present suit in the Missouri court the plaintiff had commenced an action on the same note in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas, and had at the time of the plea filed, recovered a judgment against the defendant J. N. Israel, on said note, whereby he claimed that the note was merged in said judgment and no judgment could be rendered on it in this action. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the amount of the check The suit was dismissed by plaintiff before hearing as to C. W. Israel. [508]

The Laclede Bank in its response to the garnishee process served on it under the attachment, and in answer to interrogatories propounded to it by the plaintiff, admitted that there was, on the 24th day of October, 1885, standing on its books to the credit of the three several banking companies of which J. N. Israel was a partner certain sums of money. The attachment process was served on the Laclede Bank November 2, 1885, and the Bank in its answer says that on the 24th of October the said Israel, being wholly insolvent, made, executed and delivered a deed of general assignment in conformity with the laws of the State of Texas, where he resided, for the benefit of all his creditors, which assignment is set forth in the answer, and that the Bank had notice of this assignment immediately after it was made. It further answered that the said J. N. Israel individually, and as a member of the several banking houses before referred to; namely, C. W. Israel & Company, the Exchange Bank of Harold, and the Exchange Bank of Wichita Falls, was indebted to the Laclede Bank in an amount exceeding all the sums on deposit with that Bank at the date of the service of the attachment.

The plaintiff demurred to the answer of the defendant Israel, setting up the judgment recovered in the United States Court for the Northern District of Texas on the note; and he demurred also to the answer of the Laclede Bank as garnishee, and the case was submitted to the court on these demurrers. The court rendered a judgment overruling both demurrers, finding for the defendant Israel in the suit upon the note and rendering judgment against him in the suit on the check. It also discharged the Bank as garnishee.

The plaintiff brings this case here by writ of error, and the two questions presented are, first, as to the sufficiency of the answer of J. N. Israel setting up the judgment in the action on the same note in Texas.

While it is certainly true that the pendency of a suit in one court is not a defense, though it may sometimes be good in abatement, to another suit on the same cause of action in another court of concurrent jurisdiction, it may be considered as established that when a judgment is recovered against the defendant in one of those courts, if it is a full and complete judgment on the whole cause of action, it may be pleaded as a defense to the action in that court where it is pending and undecided. Neither court would be bound to take notice of the judgment in the other court judicially, but when the matter is [509] pleaded in due time and it is made to appear that a judgment on the same cause of action has been recovered and is in full force and effect, that judgment must be held to merge the evidence of the debt, whether that evidence be parol or written, in the judgment first recovered. Freem. Judg. § 221; Barnes v. Gibbs, 2 Vroom, 317; McGilvary v. Avery, 30 Vt. 538; Rogers v. Odell, 39 N. H. 452; Bank v. Wheeler, 28 Conn. 433; Eldred v. Bank, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 545 [21: 685]. The court below was right, therefore, in overruling the demurrer to the plea and rendering judgment for the defendant.

As regards the order discharging the garnishee, it seems to us that, without reference to the question of the validity of the assignment of Israel, the answer of the Bank sets up a sufficient defense in the fact of the insolvency of J. N. Israel and his indebtedness as partner in the various banking companies above mentioned to the Laclede Bank. The answer of the Bank states explicitly that at the time of the service of the summons in garnishment on it; namely, November 2, 1885, it had not, "nor has it since nor has it now, in its possession, custody or charge, any lands, tenements, goods, chattels, moneys, credits or effects belonging to the defendants in said cases or either of them. 2. At said date of garnishment it, the said Bank, was not indebted in anywise to said defendants or either of them, nor has it since become so indebted, nor is it now so indebted. 3. At said date of garnishment said Bank was not bound in any contract to pay said defendants, or either of them, any money not then due, nor has it since said date become so indebted."

The Bank then goes on to give a detail of its transactions with Israel and his various banks, in which it is shown that while there was in the Bank's hands certain moneys deposited by Israel and his several banking houses, Israel [510] was indebted to the Bank in various sums at the time of his failure, October 24, 1885, some of which had matured and others of which had not matured at the time of the service of the garnishee process. But, as Israel and all his banks were insolvent at the time of the service of the garnishee process, we are of opinion that the Bank had the right to appropriate any moneys in its hands to the security and payment of these obligations, whether due or not. If we are correct in this proposition, the answer of the Bank is sufficient.

As we understand the law concerning the condition of a garnishee in attachment, he has the same rights in defending himself against that process at the time of its service upon him that he would have had against the debtor in the suit for whose property he is called upon to account. And while it may be true that in a suit brought by Israel against the Bank it could in an ordinary action at law only make plea of set-off of so much of Israel's debt to the Bank as was then due, it could, by filing a bill in chancery in such case, alleging Israel's insolvency, and that, if it was compelled to pay its own debt to Israel, the debt which Israel owed it, but which was not due, would be lost, be relieved by a proper decree in equity; and, as a garnishee is only compelled to be responsible for that which, both in law and equity, ought to have gone to pay the principal defendant in the main suit, he can set up all the defenses in this proceeding which he would have in either a court of law or a court of equity. U. S. v. Vaughn, 3 Binn. 394; Shattuck v. Smith, 16 Vt. 132; Ex parte Stephens, 11 Ves. 24; Drake, Attachment, §§ 528, 521.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

PEOPLE OF THE TERRITORY OF UTAH.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 430–442.)

Criminal law—competence of jurors—judgment of the court—when conclusive—"statements in public journal" within Utah Statute—challenge for cause—when disallowance, no injury—evidence—opinion of physician as to direction from which blow was delivered, admissible—charge—reasonable doubt—final argument—reference to former trials.

* 1. Evidence, or what purports to be evidence, in a criminal case, printed in a newspaper, is "a statement in a public journal" within the meaning of the Act of Utah declaring that no person shall be disqualified as a juror by reason of his having formed or expressed an opinion upon the matter or cause to be submitted to him, "founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or common notoriety, provided it appear to the court, upon his declaration under oath or otherwise, that he can and will, notwithstanding such an opinion, act impartially and fairly upon the matters submitted to him."

2. The judgment of the court as to the competency of the juror upon his declaration under oath or otherwise, as above, is conclusive.

3. When a challenge by a defendant in a criminal action to a juror, for bias, actual or implied, is disallowed, and the jury is thereupon peremptorily challenged by the defendant, and excused, and an impartial and competent juror is obtained in his place, no injury is done to the defendant, if until the jury is completed he has other peremptory challenges which he can use.

4. The opinion of a physician, after making a post mortem examination of the deceased, who came to his death by a blow inflicted upon his head, as to the direction from which the blow was delivered, is admissible in evidence.

5. If the evidence produced in a criminal action be of such a convincing character that the jurors would unhesitatingly be governed by it in the weighty and important matters of life, they may be said to have no reasonable doubt respecting the guilt or innocence of the accused, notwithstanding the uncertainty which attends all human evidence. Therefore, a charge to the jury that if, after an impartial comparison and consideration of all the evidence, they can truthfully say that they have an abiding conviction of the defendant's guilt, such as they would be willing to act upon in the more weighty and important matters relating to their own affairs, they have no reasonable doubt, is not erroneous.

6. An allusion, in the final argument to the jury by the counsel for the prosecution, to the case as having been many times brought before the tribunals, is not a ground for reversing a judgment under the Statute of Utah, which declares that on a new trial the "former verdict cannot be used or referred to, either in evidence or argument."

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah. Affirmed.

* Head notes by Mr. Justice FIELD.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Ben. Sheeks and P. L. Williams, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. William A. Maury, Asst. Atty-Gen., for defendants in error.

[431] Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant below, the plaintiff in error here, Frederick Hopt, was indicted in the District Court of the Third Judicial District of Utah, in December, 1880, for the murder of John F. Turner on the third of the preceding July. He was four times convicted in that court, upon this indictment, of murder in the first degree. The judgment of death pronounced against him on each previous conviction was reversed by this court. The decisions are found in 104 U. S. 631 [26:873]; 110 U. S. 574 [28:262]; and 114 U. S. 488 [29:183]. The last conviction took place in September, 1885; judgment was passed in October following;
[432] and on appeal to the Supreme Court of the Territory it was affirmed in January, 1886, except as to the time of its execution; that was to be fixed by the district court, to which the cause was remanded for that purpose. To secure a reversal of this judgment the case is brought before us on a writ of error.

The errors assigned are: 1, the ruling of the trial court upon challenges to several jurors; 2, the admission in evidence of the opinion of a witness, as to the direction from which the blow was delivered which caused the death of the deceased; 3, the instruction to the jury as to the meaning of the words "reasonable doubt;" and 4, the reference on the argument by the district attorney, to previous trials of the case.

1. Four persons summoned as jurors were examined on their voir dire, and challenged by the defendant: one for actual bias, under section 241 of the Act of the Territory regulating proceedings in criminal cases, passed in 1878; and the other three for both actual and implied bias. Actual bias is defined by that Act to be "The existence of a state of mind, on the part of a juror, which leads to a just inference in reference to the case that he will not act with entire impartiality."

The juror Young, challenged as having that state of mind, that is, for actual bias, testified that he had heard of the case, but had never talked with anyone who pretended to know about it; that he had impressions as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, but could not say that he had ever formed any opinion on the subject, and did not remember that he had ever expressed any; that possibly his impressions were strong enough to create, from sympathy, some bias or prejudice, but he thought he could sit on the jury and be guided by the evidence, and try the case impartially as if he had never heard of it before. Upon this testimony, the court was of opinion that he was a competent juror; and accordingly the [433] challenge was disallowed. In this ruling we see no error. The juror was then peremptorily challenged by the defendant, and was excused.

That Act also provides, in section 242, that a challenge for implied bias may be taken for all or any of the following causes, and for no other:

1. Consanguinity or affinity within the fourth degree to the person alleged to be injured by the offense charged, or on whose complaint the prosecution was instituted, or to the defendant.

2. Standing in the relation of guardian and ward, attorney and client, master and servant, or landlord and tenant, or being a member of the family of the defendant, or of the person alleged to be injured by the offense charged, or on whose complaint the prosecution was instituted, or in his employment on wages.

3. Being the party adverse to the defendant in a civil action, or having complaint against or being accused by him in a criminal prosecution.

4. Having served on the grand jury which found the indictment, or on a coroner's jury which inquired into the death of a person whose death is the subject of the indictment.

5. Having served on a trial jury which has tried another person for the offense charged in the indictment.

6. Having been one of the jury formerly sworn to try the same indictment, and whose verdict was set aside, or which was discharged without a verdict, after the case was submitted to it.

7. Having served as a juror in a civil action brought against the defendant for the act charged as an offense.

8. Having formed or expressed an unqualified opinion or belief that the prisoner is guilty or not guilty of the offense charged.

9. If the offense charged be punishable with death, the entertaining of such conscientious opinions as would preclude his finding the defendant guilty; in which case he must neither be permitted nor compelled to serve as a juror.

The Act provides, in section 244, that, "In a challenge for implied bias, one or more of the causes stated in section 242 must be alleged." Laws, 1878, pp. 111, 112.

Another Act of the Territory, passed in March, 1884, declares that "No person shall be disqualified as a juror by reason of having formed or expressed an opinion upon the matter or cause to be submitted to such jury [juror], founded upon public rumor, statements in pub- [434] lic journals, or common notoriety; provided it appear to the court, upon his declaration, under oath or otherwise, that he can and will, notwithstanding such an opinion, act impartially and fairly upon the matters submitted to him. The challenge may be oral, but must be entered in the minutes of the court or of the phonographic reporter." Laws 1884, p. 124.

The juror Gabott, challenged for both actual and implied bias, testified on his direct examination, in substance, as follows: that he had heard of the case through the newspapers, and read what was represented to be the evidence; that he had talked about it since that time; that he did not think he had ever expressed an opinion on the case, but that he had formed a qualified opinion; that is, if the evidence were true, or the reports were true; that he had an opinion touching the guilt or innocence of the accused, which it would take evidence to remove; but that he thought he could go into the jury box and sit as if he had never heard of the case, and that what he had heard would not make the least difference. On his cross examination, he testified that he knew nothing about the case, except what he had read from time to time in the public press; that, if what he had heard turned out to be the facts in the case, he had an opinion, otherwise not; that is, his opinion was a qualified one; and that, according to his present state of mind, he could sit on the jury and determine the case without reference to anything he had heard; that he was not conscious of any bias or prejudice that might prevent him from dealing with the defendant impartially; and that he thought he could try the case according to the law and the evidence given in court. On his re-examination he further stated that he would be guided by the evidence altogether, without being influenced by any opinion he might then have, or may have previously formed.

The court held that the juror was competent. By the express terms of the Statute of 1884 he could not be disqualified as a juror for an opinion formed or expressed upon statements in [435] public journals, if it appeared to the court, upon his declaration under oath or otherwise, that he could and would, notwithstanding such an opinion, act impartially and fairly upon the matters submitted to him. We think that evidence, or what purports to be evidence, printed in a newspaper is a "statement in a public journal" within the meaning of the statute; and that the judgment of the court upon the competency of the juror in such cases is conclusive.

The juror Winchester, who was also challenged for actual and implied bias, testified that he had heard of the case through the papers; that he had heard it talked of some years ago; that he believed he had heard what purported to be the evidence as given in the newspapers on previous trials, and believed he had formed and expressed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, and though it was an unqualified opinion, it was not a fixed or settled one; that at the time he read the papers, he had formed such an opinion as would have required testimony to remove it from his mind, and if his memory was refreshed as to the testimony there would probably be a renewal of the opinion he had formed; that he had not talked with anyone, and could hardly tell the circumstances now; that he believed that his mind was free from any impression, and that he could sit on the jury and try the case precisely as if he had never heard of it or read of any of the facts. To inquiries of the court, the juror repeated, in substance, what he had previously said, that he thought he could sit in the jury box and try the case according to the evidence without reference to any opinion he may then or theretofore have formed; that he could try defendant impartially, according to the evidence, and that he would do so. The court thereupon held that he was competent, and the challenge was disallowed. This ruling disposed of the challenge, and the judgment of the court, for the reasons stated, was conclusive under the Statute of March, 1884. The defendant thereupon peremptorily challenged the juror, and he was excused.

The fourth juror, Harker, who was challenged for actual and implied bias, by the defendant, was examined on his voir dire, but 436] after hearing his testimony the challenge was disallowed; and thereupon the district attorney peremptorily challenged him, and he was excused.

The challenges for implied bias fell, as there was no specification of the grounds for such challenges, as required by section 242 of the Act of 1878.

In capital cases in Utah, the Government and the accused are each allowed fifteen peremptory challenges. Laws of Utah, 1884, chap. 48, § 24. Notwithstanding the peremptory challenges made by the defendant to two of the jurors, he had several such challenges which had not been used when the jury was completed. If, therefore, the ruling of the court in disallowing the challenges to the two for bias, actual or implied, was erroneous, no injury to the defendant followed. Those jurors were not on the jury, and impartial and competent jurors were obtained in their place, to whom no objection was made. Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 68 [ante, 578]; Mimms v. State, 16 Ohio St. 221; Erwin v. State, 29 Ohio St. 186. It is therefore only the ruling on the challenge to the juror Gabott which can properly be assigned as error here; and, for the reasons stated, that ruling was in our judgment correct.

2. The deceased came to his death from a blow inflicted upon the left side of his head, which crushed his skull. A post mortem examination of the body was made by a physician, who was allowed, against the objection of the defendant, to give his opinion as to the direction from which the blow was delivered, after he had stated that his examination of the body had enabled him to form an intelligent opinion upon that point. The ground of the objection was that the direction in which the blow was delivered was not a matter for the opinion of an expert, but one which should be left to the jury. The court overruled the objection and the defendant excepted. The witness stated, as his opinion, that the blow was delivered from behind and above the head of the person struck, and from the left toward the right. This testimony was supposed to have some bearing upon the case when considered in connection with the fact that the accused was a left-handed man. On the following morning, counsel on behalf of the prosecution moved that this evidence [437] should be stricken from the record, and the jury be instructed to disregard it. The counsel for the defendant did not object to that, but he wished the record to show that the application was made on the following morning. The court thereupon instructed the jury that the evidence was stricken out, and that they were not to consider it at all. The defendant now contends that it was error to admit the evidence, and that the error was not cured by striking it out and the instruction to the jury. To this the answer is: 1, that the evidence was admissible; and 2, that, if not admissible, the error was cured by the evidence being stricken out with the accompanying instruction.

The opinions of witnesses are constantly taken as to the result of their observations on a great variety of subjects. All that is required in such cases is that the witnesses should be able to properly make the observations, the result of which they give; and the confidence bestowed on their conclusions will depend upon the extent and completeness of their examination, and the ability with which it is made. The court below, after observing that every person is competent to express an opinion on a question of identity, as applied to persons in his family or to handwriting, and to give his judgment in regard to the size, color and weight of objects, and to make an estimate as to time and distance, cited a great number of cases illustrative of this doctrine. We quote a passage containing them: "He may state his opinion," says the court, "with regard to sounds, their character, from what they proceed, and the direction from which they seem to come. State v. Shinborn, 46 N. H. 497; Commonwealth v. Pope, 103 Mass. 440; Commonwealth v. Dorsey, 103 Mass. 412. Nonexperts have been allowed to testify whether certain hairs were human (Commonwealth v. Dorsey); that one person appeared to be sincerely attached to another (McKee v. Nelson, 4 Cow. 355); as to whether another was intoxicated (People v. Eastwood, 14 N. Y. 562); as to whether a person's conduct was insulting (Raisler v. Springer, 38 Ala. 703); as to resemblance of foot tracks (Hotchkiss v. Germania Ins. Co. 5 Hun, 90); as to value of property, when competent (Brown v. Hoburger, 52 Barb. 15; Bank v. Mudgett, 44 N. Y. 514; Bedell v. L. I. R. R. Co. 44 N. Y. 367; Swan v. Middlesex Co. 101 Mass. 173; Snyder v. Western U. R. R. Co. 25 Wis. 60; Brackett v. Edgerton, 14 Minn. 174); as to market value of cattle, derived from newspapers (Cleveland, etc. R. R. Co. v. Perkins, 17 Mich. 296); whether there was hard pan in an excavation (Currier v. Boston & M. R. R. 34 N. H. 498); whether one acted as if she felt sad (Culver v. Dwight, 6 Gray, 444); as to rate of speed of a railroad train on a certain occasion (Detroit, etc. v. Von Steinberg, 17 Mich. 99); as to whether noisome odors render a dwelling uncomfortable (Kearney v. Farrell, 28 Conn. 317); whether the witness noticed any change in the intelligence or understanding, or any want of coherence in the remark of another (Barker v. Comins, 110 Mass. 477: Nash v. Hunt, 116 Mass. 237)."

Upon the same principle, the testimony of the physician as to the direction from which the blow was delivered was admissible. It was a conclusion of fact which he would naturally draw from the examination of the wound. It was not expert testimony in the strict sense of the term, but a statement of a conclusion of fact, such as men who use their senses constantly draw from what they see and hear in the daily concerns of life. But, independently of this consideration, as to the admissibility of the evidence, if it was erroneously admitted, its subsequent withdrawal from the case, with the accompanying instruction, cured the error. It is true, in some instances there may be such strong impressions made upon the minds of a jury by illegal and improper testimony that its subsequent withdrawal will not remove the effect caused by its admission; and in that case the original objection may avail on appeal or writ of error. But such instances are exceptional. The trial of a case is not to be suspended, the jury discharged, a new one summoned, and the evidence retaken, when an error in the admission of testimony can be corrected by its withdrawal with proper instructions from the court to disregard it. We think the present case one of that kind. State v. May, 4 Dev. Law, 330; Goodnow v. Hill, 125 Mass. 589; Smith v. Whitman, 6 Allen, 562; Hawes v. Gustin, 2 Allen, 406; Dillin v. People, 8 Mich. 369; Specht v. Howard, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 564 [21 : 348].

3. The instruction to the jury, which is the subject of exception, relates to the meaning of the words "reasonable doubt," which should control them in their decision. The following is that portion which bears upon this subject:

"The court charges you that the law presumes the defendant innocent until proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt; that if you can reconcile the evidence before you upon any reasonable hypothesis consistent with the defendant's innocence, you should do so, and in that case find him not guilty. You are further instructed that you cannot find the defendant guilty, unless from all the evidence you believe him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

"The court further charges you that a reasonable doubt is a doubt based on reason, and which is reasonable in view of all the evidence. And if, after an impartial comparison and consideration of all the evidence, you can candidly say that you are not satisfied of the defendant's guilt, you have a reasonable doubt; but if, after such impartial comparison and consideration of all the evidence, you can truthfully say that you have an abiding conviction of the defendant's guilt, such as you would be willing to act upon in the more weighty and important matters relating to your own affairs, you have no reasonable doubt."

The word "abiding" here has the signification of settled and fixed, a conviction which may follow a careful examination and comparison of the whole evidence. It is difficult to conceive what amount of conviction would leave the mind of a juror free from a reasonable doubt, if it be not one which is so settled and fixed as to control his action in the more weighty and important matters relating to his own affairs. Out of the domain of the exact sciences and actual observation there is no absolute certainty. The guilt of the accused, in the majority of criminal cases, must necessarily be deduced from a variety of circumstances leading to proof of the fact. Persons of speculative minds may in almost every such case suggest possibilities of the truth being different from that established by the most convincing proof. The jurors are not to be led away by speculative notions as to such possibilities.

In Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cush. 320, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts stated in its charge that it was not sufficient to establish a probability, though a strong one arising from the doctrine of chances, that the fact charged against the prisoner was more likely to be true than the contrary, and said: "The evidence must establish the truth of the fact to a reasonable and moral certainty, a certainty that convinces and directs the understanding, and satisfies the reason and judgment of those who are bound to act conscientiously upon it. This we take to be proof beyond reasonable doubt."

The difficulty with this instruction is that the words "to a reasonable and moral certainty" add nothing to the words "beyond a reasonable doubt;" one may require explanation as much as the other. In Commonwealth v. Costley, 118 Mass. 24, the same court held that, as applied to a judicial trial for crime, the two phrases were synonymous and equivalent, and that each signified such proof as would satisfy the judgment and consciences of the jury that the crime charged had been committed by the defendant, and so satisfy them as to leave no other reasonable conclusion possible. It was there also said that an instruction to the jury that they should be satisfied of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt had often been held sufficient, without further explanation. In many cases it may undoubtedly be sufficient. It is simple, and as a rule to guide the jury is as intelligible to them generally as any which could be stated, with respect to the conviction they should have of the defendant's guilt to justify a verdict against him. But in many instances, especially where the case is at all complicated, some explanation or illustration of the rule may aid in its full and just comprehension. As a matter of fact, it has been the general practice in this country of courts holding criminal trials to give such explanation or illustration. The rule [441] may be and often is rendered obscure by attempts at definition, which serve to create doubts instead of removing them. But an illustration like the one given in this case, by reference to the conviction upon which the jurors would act in the weighty and important concerns of life, would be likely to aid them to a right conclusion, when an attempted definition might fail. If the evidence produced be of such a convincing character that they would unhesitatingly be governed by it in such weighty and important matters, they may be said to have no reasonable doubt respecting the guilt or innocence of the accused, notwithstanding the uncertainty that attends all human evidence. The instruction in the case before us is as just a guide to practical men as can well be given; and if it were open to criticism it could not have misled the jury, when considered in connection with the further charge, that if they could reconcile the evidence with any reasonable hypothesis consistent with the defendant's innocence, they should do so, and in that case find him not guilty. The evidence must satisfy the judgment of the jurors as to the guilt of the defendant, so as to exclude any other reasonable conclusion.

The instruction is not materially different from that given by Lord Tenterden, as repeated and adopted by Chief Baron Pollock, in Rex v. Muller. "I have heard," said the Chief Baron, addressing the jury, "the late Lord Tenterden frequently lay down a rule which I will pronounce to you in his own language: 'It is not necessary that you should have a certainty which does not belong to any human transaction whatever. It is only necessary that you should have that certainty with which you should transact your own most important concerns in life.' No doubt the question before you to-day—involving as it does the life of the prisoner at the bar—must be deemed to be of the highest importance; but you are only required to have that degree of certainty with which you decide upon and conclude your own most important transactions in life. To require more would be really to prevent the repression of crime, which it is the object of criminal courts to effect." 4 Fost. & Fin. 888–9, note. We are satisfied that the defendant was in no way prejudiced by the instructions of the court.

4. On the final argument to the jury, the [442] counsel for the prosecution alluded to the case as the most remarkable one ever tried in the Territory, and to "the many times it had been brought before the tribunals." To this latter remark exception was taken. Thereupon the remark was withdrawn by the counsel, and the court said to the jury that the case was to be tried on the evidence, and that they were not to consider it with respect to any previous trial, but only on the evidence given on this trial. The counsel for the defendant now contends that this allusion was in contravention of that section of the Act of the Territory regulating proceedings in criminal cases, which declares that "The granting of a new trial places the parties in the same position as if no trial had been had," and that "all the testimony must be produced anew, and the former verdict cannot be used or referred to either in evidence or in argument." Laws of Utah 1878, p. 126, § 317. The object of this law was to prevent the accused from being prejudiced by reference to any former conviction on the same indictment. There was, in fact, no reference to any verdict on a previous trial, but merely a mention of the times the case had been before the courts, so as to magnify its importance. If allusions to previous trials, such as were here made, were to vitiate a subsequent trial, a new element of uncertainty would be introduced into the administration of justice in criminal cases. We do not see that the defendant was in any way prejudiced by such reference. The fact that previous trials had proved unavailing may perhaps have induced greater care and caution on the part of the jury in the consideration of the case.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

GEORGE S. GRIER, Appt. [412]

v.

JOHN F. WILT.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 412–420.)

Construction of clause of letters patent—former patent as evidence.

1. Upon a bill for infringement, patents not set up in the answer may be introduced in evidence, to show the state of the art and to aid in the construction of the plaintiff's claim, although not to invalidate it for want of novelty.

2. The fourth claim of letters patent No. 190368, for an improvement in automatic fruit driers, must be limited to the mechanism described and shown. Said claim is not infringed by an apparatus without a suspending device, and in which each tray can be lifted and is supported independently.

Submitted Jan. 24, 1887. Decided March 7, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Delaware. Reported below, 5 Fed. Rep. 450. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. F. O. McCleary, for appellant:

Claims must be construed in view of the state of the art at the date of the invention.

Washing Machine Co. v. Tool Co. 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 342 (22: 303); Pitts v. Wemple, 1 Biss. 87.

A patentee's invention cannot be given a broad construction so as to cover later inventions, when it appears from the state of the art that there was no opportunity for a great original discovery; and the claim is properly limited to the specific improvement.

Root v. Lamb, 7 Fed. Rep. 222. See also Jones v. Barker, 11 Fed. Rep. 597; Washburn & Moen Mfg. Co. v. Haish, 10 Biss. 65.

An equivalent is such an element or ingredient as will perform the same function as one described in the patent, and which was well known at the date of the patent as a proper substitute for the one described in the patent.

Storrs v. Howe, 4 Cliff. 388; Smith v. Downing, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 64; Welling v. Rubber Harness Trimming Co. 7 O. G. 606; Webster v. New Brunswick Carpet Co. 5 O. G. 522; Gill v. Wells, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 1 (22: 699); Fuller v. Yentzer, 94 U. S. 299 (24: 107); Stimpson v. Baltimore & S. R. R. Co. 51 U. S. 10 How. 329 (13: 441); Schmidt v. Freese, 12 Fed. Rep. 563.

The so-called "doctrine of equivalents" is based upon the equitable theory that a patentee should be guarded against mere colorable evasions of his claims and trifling mechanical variations in the details of his devices. It was never intended as a bar to the progress of invention; and the patentee of an improvement on a prior invention cannot invoke the doctrine of equivalents to suppress other inventions which are not mere colorable evasions of the first.

Burden v. Corning, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 477; Seymour v. Osborne, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 555.

Where a patentee is not a pioneer in his line, but simply an improver, he cannot broadly invoke the doctrine of equivalents to cover devices not specifically claimed by him.

Tobey Furniture Co. v. Colby, 34 O. G. 1276.

Messrs. Samuel A. Duncan and Leonard E. Curtis, for appellee.

413] Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Delaware, by John F. Wilt against George S. Grier, for the infringement of letters patent No. 190868, granted to Asa Quincy Reynolds, May 1, 1877, for an "improvement in automatic fruit driers." The specification, drawings and claims of the patent are as follows:

"Figure 1 is a partial section and elevation of my improved fruit drier, showing the same as being located over an ordinary stove, and illustrating a simple means of elevating the machine. Fig. 2 is a similar view, showing the drier as located over a large furnace, as in the most extensive dry houses. Fig. 3 is a perspective view, illustrating the improved drier in a position removed from over an ordinary cooking stove. Fig. 4 is a perspective view of a fragment of a square tray or section, showing more plainly the metallic lining and the sockets and pins, which may be conveniently used in this form of tray. Fig. 5 is a similar view of a fragment of a round tray or section, showing also the tin or metallic lining. Like letters of reference in all the figures indicate corresponding parts.

The object of my invention is to simplify the construction of the fruit driers in common use, both for domestic and factory purposes, reducing the cost, increasing the efficiency, and rendering them easier to be manipulated, and at the same time fire proof, and capable of being enlarged or contracted at the pleasure of the operator; to accomplish all of which it (the invention) consists in certain details of construction and combination of parts, as will be hereinafter fully described, and then pointed out in the claims.

In Fig. 1 N is an ordinary stove or heating drum, over which is located the drier, consisting of a number of trays so constructed as that any one will receive a similar one above and also fit over a similar one below. For the lighter forms of driers I propose to make these trays of the ordinary sieves, or build them in the same manner, with perhaps two or more braces beneath the foraminated bottom, to give it sufficient [416] strength to support the weight of fruit. K is the main body of the tray, having a surrounding hoop, L. The several trays being of one size (save the uppermost, to be hereinafter described), it will be observed that each one will form a section of the wall of the drier, no matter what its position, and that this wall may be increased in height as much as desired or found necessary.

A is a crane and B a rope or chain running [417] over it and controlled by the windlass O. From the cross bars C the ropes or chains G depend, and these are made to suspend the drier through the medium of the handles H H, etc., upon each tray. In order to prevent the drier from tipping when elevated, three or more handles should be employed in connection with a corresponding number of chains or ropes, G

At M is shown an iron ring, supported slightly above the top of the stove N, and upon which the lower tray rests. The drier is built up as follows: Fruit having been suitably disposed in a tray, the hooks upon the lower ends of the ropes G are placed under two or more of the handles H H, on the lowermost tray of the drier already over the stove, and the whole is elevated, by means of the windlass O, a trifle more than the depth of one tray. The fresh tray is then placed upon the ring M, and those above lowered upon it, being so guided by the hands that the hoop of the one to which the ropes are attached will fit over the top of the one placed thereunder. In this way the drier may be built as high as desired by the successive introduction of trays below. The swinging crane and windlass combined is regarded as the simplest means likely to be employed for elevating the drier.

As the drying progresses and the trays are elevated, the fruit therein becomes more and more compact or shriveled up, leaving a comparatively free passage for the heated air through the body of the drier, in consequence of which very much of said air would pass off without accomplishing the work intended; and, the partially cured fruit occupying considerably less space than the fresh, it is desirable that one or more smaller sized trays be provided for its reception. Upon the top of the uppermost of the main series of trays I place a flange, F, having a circular opening, with upwardly projecting collar, over which flange is located the the tray E, made in all respects similar to those below save as to its size. This flange serves to contract the flue formed by the series of trays below, and if the partially dried fruit be placed in the tray E, it will partially retard the flow of the air, and thus utilize so much thereof as would otherwise be wasted in the completion of the drying process. Above the flange F any number of small trays, E, may be placed; being matched one upon the other in a manner similar to those below.

Within each tray I propose to place a metallic lining, t t (preferably of bright tin), the object of which is to protect the wood of the trays from heat and prevent moisture from penetrating the same.

In Fig. 2 the series of trays forming the dry house is shown as located over a large furnace placed below the flooring Q. This form is intended for the larger sizes of dry houses, and is not different in principle or construction from that already described, except in that no hoops are illustrated as being placed upon the trays. These may be connected or matched with each other by any desirable and appropriate means.

It may be found advantageous to construct the trays in other forms than circular, as indicated in Fig. 4, wherein the pin p and socket P are secured at suitable points upon the outside, and arranged to engage with similar sockets and pins upon the trays above and below, after the manner adopted in 'molders' flasks and the like.

With the swinging crane the drier may be removed from over the stove, as shown at Fig. 3, when the ordinary cooking operations may be performed and the drier returned at pleasure; or, if desirable, the drier may be elevated above the stove, leaving sufficient space between the two for the cooking utensils, and thus the drying and cooking processes be conducted simultaneously.

At D, Figs. 1 and 2, is a swivel connection by means of which the series of trays may be revolved, and thus the drying equalized throughout.

As fast as the fruit is thoroughly cured the trays are removed from the top, and may then be inserted at bottom, after having been charged with a fresh supply.

In all fruit driers it is observed that the material is liable to contract or shrivel in such a manner as to open passages for the heated air, in consequence of which the fruit in the trays is unequally dried, the air passing off through these passages without coming in contact with the surrounding fruit. This difficulty has given rise to numerous inventions calculated to obviate it, among the most noticeable of which are revolving trays and revolving covers or shields for said trays. These are found in practice expensive to build, difficult to handle and move, and liable to get out of order; and it is a very important feature of the present invention to do away with all these objections. This I accomplish by the introduction of a fan wheel calculated to retard the ascending currents of heated air, and to distribute them uniformly across the whole area of the fruit-containing tray. In Fig. 1, the wheel W, composed of a series of inclined blades, is pivoted between the two bars g g, which are attached to the metallic lining i, before alluded to. It is sufficiently elevated above the foraminated bottom I as not to interfere with the placing of fruit upon said [420] bottom, if desired. The inclined blades cause the wheel to be rapidly revolved by the ascending currents of air, and these, meeting with a resistance, are compelled to pass by the blades in a uniform manner, said blades being so cut or separated as that they shall permit the passage of an equal quantity of air at every point below the bottom of the tray placed next above. Any number of these fans may be placed in the series of trays, as is apparent from the construction above described. They are automatically operated, not liable to get out of repair, and they are found to be very efficient for the purposes intended. If the currents of air be very rapid and strong the revolutions of the wheels are correspondingly rapid, and thus, under all circumstances, the currents are automatically regulated and always evenly distributed. For the larger sized driers the wheel W may advantageously be placed immediately over the funnel mouth S, conducting the heated air from the furnace below, as in Fig. 2. It may be pivoted in any desirable way, and other fans may be distributed throughout the series of trays. When the trays are made in square form one fan, occupying as much space therein as possible, will be found to work satisfactorily. If the trays be made oblong, then two fans might be introduced, the better to occupy the necessary space. They should, of course, be made to work upon the same level. These wheels have now come to be denominated 'flutter wheels,' and I desire to be understood as not limiting my invention to any particular number to be employed, to any specified location of said wheels in the drier, or to any particular method of suspending the same, so long as they are made to revolve independently of the trays, and to accomplish the results intended.

Having thus fully described my invention, what I claim as new and desire to secure by letters patent is:

1. In combination with a series of fruit-drying trays, located one above the other, a second or supplementary series smaller than the first, and adapted to operate as and for the purposes explained.

2. The plate F, adapted to cover the flue formed by the lower series of trays, and to receive and hold the upper series, the whole being arranged and combined substantially as set [421] forth.

3. In combination with a fruit-drying tray, a fan wheel operated by the ascending currents of heated air, movable independently of said tray, and adapted to equalize the currents of air, in the manner set forth.

4. In combination with a fruit drier, the outer wall of which is made up of the frames of the several trays, as explained, a suspending device, operating substantially as described, and supporting said drier from a point in or on the lowermost tray thereof, for the objects named.

5. In combination with a fruit drier adapted to be elevated, in the manner described, and suspended above a stove or furnace, a suspending device, substantially as shown, provided with a swivel connection, as and for the purposes set forth."

Infringement of the fourth claim only is alleged, the defendant's apparatus being that described in letters patent No. 221056, granted to him October 28, 1879, for an "improvement in fruit driers." The description and drawings of that apparatus, in the specification of that patent, are as follows:

"The nature of my invention consists in the construction and arrangement of a fruit evaporator, as will be hereinafter more fully set forth. In order to enable others skilled in the art to which my invention appertains to make and use the same, I will now proceed to describe its construction and operation, referring to the annexed drawings, in which Figure 1 is a side elevation of my improved fruit evaporator. Fig. 2 is a sectional view of the same. Fig. 3 shows the bottom of the drier. Fig. 4 is a vertical section of the roof. Fig. 5 shows one of the boxes with removable trays.

A represents a bed frame, of suitable dimensions, provided with four upright posts, B B, between which the boxes are placed for forming the walls of the evaporator and holding the trays. In the bottom frame, A, are two straight bars, C C, crossing each other at right angles, in the center, and dividing the bottom of the evaporator into four equal divisions. In each division is arranged a series of inclined slats, a a, and the four series of said slats are inclined outward in the four different directions, whereby, [424] when the evaporator is set over the furnace, the current of hot air, as it ascends, is directed to the sides of the machine. D D represent the boxes which go to form the walls of the evaporator, and which are open at the top and bottom. Each box contains one or more removable trays, b, which rest upon cleats d on the inside of the box. The upper edges of the side bars of each box D are made V shaped, while in their under edges are made corresponding grooves, so that the boxes will fit close together and can easily be moved back and forth. The outer sides of these side bars of the boxes have two or more horizontal notches, x x, at each end, into which take pivoted pawls h h. These pawls are pivoted to vertically movable posts or uprights I I, which are connected to the stationary corner posts B B by means of rods or bars, m, attached to each post I, and passing vertically through eyes i in a groove on the stationary post B. Each movable upright I is provided with a rack bar, n, and the two rack bars on the same side of the evaporator are operated by pinions, p, on a horizontal shaft, H. The two shafts H H, on opposite sides of the evaporator, are operated by worms J J on a shaft, K, at one end of the evaporator, said worms taking into gear wheels L L on the ends of the shafts H H. The shaft K is provided with hand wheels M M for turning the same.

In operation, the first box, having its tray or trays filled with fruit, is pushed in over the heater or furnace, and after being there, say about ten minutes, more or less, as desired, it is raised up by the gearing and the pawls h, attached to the movable uprights I, and another or second box similarly filled with fruit pushed in under the first, and the first lowered down on the second, and so on until twenty or more boxes with trays have been arranged to form the evaporator. It will be noticed that with my mechanism I lift each box independently of the others, so that I can lift a portion above, leaving the boxes of the lower part stationary, by disengaging the pawls below. This enables the operator to examine any one or more of the boxes by sliding them out while those above are suspended.

N represents the cover with central stack O. This cover is put on the first box to cause a draft, and it is raised by resting on the top or [425] first box, so that the evaporator is complete at all times, whether one or twenty, or more boxes are inserted.

In the cover N is a bottom, P, which does not extend to the outer edges of the cover, thereby causing the vapor and heated air to be drawn from the middle to the sides to dry evenly; and it also aids in carrying off the fumes of the sulphur, when such is used to bleach the fruit.

I am aware that a fruit evaporator has been made with upright sliding bars or posts provided with spring pawls, which pass under the trays to support the same, but in such case the pawls are inaccessible, and none of them can be thrown out of the way; whereas in my case the operator can easily disengage any one or more pawls on each post, so as to lift any one or more boxes, or all the boxes together, as may be desired."

The case was brought to a hearing on pleadings and proofs, the main issue raised by the answer, and contested, being that of infringement. The circuit court entered a decree in favor of the plaintiff, awarding a perpetual injunction and a reference as to profits and damages, in pursuance of which a final decree was rendered against the defendant for $1,918.97, with interest and costs, from which he has appealed.

The circuit court, in its decision, Wilt v. Grier, 5 Fed. Rep. 450, said: "This patent" (the plaintiff's) "is for an improvement in automatic fruit driers, and its peculiarity and novelty consist in mechanical arrangements and devices by which a stack of trays, fitting into each other, the outer edges of which constitute the outer side of the stack of trays or drying house, are moved upwards, and suspended by attachments to the lower tray, in order that a fresh tray of fruit can be inserted at the bottom, and the process repeated at pleasure, thus building up the drying house or stack from the bottom. It is not contended that the patentee is the inventor of the movable trays, the outer walls of which constitute the drying-house. It is admitted that the existence of such trays, for such purpose, is old in the art; but the complainant contends that the patentee is the originator of an idea, which is a novel and useful one, of raising the stack of trays from a point on the lowermost tray of the stack, thus [426] making an opening for the insertion of a fresh tray containing fruit, and in this manner building the stack up from the bottom instead of from the top; * * * the object and value of the patent consisting, not in the use of any special machinery for elevating the stack for the purposes intended, but the elevation and opening of the said stack at the bottom, for those purposes, by any machinery best calculated to attain that end. * * * The court is therefore of the opinion that any attempt by defendant, or any other person, to elevate the stack of trays so constructed as aforesaid, and from a point at or on the lowermost tray thereof, so as to insert new trays at the bottom successively, by any mechanism whatever, adapted to accomplish that purpose, and which is a mechanical equivalent to the means employed by the complainant is an infringement of his patent. * * *

"The two machines, as will be manifest upon reference to the specifications and drawings in the respective patents, are alike in principle, having a stack in each case composed of sections of trays, fitting upon and into each other, the outer wall of which makes up and forms the exterior of said stack or drying house; and they are also alike in their purpose and capacity of being moved upward from a point in or on the lowermost tray, and of being suspended in that position, so as to admit the insertion of fresh trays in succession. They are unlike in their respective appliances and devices by which these objects are accomplished, and also in the facility by which intermediate trays between the top and bottom can be removed. The devices by which the trays in the complainant's patent are elevated in the manner described, for the purposes mentioned, are the cord and pulley passing over an upright crane, regulated by a windlass, or wheel and axle, with its ratchet and pawls, * * * the point of suspension * * * being directly over the center of the stack; and from the ends of the cross bars to which the rope passing through the pulley is attached, depend ropes or chains, which are attached by hooks to handles upon the lowermost tray to be removed, thus contributing [427] both a lifting and suspending device. * * * The machine embodying the defendant's invention * * * exhibits the following means for effecting the elevation of the stack of trays, and their suspension, for the purpose of allowing new trays to be inserted at the bottom; to wit, four movable uprights, each having a series of pivoted pawls, and arranged to slide in four stationary posts, secured in a frame, in combination with a series of boxes, or trays, having notches in their sides, whereby the boxes may be lifted independently of each other, or all together. The power is applied through the medium of two worms, situated at each end of a drum, or shaft, extending along the side of, and at least the width of the stack to be lifted. These worms engage into appropriate cog wheels, affixed to two other drums, or shafts, running at right angles to the first named shaft, on opposite sides of the stack, and extend horizontally the length of the same. Upon each of these last mentioned shafts are geared, at the ends of the same, small cog wheels, which, in turn, gear into vertical rack bars on the four sliding posts of the machine. The power is applied by means of a crank at the end of the first named drum or shaft.

"Now, here is undoubtedly a contrivance and device by which the novel and useful invention, first patented in the Reynolds patent, * * * of elevating the stack of trays from a point in or on the lowermost tray thereof, so as to permit the insertion of a fresh tray at the bottom, is accomplished. It matters not whether this device has the capacity of lifting the upper trays in the series, so as to open the same for inspection or for any other purposes. So long as it accomplishes the purpose, or possesses the capacity, of moving up the whole series of trays from a point on the lowermost tray of the same, so as to permit the introduction of a fresh tray, it is, in that respect, an infringement of the complainant's patent; nor is this conclusion altered because of any supposed advantages gained by the greater facility afforded by the Grier patent in opening the stack at any point above the lowermost tray, for purposes of inspection, or otherwise. * * * The court, upon the best consideration it can give to this subject, has come to the conclusion that the defendant in this cause has used, in the ele-[428] vation and suspension of the stack of trays in this drier, mechanical appliances and contrivances which, while they differ somewhat in form from those used by the complainant, are mechanical substitutes and equivalents for the same; and in the use of the same for the accomplishment of the same results as those produced by the complainant's invention, the defendant has infringed upon the exclusive rights secured to the complainant."

The specification of the plaintiff's patent states that the invention "consists in certain details of construction and combinations of parts." The existence in a fruit drier of movable trays, the outer walls of which constitute the drying house, being old, the subject of the fourth claim is the arrangement, in a fruit drier with such trays, of a suspending device connected with the drier in or on the lowermost tray, so as to raise that tray, with all the trays above it, and allow the insertion, underneath all, of a fresh tray, and then lower the trays above it, and couple the suspending device again to the lowermost tray and so on. This is the effect or result of the mode of operation of the devices. The claim, however, is not for a process, but is only for mechanism. The decision of the circuit court seems to be based on the view, that the claim covers all methods of raising the lowermost tray with those above it, if opportunity is given to insert a fresh tray underneath; and that, while the appliances and devices of the plaintiff and defendant are unlike each other, the defendant infringes because he attains the same result, of inserting a fresh tray underneath, while the trays before inserted are moved up and held up by a force imparted to the lowermost one of them. The decision describes the invention as consisting in "elevating the stack of trays from a point in or on the lowermost tray thereof, so as to permit the insertion of a fresh tray at the bottom;" and it, in effect, regards all mechanism for causing such elevation in such manner as a mechanical equivalent for the patented mechanism, because the result is to allow a fresh tray to be inserted underneath. [429]
And this is the view urged here by the appellee.

The defendant introduced in evidence three United States patents—one to Adam Snyder, No. 48738, July 11, 1865, for a "fruit drier;" one to Joseph B. Okey and Ferdinand A. Lehr,

No. 106289, October 11, 1870, for an "improvement in fruit driers;" and one to Joel Orlando Button, No. 155286, September 22, 1874, for an "improvement in fruit driers." Their introduction was objected to by the plaintiff, because they were not set up in the answer. But they were receivable in evidence to show the state of the art, and to aid in the construction of the plaintiff's claim, though not to invalidate that claim on the ground of want of novelty, when properly construed. Vance v. Campbell, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 427, 430 [17: 168, 172]; Railroad Co. v. Dubois, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 47, 65 [20: 265, 269]; Brown v. Piper, 91 U. S. 37, 41 [23: 200, 201]; Eachus v. Broomall, 115 U. S. 429, 434 [29: 419, 421].

The Snyder patent and the Okey and Lehr patent show, each of them, in a fruit drier, a series of trays, arranged one above another so that the frames of the trays form the wall of the drier. The Button patent shows a fruit drier, within which is a movable frame, which carries racks that rest upon each other. The racks are inserted through a door immediately above the frame, one by one, and each one is separately elevated on the frame by cam levers till it is held by spring catches, which move back while a rack is being elevated, and as soon as it passes spring out and support it, while the frame is being lowered for another rack. Each rack goes up with the frame, and, having been inserted at the extreme bottom, it carries up the racks above it, when it reaches them, and so on until they can be successively taken out at the top. The frames of the trays, which thus rest on each other, constitute, in a measure and to a degree, the walls of a chamber in which the drying takes place.

Movable trays, the outer walls of which constituted the drying chambers, being old, and apparatus having existed before to raise a tray or rack, and a column of racks above it and insert a fresh one at the bottom, and the two having been used in connection, the fourth claim of the plaintiff's patent must be limited to the mechanism described and shown. The circuit court made no reference to the Button patent.

[430] The plaintiff's patent describes and claims "a suspending device, operating substantially as described." The defendant has no such suspending device. The plaintiff has a crane, with suspended ropes, and his lowermost tray, while being raised, necessarily carries on it the weight of all the trays and fruit above it. In the defendant's apparatus each tray can be lifted independently of the others, and each tray is supported independently, so that the weight of the series of trays, and of the fruit on them, need not rest entirely on the lowermost tray. This result being different from that in the plaintiff's device, the mechanism is different and is not an equivalent of that of the plaintiff, any more than the plaintiff's is the equivalent of Button's. The fourth claim of the patent, if valid, cannot be construed so as to cover the defendant's apparatus.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to that Court, with a direction to dismiss the bill of complaint, with costs.

H. C. SPEIDEL ET AL., Exrs. etc., of ELIAS SPEIDEL, Deceased, Appts.,
v.
JACOB HENRICI ET AL., Trustees of HARMONY SOCIETY OF BEAVER COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 377-390.)

Trusts—limitation of actions—bill by former member of Harmony Society—limitation of action in equity.

1. Length of time is no bar to a trust clearly established, and express trusts are not within the Statute of Limitations; but time begins to run against a trust as soon as it is openly disavowed by the trustee, insisting upon an adverse right and interest which is clearly and unequivocally made known to the cestui que trust.

2. In case of an implied or constructive trust, unless there has been a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action, lapse of time is as complete a bar in equity as at law.

3. A court of equity will refuse relief where a party has slept on his rights, and acquiesced for a great length of time.

4. A bill filed by a former member of the Harmony Society, an unincorporated association of individuals living together as a community, claiming a share in its property, is held to be too late, more than fifty years having elapsed since the complainant ceased to be a member of the Society.

Argued Dec. 14, 1886. Decided Mar. 7, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania. Reported below, 15 Fed. Rep. 758. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Wm. Reinecke, George Hoadly, Edgar M. Johnson, Edward Colston, George Hoadly, Jr., for appellants:

The Harmony Society is not a charity. It is an association for mutual assistance and support, physical, moral, and spiritual.

Kain v. Gibboney, 101 U. S. 362 (25: 813); Cocks v. Manners, L. R. 12 Eq. 574; Anon. 3 Atk. 277; Carne v. Long, 2 De Gex. F. & J. 75; Re Clark's Trusts, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 497; Re Dutton, L. R. 4 Exch. Div. 54.

The definition of a charity, given by Mr. Justice Gray, in Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 539, 556, has been generally accepted in this country. It is as follows: "A charity, in the legal sense, may be more fully defined as a gift, to be applied consistently with existing laws, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their minds or hearts under the influence of education or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves in life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works, or otherwise lessening the burdens of government. It is immaterial whether the purpose is called charitable in the gift itself, if it is so described as to show that it is charitable in its nature."

As between trustee and cestui que trust, there is no such thing as an illegal trust. At least the fiduciary cannot set up illegality as against the beneficiary.

Walden v. Bodley, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 156 (10: 398); Benjamin v. Gill, 45 Ga. 110; Wheeler v. Black, 25 W. Va. 266, 281; Great Eastern R. R. Co. v. Turner, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 149.

Whether, therefore, the trust in this case was in fact illegal or not, Speidel had the right and the circuit court was bound to treat it as legal, and the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run, nor was there anything to quicken his diligence to sue, growing out of its peculiar character. It was a continuing and subsisting trust, in which each trustee in succession to Rapp down to the present, is averred and (by the demurrer), admitted to have taken and held possession. Unless a trust is repudiated by clear and unequivocal words and acts of the trustee who claims to hold the trust property as his own, and such repudiation and claim are brought to the notice of the beneficiary in such manner that he is called upon to assert his equitable rights, the Statute of Limitations does not run.

Philippi v. Philippe, 115 U. S. 157 (29: 339); Boone v. Chiles, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 177, 223 (9: 388, 404); Seymour v. Freer, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 202 (19: 306).

Messrs. George Shiras, Jr., and O. S. Fetterman, for appellees:

Both in England and the state and federal courts in the United States, it has been an established doctrine of courts in equity to withhold relief from those who have delayed for an unreasonable length of time in asserting their claims, and this altogether independently of the existence of Statutes of Limitations.

Maxwell v. Kennedy, 49 U. S. 8 How. 210 (12: 1051); Godden v. Kimmell, 99 U. S. 201 (25: 431); Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 135 (25: 807); Lansdale v. Smith, 106 U. S. 391 (27: 219).

This is not by any means the first or only case brought by recreant members against this venerable Society. In 1832, one Schreiber, who had left the Society, brought an action for an account in the Court of Common Pleas of Beaver County. That court refused to sustain the action, and its judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in an opinion delivered by Chief Justice Gibson.

Schriber v. Rapp, 5 Watts, 362.

In 1853 a bill was filed against the Trustees of the Harmony Society by Joshua Nachtrieb, who claimed to have been unjustly and violently excluded from the Society, and asked for an account. This bill was sustained by the Circuit Court of the United States, but its decree was reversed by this court.

Baker v. Nachtrieb, 60 U. S. 19 How. 126 (15: 528).

The function of courts, under our system of jurisprudence, does not extend to passing judgment upon the orthodoxy of differing forms of belief, or upon the sincerity of learned and pious teachers. Courts can only interfere when public morals are outraged, or private rights infringed. The vague allegations of complainant's bill, assailing the religious belief in which his parents lived and died, and in which he himself was reared and continued until his twenty-fourth year, do not present issuable matter upon which the court can pass.

This bill was filed against the Trustees of the Harmony Society, an unincorporated association of persons living together as a community, by a former member of the Society, claiming a share in property in the hands of the Trustees.

The bill is sought to be maintained on the ground that the trust was not a charity, in the legal sense, and the members of the Society were equitable tenants in common of the property held in trust. The learned counsel for the appellants differ in their views of the trust; the one insisting that it was unlawful because founded in fraud and against public policy, and should therefore be dissolved; and the other contending that it was a lawful and continuing trust. We have not found it necessary to consider which of these is the sound view, because we are of opinion that the plaintiff did not show himself to be entitled to invoke the interposition of a court of equity.

As a general rule, doubtless, length of time [386] is no bar to a trust clearly established, and express trusts are not within the Statute of Limitations, because the possession of the trustee is presumed to be the possession of his cestui que trust. Prevost v. Gratz, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 481, 497 [5: 311, 315]; Lewis v. Hawkins, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 119, 126 [23: 113, 114]; R. R. Co. v. Durant, 95 U. S. 576 [24: 391].

But this rule is in accordance with the reason on which it is founded, and, as has been clearly pointed out by Chancellor Kent and Mr. Justice Story, subject to this qualification: that time begins to run against a trust as soon as it is openly disavowed by the trustee, insisting upon an adverse right and interest which is clearly and unequivocally made known to the cestui que trust; as when, for instance such transactions take place between the trustee and the cestui que trust as would in case of tenants in common amount to an ouster of one of them by the other. Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. 90, 124; Robinson v. Hook, 4 Mason, 139, 152; Baker v. Whiting, 3 Sumn. 475, 486; Oliver v. Piatt, 44 U. S. 3 How. 333, 411 [11: 622, 657]; This qualification has been often recognized in the opinions of this court, and distinctly affirmed by its latest judgment upon the subject. Willison v. Watkins, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 43, 52 [7: 596, 600]; Boone v. Chiles, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 177, 223 [9: 388, 404]; Seymour v. Freer, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 202, 218 [19: 306, 311]; Bacon v. Rives, 106 U. S. 99, 107 [27: 69, 71]; Philippi v. Philippe, 115 U. S. 151 [29: 336].

In the case of an implied or constructive trust, unless there has been a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action, lapse of time is as complete a bar in equity as at law. Hovenden v. Annesley, 2 Sch. & Lef. 607, 634; Beckford v. Wade, 17 Ves. 87. In such a case, Chief Justice Marshall repeated and approved the statement of Sir Thomas Plumer, M. R., in a most important case in which his decision was affirmed by the House of Lords, that "Both on principle and authority, the laches and nonclaim of the rightful owner of an equitable estate, for a period of twenty years (supposing it the case of one who must within that period have made his claim in a court of law, had it [387] been a legal estate), under no disability, and where there has been no fraud, will constitute a bar to equitable relief, by analogy to the Statute of Limitations, if, during all that period, the possession has been under a claim unequivocally adverse, and without anything having been done or said, directly or indirectly, to recognize the title of such rightful owner by the adverse possessor." Elmendorf v. Taylor, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 152, 174 [6:289, 296]; Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Jac. & W. 1, 175, and 4 Bligh, 1.

Independently of any statute of limitations, courts of equity uniformly decline to assist a person who has slept upon his rights and shows no excuse for his laches in asserting them. "A court of equity," said Lord Camden, "has always refused its aid to stale demands, where the party slept upon his rights, and acquiesced for a great length of time. Nothing can call forth this court into activity but conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence; where these are wanting, the court is passive, and does nothing. Laches and neglect are always discountenanced; and therefore, from the beginning of this jurisdiction, there was always a limitation to suits in this court.' Smith v. Clay, 3 Bro. Ch. 640, note. This doctrine has been repeatedly recognized and acted on here. Piatt v. Vattier, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 405 [9:173]; McKnight v. Taylor, 42 U. S. 1 How. 161 [11:86]; Bowman v. Wathen, 42 U. S. 1 How. 189 [11:97]; Wagner v. Baird, 48 U. S. 7 How. 234 [12:681]; Badger v. Badger, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 87 [17:836]; Hume v. Beale, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 336 [21:602]; Marsh v. Whitmore, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 178 [22:482]; Sullivan v. Portland & K. R. R. Co. 94 U. S. 806 [24:324]; Godden v. Kimmell, 99 U. S. 201 [25:431]. In Hume v. Beale, the court, in dismissing, because of unexplained delay in suing, a bill by cestuis que trust against a trustee under a deed, observed that it was not important to determine whether he was the trustee of a mere dry, legal estate, or whether his duties and responsibilities extended further. 17 Wall. 348 [605]. See also Bright v. Legerton, 29 Beav. 60, and 2 De Gex, F. & J. 606.

When the bill shows upon its face that the plaintiff, by reason of lapse of time and of his own laches, is not entitled to relief, the objection may be taken by demurrer. Maxwell v. Kennedy, 49 U. S. 8 How. 210 [12:1051]; National Bank v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 567 [25:815]; Landsdale v. Smith, 106 U. S. 391 [27:219].

The allegations of this bill, so far as they are material to the defense of laches, are in substance as follows:

[388] The Harmony Society is a voluntary association, formed in 1805 by the plaintiff's parents and other heads of families, who had emigrated from Germany under the leadership of one Rapp, and become subject to his control in both spiritual and temporal affairs. In that year Rapp, for the purpose of acquiring absolute dominion over their means and mode of living, falsely and fraudulently represented to them that they could not be saved from eternal damnation, except by renouncing the plan of a separate home for each family, yielding up all their possessions, as had been done by the early Christians, and laying them at the feet of Rapp as their apostle, to be put into a common fund of the Society, and thenceforth living as a community under his control, receiving in return only the necessaries of life; and they, induced by and relying on his false and fraudulent representations, immediately yielded up all their possessions to the common fund of the Society, and placed the fund in his keeping as their trustee, and thenceforth lived as a community or common household, submitted themselves and their families to do for the community such work as he directed, allowed the avails thereof to form part of the common fund, and relinquished to him and his successors in the leadership of the community the management of the trust fund and the control of their own persons and those of their wives and children, and received only the necessaries of life in return. Rapp received and accepted the trust fund, and all the accretions to it by the work of the inhabitants of the community or otherwise, not as his own, but in trust for the members of those families and the contributors to the fund, and for their common benefit; and always, up to his death in 1847, recognized and acknowledged said trust, and disclaimed any greater interest in the fund than that of any other contributor, and any other right to its management and control than by virtue of his leadership of the community. In 1807 Rapp obliged his followers to abjure matrimony, and thenceforth did not permit them to marry in the community, and compelled anyone about to marry to leave it. The plaintiff was born in the community in 1807, and was reared in and as a part of it, under Rapp's teachings and control, and faithfully worked for it from the [389] age of twelve to the age of twenty-four years, and allowed the avails of his work to become part of the common fund, and received in return nothing but the necessaries of life, which were of far less value than the avails of his work; and in 1831, being about to marry, had to leave and did leave the community. The trust fund so received and accepted by Rapp, with its profits, interest and accretions, now amounts to $8,000,000, and yields an annual income of $200,000, and is held by the defendants on the same trust on which Rapp held it in his lifetime; and neither Rapp nor the defendants ever rendered any account to the plaintiff or to the beneficiaries of the fund, although the plaintiff, before bringing this suit in May, 1882, demanded of the defendants an account and a settlement of his share.

The trust on which Rapp, and the defendants as his successors, held the common fund of the Harmony Society, is described in one place in the bill as "for the members of said families and the contributors of said fund, and for their common benefit," that is to say, as is clearly explained by what goes before, in trust for their common benefit as a community, living together in the community, working for the community, subject to the regulations of the community, and supported by the community. This was the "said trust" which, as the bill afterwards alleges, Rapp, up to his death, and his successors, until the bringing of this suit, "always recognized and acknowledged." The constant avowal of the Trustees, that they held the trust fund upon such a trust, is wholly inconsistent with and adverse to the claim of the plaintiff that they held the fund in trust for the benefit of the same persons as individuals, though withdrawn from the community, living by themselves, and taking no part in its work.

The plaintiff, upon his own showing, withdrew from the community in 1831, and never returned to it, and for more than fifty years took no step to demand an account of the Trustees, or to follow up the rights which he claimed in this bill.

[390] If he ever had any rights, he could not assert them after such a delay; not on the ground of an express and lawful trust, because the express trust stated in the bill, and constantly avowed by the Trustees during this long period, was wholly inconsistent with any trust which would sustain his claim; not on the ground that the express trust stated in the bill was unlawful and void, and therefore the Trustees held the trust fund for the benefit of all the contributors in proportion to the amounts of their contributions, because that would be an implied or resulting trust, and barred by lapse of time. In any aspect of the case, therefore, if it was not strictly within the Statute of Limitations, yet the plaintiff showed so little vigilance and so great laches that the circuit court rightly held that he was not entitled to relief in equity.

It is proper to add that this decision does not rest in any degree upon the judgments of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania and of this court, in the cases cited at the bar, in favor of the Trustees of the Harmony Society in suits brought against them by other members, because each of those cases differed in its facts, and especially in showing that the Society had written articles of association, which are not disclosed by this bill. Schriber v. Rapp, 5 Watts, 351; Baker v. Nachtrieb, 60 U. v.

ROSEWELL G. ROLSTON ET AL., Trustees, AND THE HANNIBAL AND ST. JOSEPH RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 390-412.)

Indebtedness of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company to the State of Missouri—payment of—construction of statute—when suit against an officer is not against the State.

1. The State of Missouri, under certain Acts of 1851 and 1855, loaned its credit to the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, and issued its bonds to the extent of $3,000,000 for that purpose, receiving statutory liens on the property of the Company to secure the payment of the amount required to meet both principal and interest so as to exonerate the State. By the Act of February 20, 1865, it was provided that the Company might issue bonds to secure the means with which to pay its indebtedness to the State, the liens of which were to be released and passed over to the holders of the new bonds to be issued under the Act. The Company having notified the Governor of its desire to exercise the authority conferred by said Act, the Act of March 26, 1881, was enacted, providing for the disposition of the money due the State when paid in. Subsequently, the Company paid to the State $3,000,000, being the principal and interest then due. As the bonds issued by the State were not due and could not be redeemed, the state officers claimed that the Company was still liable for the amount required to meet the interest on said bonds. Upon a bill filed to enjoin the enforcement of the liens of the State because of nonpayment of interest; and to secure from the Governor the assignment of said liens provided for by the Act of 1865, it is held that, under the Act of 1865, if payment was made in money, it should be of a sum, if any, in addition to the face of the bonds, which would enable the State to take up and cancel an equal amount of its other 6 per cent indebtedness then outstanding; and that the Act of 1881 was a direction to the state officers to accept the money when offered by the Company, and to use it as fast as needed in the payment of the general indebtedness of the State; such payment, when made, to operate as a discharge of the Company from all liability for the payment of either principal or interest of an equal amount of the bonds which had been issued for its benefit.

2. The Acts of 1865 and 1881 are not in conflict with the provisions of the Missouri Constitution which require the enforcement of the lien held by the State upon any railroad, and prohibit its release or alienation, or the release or extinguishment of any indebtedness to the State. The payment of the obligation in advance of its maturity, with a view to the use of the money so paid, in taking up other debts of the State at maturity, is the legal equivalent of a payment of the liability of the Company in accordance with the original terms on which it was created.

3. What occurred between the Company and the officers of the State in connection with said payment by the Company is immaterial, as said officers could only do what was authorized by the statutes.

4. A suit against a state officer to compel him to do what a statute requires of him is not a suit against the State, within the meaning of the Eleventh Amendment.

APPEALS from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri. Reversed in part, affirmed in part.

Reported below, as Ralston v. Crittenden, 10 Fed. Rep. 254; 3 McCrary, 332.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John F. Dillon and Elihu Root, for plaintiffs.

Messrs. D. A. DeArmond and John B. Henderson, for defendants.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit in equity brought by Rosewell G. Rolston, Heman Dowd, and Oren Root, Jr., Trustees in a mortgage made by the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, a Missouri corporation, to restrain the executive officers of Missouri from selling the mortgaged property under prior statutory mortgages in favor of the State, on the ground that the liability for which the earlier liens were created had been satisfied, and that they, as Trustees, were entitled to an assignment of those liens. The material facts are these:

The Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company was incorporated by the State of Missouri under a statute for that purpose, approved February 16, 1847, to build and operate a railroad from Hannibal, on the Mississippi River, to St. Joseph, on the Missouri. To expedite the construction of the road the State passed an Act, which was approved February 22, 1851, to issue to the Company its own bonds as a loan of credit, redeemable at the pleasure of the Legislature at any time after the expiration of twenty years from the date of their issue, with interest, payable semi-annually, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, in the City of New York, on the first days of January and July in each and every year. The acceptance of these bonds by the Company was to operate as a mortgage on its road "for securing the payment of the principal and interest of the sums of money for which such bonds shall * * * be issued and accepted, * * *." The Company also became bound to "make provision for punctual redemption of the said bonds so issued * * * to them, * * * and for the punctual payment of the interest which shall accrue thereon in such manner as to exonerate the [393] treasury of" the "State from any advances of money for that purpose." If default should be made by the Company in the payment of either the principal or the interest, the Governor was authorized to sell the road at auction, first giving a required notice.

Under the authority of this statute bonds were issued by the State to the Company at different times between December 28, 1853, and September 24, 1856, to the amount of $1,500,000, for which the Company and its railroad became bound in the manner specified.

On the 10th of December, 1855, the Company not having then completed its road, another Act was passed by the General Assembly, authorizing a further loan of the credit of the State, in bonds, to the amount of $1,500,000. These were to be thirty years' bonds. Section 2 of this Act was as follows:

"Sec. 2. The loan of the State's credit under this Act shall be, and it is hereby declared to be, upon the condition of a first lien or mortgage, as contained and reserved in the Act of February 22, 1851, hereinbefore recited, and the same shall in all respects be held to be an extension of the loan of state credit, under the said mortgage provisions, securing the State in this as in the former loan, upon the same equal and unrestricted bases, as to each and every bond of the State so issued, under said Acts or either of them."

Under this authority other state bonds were issued to the Company to the prescribed amount, maturing as follows:

November 10, 1886	$ 500,000
February 28, 1887	1,000,000

On the 20th of February, 1865, the following Act of the General Assembly of Missouri was approved:

"An Act to Provide for Reducing the Indebtedness of the State.

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Missouri as follows:

"Section 1. The Hannibal and St. Joseph [394] Railroad Company is hereby authorized to issue its bonds, signed by the president and countersigned by the secretary of the Company, in sums of one thousand dollars each, with coupons attached, bearing interest, payable semi-annually, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, and having not less than ten years to run, and to the amount of three millions of dollars, the payment of the same, with the accruing interest, to be secured by a mortgage or deed of trust conveying to three trustees, to be named therein, by and with appropriate forms of expression, and for the purpose of securing the payment of said bonds and interest, and for no other purpose, on the road of said Company, with all its franchises, rolling stock and appurtenances, subject, however, to all the liens and liabilities existing in favor of the State by virtue of any law of the State at the time said bonds may be issued and delivered.

"Sec. 1. Whenever the trustees provided for in the first section of this Act shall pay into the treasury of the State a sum of money equal in amount to all indebtedness due or owing by said Company to the State, and all liabilities incurred by the State by reason of having issued her bonds and loaned the same to said Company as a loan of the credit of the State, together with all interest that has and may at the time when such payment shall be made have accrued and remain unpaid by said Company, and such fact shall have been certified to the Governor of the State by the treasurer, who is hereby directed to make such certificate, then the Governor of the State is hereby authorized and required to make over, assign and convey to the trustees aforesaid all the first liens and mortgages now held by the State under the provisions of an Act of the Legislature of the State approved February 22, 1851, to secure the payment of a loan of the credit of the State to said Railroad Company in the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars; and also of an Act of the Legislature approved December 10, 1855, to secure the payment of a like loan of the credit of the State in the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars; and such conveyance shall, by appropriate expressions, convey to said trustees all and singular the rights, titles and interests held by the State under the several Acts of the Legislature, as aforesaid, in and to said railroad, its rolling [395] stock, franchises, and appurtenances, to hold the same as security for the payment of the bonds of the road authorized by the first section of this Act, and the interest thereon, with full power to sell and dispose of the same, in case of the failure of said Company to meet and pay, at maturity, the interest or principal of said bonds, or any of them, and to have and exercise all the rights and powers which belong to the people of the State of Missouri, and which, by the provisions of the Acts of the Legislature, as aforesaid, they might have exercised by and through the Governor of the State; Provided, That nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to render the State of Missouri liable in any case for the payment of the bonds or interest thereon, authorized to be issued by the first section of this Act.

"Sec. 3. The treasurer of the State is hereby authorized and directed to receive of the trustees aforesaid, in payment of three millions of dollars, and interest, as provided in the second section of this Act, any of the outstanding bonds of the State bearing no less than 6 per cent interest, or of the unpaid coupons thereof, at their par value.

"Sec. 4. The true intent and meaning of this Act is to place the persons and parties who may hold the bonds of the road authorized to be issued by the first section of this Act, through the trustees herein provided, in the same legal position which the people of the State of Missouri now hold, with full powers to act in the premises as the said State, by its Governor, might have done; and it shall be the duty of such trustees to proceed to advertise and sell the road with its appurtenances, as aforesaid, and in the manner provided for the sale of the same by the Governor of the State in the Acts of the Legislature aforesaid, whenever they shall receive a request so to do in writing, signed by persons and parties representing not less than one third of the bonds authorized to be issued by the first section of this Act, and which may be still outstanding; but only in case the said Railroad Company shall have made default in the payment of the principal or interest on said bonds when the same has become due; and all needed authority to do the same shall be maintained, and all needed decrees shall be issued by and in any court of competent jurisdiction [396] in this State, either in law or equity; and such sale, so made as herein provided, shall be deemed and held in all respects good and valid in law.

"Sec. 5. The provisions of this Act shall not be construed to modify, release, exonerate, discharge or relieve said Railroad Company from any duty, liability, obligation, penalty or forfeiture to which, under former laws, said Company may be liable to the people of the State of Missouri, on any account whatever, except from the payment of the several sums of money as is in this Act provided.

"Sec. 6. This Act to take effect from and after its passage."

When this Act was passed, it is said in the brief of the attorney-general, "The bonds of the State were worth in the market from 65 to 69 cents on the dollar, and there were outstanding on January 1, 1865, state aid bonds loaned to different railroad companies to the amount of many millions of dollars, beside $833,000 of other state bonds, and over $5,000,000 of past due coupons on state aid bonds loaned to the railroads." The testimony shows conclusively that no interest had been paid on any of the aid bonds except those of this Company since January 1, 1861.

On the 21st of March, 1874, an Act of the General Assembly of Missouri, "To authorize the issue of new state bonds in renewal of certain other bonds heretofore issued to the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, and to maintain and perpetuate the first lien of the State to secure the payment thereof," was approved. Down to this time the Company had not availed itself of the privileges of the Act of February 20, 1865, but it had promptly met and provided for, at maturity, the interest on all its state bonds. By this new Act it was provided that whenever the owner or owners of any of the bonds issued to the Company under the authority of the Act of February 22, 1851, "shall present such bond or bonds for renewal to the Treasurer of the State, and shall satisfy such [397] treasurer that he or they are the real and bona fide holders and owners of such bond or bonds, and that the same have not been paid by the State, or by the said Company, and that they have not been taken up and placed in the hands of the Trustees to secure the payment of other bonds issued by said Company, as authorized by the Act entitled 'An Act to Provide for Reducing the Indebtedness of the State,' approved February 20, 1865, the treasurer shall certify the fact to the Governor of the State, and the Governor shall thereupon cause to be issued in renewal of such old bonds, and deliver to the holder or holders thereof, new bonds of the State of Missouri, in lieu thereof, said bonds to be signed by the Governor and countersigned by the Secretary of State, sealed with the seal of the State, and registered in the office of the State Auditor, and they shall be of the same denomination and tenor of the old bonds, for which they are to be exchanged; and they shall have the same rate of interest with like coupons, and be payable in the same time and manner as said old bonds."

Ample provision was then made for the preservation of the original security, and the Company was made liable for the payment of the renewal bonds to the same extent and in the same way it had been for the originals. The Company formally accepted the provisions of this Act, and under it renewal bonds were issued to the amount of $1,499,000, one of the original bonds for $1,000 having been paid. These renewal bonds mature as follows:

July 1, 1894	$500,000
July 1, 1895	203,000
January 1, 1896	165,000
July 1, 1897	17,000

The Company having at all times met the interest on these bonds as it matured, as well as that on the bonds issued under the Act of 1855, the board of directors, on the 19th of January, 1881, adopted a plan for refunding its debt, which contemplated a discharge of its obligations to the State in the way provided for in the Act of February 20, 1865. A few days previous to this time the officers of the State had been informally approached on the subject, but [398] on that day negotiations were regularly opened by the following letter from the President of the Company to the Governor of the State:

"Hon. THOS. T. CRITTENDEN,

"Governor of the State of Missouri.

"DEAR SIR: It is the desire of the directors of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company to relieve the State of Missouri from the burden which the State assumed in pursuance of a wise and liberal policy to aid the construction of the road when the Company was in its infancy.

"The interest upon the three millions of state aid bonds has been regularly paid by us, including the coupons due January 1, 1881. We now wish to pay into the treasury of the State the entire sum of principal and the accrued interest since that date, in fulfillment of the obligation which rests upon the Company to provide for the payment of bonds. This course appears to have been contemplated in the Act of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, entitled 'An Act to Provide for Reducing the Indebtedness of the State,' approved February 20, 1865. So long a time has elapsed since the passage of that Act that we have considered it our duty to communicate with you upon the subject, in the first instance, in order that there may be a full understanding and co-operation in the action of the Railroad Company and the officers of the State.

"We should be very glad to receive any suggestion which may occur to you, affecting the convenience of the State or the duties of the officers of the State, depending upon our proposed action. It is our desire to complete the transaction as soon as possible after the period which must expire before a meeting of the Company can be had to approve the necessary arrangements

"I remain, with great respect, your obedient servant, WM. DOWD, President."

After this letter was received by the Governor, Mr. Walker, the Auditor of State, went to [399] New York, where he had an interview with the officers of the Company. At this interview propositions were made on both sides, but no conclusion was reached. On the return of Mr. Walker from New York he made a report in writing to the Board of Fund Commissioners, under date of February 24, 1881, giving an account of what he had done and the suggestions he had made. This report was communicated by the Governor to the General Assembly the next day, accompanied by a message, of which the following is a copy:

"CITY OF JEFFERSON, Feb. 25, 1881.

"SIR: I have the honor to lay before you a communication from Hon. John Walker to the Board of Fund Commissioners of Missouri. Mr. Walker, as a member of that board, recently visited the City of New York for the purpose of conferring with the officers of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company in regard to the proposition of that Company to discharge the full amount of what it claims is its present indebtedness to the State. The result of Mr. Walker's conference with those officials is fully set forth in the accompanying communication.

"I recommend that you adopt such legislation as will enable the Fund Commissioners to use or dispose of whatever sum, if any, may be accepted by the State from the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company.

"I do not mean to say that the State will accept the sum of $3,000,000 in complete satisfaction of the liability incurred by the State in aid of said Company. I think the liability extends to the maturity of the bonds; and as the Company has heretofore met its obligations to the State promptly, and has thereby secured the confidence of the people of the State, who were for many years in doubt as to the final result of our complications with that road, I trust that it will be equally as honorable in the future, and so act as to retain the confidence which its past conduct has inspired.

"In case the whole or any part of the money due from the Company is accepted, its receipt [400] ought not to find us unprepared for its prompt and profitable disposal.

"Very Respectfully,
"THOS T. CRITTENDEN.

"Hon. T. P. BASHAW, Speaker of the House of Representatives."

Afterwards the General Assembly passed the following Act, which was approved March 26, 1881:

"An Act to Provide for the Transfer to the State Sinking Fund any Surplus Money That May Be in the State Treasury, Not Necessary to Defray the Current Expenses of the State Government, and to Meet the Appropriations Made by Law, and to Authorize the Fund Commissioners to Invest the Same in the Redemption or Purchase of the Bonds of the State and Bonds of the United States, Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Bonds Excepted.

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, as follows:

"Section 1. Whenever there is any money in the state treasury not necessary to defray the current expenses of the State Government and to meet the appropriations made by law it shall be the duty of the State Auditor, and he is hereby authorized and required, to transfer the same to the credit of the State Sinking Fund for the purpose of paying the state debt, or any portion thereof, and the interest thereon as it becomes due.

"Sec. 2. Whenever there is sufficient money in the sinking fund to redeem or purchase one or more of the bonds of the State of Missouri, such sum is hereby appropriated for such purpose, and the Fund Commissioners shall immediately call in for payment a like amount of the option bonds of the State, known as 'five-twenty bonds.' Provided, That if there are no option bonds which can be called in for payment, they may invest such money in the purchase of any of the bonds of the State, or bonds of the United States, the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad bonds excepted."

On the 30th of April, 1881, the Company executed to Rolston, Dowd, and Root, trustees, [401] a mortgage such as was contemplated by the Act of February 20, 1865, and in which the provisions of that Act were recited, to secure an issue of bonds to the amount of $3,000,000. These bonds were negotiated by the Trustees, and with the money realized therefrom, and $90,000 furnished by the Company, they, on the 20th of June, 1881, paid to the Treasurer of State the full face of the bonds of the State for which the Company was liable, and the unpaid interest thereon, to fall due July 1 thereafter, the total amount of principal and interest being $3,090,000, and demanded from him the certificate provided for by the Act of February 20, 1865, to entitle them to an assignment from the Governor of the liens of the State, The Treasurer thereupon gave the Trustees a receipt, of which the following is a copy:

"TREASURER'S OFFICE, STATE OF MISSOURI,
"CITY OF JEFFERSON, June 20, 1881.

"Received of R. G. Rolston, Heman Dowd, and Oren Root, Jr., Trustees Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad Company, three million and ninety thousand dollars $\frac{00}{100}$ on account of the statutory mortgage now held by the State of Missouri against said railroad.

"In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my seal of office the day and year above. (Signed) PHIL. E. CHAPPELL,
"$3,090,000. Treasurer."
[The State Treasurer's Seal of office.]

At the same time he gave to them the following certificate:

"To Thomas T. Crittenden,
"Governor of Missouri.

"I, Phil. E. Chappell, Treasurer of the State of Missouri, do hereby certify that R. G. Rolston, Heman Dowd, and Oren Root, Jr., Trustees, have paid into the treasury of the State of Missouri three millions and ninety thousand dollars (3,090,000), under the Act entitled 'An Act to Provide for Reducing the Indebtedness of the State,' approved February 20, 1865, on account of the statutory mortgage the State [402] holds against the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad Company.

"Given under my hand this 20th day of June, 1881.

"(Signed) Phil. E. Chappell, State Treasurer."

He refused to put the certificate in any other form, although requested to do so by the Company.

No special provision was made by the Company for the payment of the interest which fell due January 1, 1882, and on such failure the Governor threatened to take measures for the enforcement of the lien which the State held under its statutory mortgages as upon a default by the Company in the payment of interest. Thereupon the Trustees began this suit, on the 6th of January, 1882, which was at first against the Governor alone, to have him execute the assignment provided for by the Act of 1865, and also to enjoin him from selling the road under the statutory mortgage. On the filing of the bill a temporary restraining order was granted by the circuit judge. Afterwards, on the 10th of February, 1882, the court in session, being of opinion that the payment which had been made did not operate as a satisfaction of the obligation of the Company to the State under the Act of 1865, refused to grant a temporary injunction, but did not pass further on the rights of the parties. Ralston v. Crittenden, 10 Fed. Rep. 254; S. C. 3 McCrary, 332. The Company thereupon, to stop a sale by the Governor, paid to the State the interest which fell due January 1, 1882, and the cause proceeded without any injunction. Afterwards, on the 20th of March, an amended and supplemental bill was filed, on leave of the court, by which Chappell, the Treasurer of State, and Walker, the Auditor, were added as parties, and the Railroad Company also. The Governor and Auditor, with whom was united D. H. McIntyre, were also proceeded against as Fund Commissioners of the State, so that, if necessary, a decree might be had for a return of the money which had been paid. In other respects the prayer of the bill was not materially changed. Answers and replications were filed and testimony taken. After hearing upon bill, answers, replication and proofs, a decree was [403] entered September 15, 1882, to the effect that the Trustees were entitled under the Act of 1865 to an assignment by the Governor of the liens of the State upon payment to the Treasurer of State of a sum of money which, together with that already paid, if it had been applied and invested within a reasonable time in accordance with the provisions of the Act of March 26, 1881, would have indemnified the State against loss by reason of its obligation to pay interest on the bonds to their maturity; and "that the complainants were and are entitled to have the said $3,000,000, paid as aforesaid to the said Treasurer of the State of Missouri, under the provisions of the aforesaid Act of February 20, 1865, applied and invested under and in accordance with the provisions of the said Act of March 26, 1881, to the payment of the option bonds of the State of Missouri known as 5-20 bonds, as rapidly as they were subject to call and payment; and in the meantime, and until such bonds became subject to call and payment or other portions of the state debt or interest thereon became due, to have the remaining and unapplied balance of the said moneys invested in bonds of the United States at the market rates, and when any portion of the said 5-20 bonds became or should become subject to call and payment, or any portion of the state debt or interest thereon became or should be subject to redemption or payment, to have the said moneys applied from time to time to the redemption or payment thereof."

The case was then referred to a master to ascertain and report "what sum, including the said $3,000,000, was necessary to indemnify the State as aforesaid, if the same were applied and invested as hereinbefore provided within reasonable time in the exercise of due diligence by the officers of the State after the 20th of June, 1881." In this decree the Governor was enjoined from selling the road until a final judgment in the cause.

From the report of the master, it appears that after the order of the court referring the case, the state officers used $1,446,000 of the money that had been paid in by the Company, to take up and pay an equal amount of option and other bonds of the State which might have been [404] called in at different times before, while the money was in the treasury to the credit of the sinking fund. The remainder of the money was then invested, as it might have been before, in state bonds and United States bonds, at rates which would yield an interest on the investment equal to 8 per cent per annum.

The court below gave a decree finding the amount to be paid to the State before the Trustees could claim an assignment of the prior liens, calculated on the basis of applying the payment to taking up the bonds which had been issued to the Company as they matured, and crediting the fund with 6 per cent interest on the amount actually used to take up other bonds than those issued to the Company, at the rate of 6 per cent from the time it ought to have been so used, and on the remainder at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, which it was agreed was all that the investment that had been made in the purchase of state bonds and United States securities would produce. The amount thus found to be due was $476,049.27, and interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from May 11, 1883.

The officers of the State claimed that the amount due should have been ascertained by charging the Company with the face of the bonds and interest to the date of their maturity, and crediting it only with the amount invested and the interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent until actually used to take up the bonds for which the Company was liable.

Each of the parties appealed from this decree.

What the State did under the Acts of 1851 and 1855 was to loan its credit to the Railroad Company. For this purpose it issued its bonds, with coupons for semi-annual interest attached, redeemable, part at the end of twenty years and part at the end of thirty. These bonds were delivered to the Company to be disposed of to raise money to enable it to expedite and secure the completion of its railroad, and in this way the State incurred a liability for the Company, not only to pay the principal of the bonds to the holders thereof, but also to pay the interest semi-annually, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, on some for at least twenty years, and [405] on others for thirty. The holder could not be required to take the principal and stop the interest until the State had the right by the terms of the bond to pay the principal. This was the liability of the State to the holders of the bonds for the benefit of the Company; and the corresponding liability of the Company to the State was to provide the State with the means for the punctual payment of the interest as it matured during the whole time the bonds had to run, and of the principal when it fell due. The Company could no more require the State to take the principal before it became due, and stop interest thereafter, than the State could require the bondholders to do the same thing. The liability of the Company to the State was identical with that of the State to the bondholders, for the duty of the Company was to make such provision for the payment of both interest and principal as would "exonerate the treasury of the State from any advances of money for that purpose."

This was the condition of the liability of the parties to and for each other under the original statutes when that of February 20, 1865, was enacted, during the late Civil War, while the State was largely in default for interest on its debt, and when of necessity its securities were much depreciated. The avowed purpose of the statute was, according to its title, to reduce the indebtedness of the State, and it related only to the Hannibal and St. Joseph Company, which was not in default for either the interest or the principal of the bonds it was bound to make provision for. That Company was authorized to raise money to get up the lien on its property in favor of the State, and pass it over to the holders of the new security upon the faith of which the money was to be got. Such a transfer could be obtained by paying "into the treasury of the State a sum of money equal in amount to all indebtedness due or owing by said Company to the State, and all liabilities incurred by the State by reason of having issued her bonds and loaned the same to said Company as a loan of the credit of the State, together with all interest that has and may, at the time when said payment shall be made, have accrued and remain unpaid by said Company" (§ 2), or by delivering to the Treasurer "any of the outstanding bonds of the State [406] bearing no less than 6 per cent interest, or * * * unpaid coupons thereof at their par value," amounting to "three millions of dollars and interest;" that is to say, to the amount of the bonds issued to the Company by the State and the accrued interest thereon, which had not already been paid by the Company. Sec. 3. This, as we construe the statute, means that if payment is made in money, and not in state bonds or coupons, it must be of an amount equal to the face value of the bonds issued to the Company and the accrued interest thereon to the time of payment, together with such further sum, if any, as would be necessary to enable the State to cancel then, or within a reasonable time thereafter, $8,000,000 of its outstanding liabilities, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

This, we think, is shown in many ways. The avowed purpose of the Act was to reduce the debt of the State. This could not be done by a simple payment by the Company to the State of the amount of the bonds for which that Company was liable. To reduce the debt there must be a payment by the State to its own creditors and an actual cancellation of its own obligations. As by accepting the money the State discharged the Company from all further obligation to provide for the payment of the principal or the interest of the bonds for which it had become bound, it was necessary, in order to save the State from loss in the transaction, that the payment by the Company should be enough to enable the State to take up and cancel an equal amount of its other indebtedness bearing the same rate of interest. The apparent object of the statute was to relieve the State to some extent from its immediate embarrassments. There was then existing a past-due interest bearing debt in the shape of unpaid coupons, amounting to more than the face value of the bonds for which the Company was liable, and if the payment had been made at or about that time, the money could have been used at once in discharging an equal amount of debt then due and unpaid, without loss to the Company or the State. Looked at in the light of the surrounding circumstances, the statute appears like a plan by the State to get relief to some extent from its present embarrassments by an arrangement which would be equivalent to an issue of new bonds, payable at the times [407] when those which had been lent to the Company fell due. Apparently the State was in no condition to borrow at favorable rates upon its own credit, and so a scheme was devised by which the prior lien of the State upon the railroad of this Company might be used for that purpose, without any actual loss to the State and possibly with some advantage to the Company, for the Company was allowed to make its payment in any of the bonds or past-due coupons of the State bearing 6 per cent interest at their par value, and if these could be got at a discount the Company would be correspondingly a gainer.

Thus it appears that if the payment had been made at or near the time the statute was enacted, an equal amount of the interest-bearing debt of the State, which was immediately pressing for payment, could have been taken up, and a cancellation of the obligations of the Company secured. But no such payment was made, and the question now is whether, sixteen years afterwards, when the credit of the State had been re-established without any help from the Company, and when all its 6 per cent interest bearing securities were commanding a high premium, the payment of the same amount would produce the same effect so far as the Company was concerned.

Under the Statute of 1865, as has already been seen, if payment was made in money, it must be of a sum, in addition to the face of the bonds, which would enable the State to take up and cancel an equal amount of its other 6 per cent indebtedness then outstanding. Accordingly, when the Company offered the amount of the face of the bonds only, and interest, the state officers insisted upon more, and, the parties failing to come to a satisfactory understanding on the subject, the whole matter was referred by the Governor to the General Assembly then in session. The Statute of March 26, 1881, was the result of this reference, and, construed in connection with the circumstances which surrounded its enactment, it may be looked upon as a direction to the state officers to take the money when offered by the Company and use it as fast as needed to pay the option bonds when they were called in, which must be done at the earliest possible moment, and in the redemption and payment of other state bonds as they fell due. Whatever amount was not so [408] used at once was to be invested and kept invested until it should afterwards be needed for that purpose. In this way the Act of 1865 was recognized as being still in force, with the effect we have already given it, and the use of the money paid into the treasury by the Company in taking up the 6 per cent bonds of the State, whether option bonds or others, was made to operate as a discharge of the Company from all liability for the payment of either the principal or interest of an equal amount of the bonds which had been issued for its benefit. The Fund Commissioners were also required to use the money as fast as it was needed for the payment of called or maturing bonds.

With this statute in force the Company paid and the state officers received the money in question. There is some conflict of testimony as to what took place between Mr. Walker, the Auditor of State, and the officers of the Company, in New York, in February, 1881, and also as to what occurred between the Company and the state officers when the payment was made in June of the same year; but we have not deemed it necessary to give either of these matters any considerable attention, because the officers of the State could only do what was authorized by the statutes which were enacted for the government of their conduct in the matter, and the rights of the parties depend alone upon the legal effect of those statutes.

By the Constitution of Missouri, which went into effect in 1875, article X, section 14, it is made the duty of the Legislature to levy and collect annually a tax sufficient to pay the accruing interest on the bonded debt of the State, and to reduce the principal thereof annually $250,000. This $250,000 is to be paid into and made a part of the sinking fund of the State. The tax thus provided for has been regularly levied and collected.

From the report of the master it now appears that $1,446,000 of the money paid in by the Company was actually used by the Fund Commissioners on or before the 23d of August, 1882, in taking up option and other bonds of the State, and that if this sum had been actually applied for that purpose at the times when the bonds so taken up became subject to call or pay- [409] ment, and the remainder of the fund had been applied to taking up other bonds of the State as they became due and payable, after making due allowance for the proper use of the $250,000 constitutional sinking fund each year, including the year 1881, it would require a further payment by the Company, on the third day of October, 1882, of $153,646.46, to entitle the Company to a discharge of its liability to the State on account of the bonds, and the Trustees to an assignment of the liens of the State. It is conceded that the calculation of the master is right. The only question is as to the correctness of the principles on which it rests, and of this we are satisfied. In passing the Act of March 26, 1881, the State substantially said to this Company that any money it paid into the treasury under the Act of 1865 should be put into the sinking fund and used as soon as it was needed to meet the maturing debt of the State, and that in order to use it at the earliest possible moment all option bonds should be called in and paid as soon as it could be done according to law. Inasmuch as, before the Act of 1881 was passed, the State had by its Constitution made it imperative that a certain amount should be raised each year by taxation and paid into the sinking fund to be applied to the liquidation of the state debt, it is but right that this should be exhausted as far as available before the money of the Company is used; but after that is exhausted the statute made it the duty of the commissioners to use any other money there might be in the fund to pay its bonds, whenever the right to make such payment should be complete. The State was not required to do this; but it did it, and the executive officers must govern themselves accordingly. It may be true that if no such provision had been made, money might have been got by the State to take up such of its maturing bonds as could not be met by the accumulations of the annual contributions to the sinking fund, out of the tax which the Constitution had provided for that purpose, at a less rate of interest than 6 per cent, and thus a saving made; but this was for the consideration of the Legislature when it passed the statute, not for the state officers afterwards. The State had the right to pass the law, and when passed it was binding on those whose duty it was to obey. [410]

It was said, however, in argument, that if the Acts of 1865 and 1881 are construed in this way they are invalid because in conflict with the following provisions of the Missouri Constitution, which went into effect November 30, 1875:

Article IV., sec. 50. "The General Assembly shall have no power to release or alienate the lien held by the State upon any railroad, or in any wise change the tenor or meaning, or pass any Act explanatory thereof; but the same shall be enforced in accordance with the original terms upon which it was acquired."

Sec. 51. "The General Assembly shall have no power to release or extinguish, or authorize the releasing or extinguishing, in whole or in part, the indebtedness, liability or obligation of any corporation or individual, to this State, or to any county or other municipal corporation therein."

The Supreme Court of Missouri did say in State v. Chappell, 74 Mo. 335, a suit brought by these Trustees to compel the State Treasurer to give them a certificate of payment in the form required by the Act of 1865 to enable them to get from the Governor an assignment of the State's liens, that if the statutes required the acceptance of the $3,090,000 at the time it was paid in full satisfaction of the liability of the Company to the State they were unconstitutional and void. But here the question is whether the same result must follow when the statutes are construed so as to require the payment of a sum of money which will enable the State to take up an equal amount of its other indebtedness bearing an equal rate of interest, and we have no hesitation in saying it does not. Section 50 deals with the lien, and section 51 with the "indebtedness, liability, or obligation." The lien cannot be released or alienated until the debt is extinguished, and the debt cannot be released or extinguished except in the manner contemplated by the law under which it was created, or by something legally equivalent. Here there is a payment of the obligation in advance of its maturity, with a view to the use of the money so paid by the State in taking [411] up other debts at their maturity for which no other provision has been made. This is, in our opinion, the legal equivalent of a payment of the liability of the Company in accordance with the original terms on which it was created. By the Acts under which the payment was made the money was appropriated for use in this particular way. In the meantime it was to be kept invested until that use could be made, the Company indemnifying the State against its liability for interest in the meantime. A statute having such an effect violates neither the letter nor the spirit of the Constitution, which was no doubt intended, as was said by the Supreme Court of Missouri in the case just cited, to prevent the "frittering away" and "extinguishment" of "the liens held by the State on railroads" without payment in full. The payment in this case in the way which the statutes contemplate will be the complete legal equivalent of such a "payment in full."

It is next contended that this suit cannot be maintained because it is in its effect a suit against the State, which is prohibited by the Eleventh Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 711 [27:448], is cited in support of this position. But this case is entirely different from that. There the effort was to compel a state officer to do what a statute prohibited him from doing. Here the suit is to get a state officer to do what a statute requires of him. The litigation is with the officer, not the State. The law makes it his duty to assign the liens in question to the Trustees when they make a certain payment. The Trustees claim they have made this payment. The officer says they have not, and there is no controversy about his duty if they have. The only inquiry is, therefore, as to the fact of a payment according to the requirements of the law. If it has been made, the Trustees are entitled to their decree. If it has not, a decree in their favor, as the case now stands, must be denied, but as the parties are all before the court, and the suit is in equity, it may be retained so as to determine what the Trustees must do in order to fulfill the law, and under what circumstances the Governor can be compelled to execute the assignment which has been provided for.

The decree of the circuit court is reversed, [412]
so far as it fixed the amount to be paid to get an assignment of the lien, and the cause remanded with instructions to strike out the sum of $476,049.47, with interest from May 11, 1883, as the amount found due, and insert in lieu thereof $153,646.46, and interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from October 8, 1882. In all other respects the decree is affirmed, each party to pay its own costs in this court, the expenses of printing the record and the fees of the clerk for supervision to be taxed one half to each.

UNITED STATES, Plff., [479]

v.

RAMON ARJONA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 479–489.)

Counterfeiting foreign securities—power and duty of United States to punish—statute need not declare offense to be against law of nations.

1. The United States has the power and it is its duty to prevent and punish the counterfeiting, within its jurisdiction, of the notes, bonds and other securities issued by foreign governments or under their authority.

2. In a statute enacted to define and punish an offense against the law of nations, such offense need not be declared to be "an offense against the law of nations."

Submitted Jan. 8, 1887. Decided March 7, 1887.

ON a certificate of division of opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The history and facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., for plaintiff.

Messrs. George W. Wingate and Augustus A. Levey, for defendant:

Within the scope of its powers as enumerated and defined within the Constitution, the Government of the United States is supreme, but beyond them it has no existence.

U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 548 (23:588, 590).

"Every valid Act of Congress must find in the Constitution some warrant for its passage."

U. S. v. Harris, 106 U. S. 629 (27:290); Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 304 (4:97); M'Culloch v. Md. 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 316 (4:579); Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1 (6:23); U. S. v. Reese, 92 U. S. 214 (23:563).

The counterfeiting, within the United States, of a note of a foreign corporation, cannot be constitutionally made by Congress an offense against the law of nations. The discretion given to Congress to define and punish offenses against the law of nations is limited to those offenses which are legitimately included within that law.

Kent, Internat. Law, Dr. Abdy's notes, Lond. 1886, 445. See also U. S. v. Palmer, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 642 (4:480); U. S. v. Pirates, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 184, 185 (5:64).

The obligations of the law of nations do not include the offenses charged in this indictment. The offenses are the counterfeiting of a private obligation of a private institution.

The definition of "money" or "bills of credit," as used in the Federal Constitution, means a paper issued by the sovereign power, containing a pledge of its faith and designed to circulate as money.

Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 257 (9:709); Craig v. Missouri, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 410 (7:903).

A political division of a country like a federal State or a county cannot have, as to a foreign government, any element of sovereignty to be infringed. Still less can such be the case with respect to a private corporation created by such a political division.

The "law of nations" referred to in the Constitution is confined to those acts committed by one Nation, or its citizens, by which the rights of another Nation are injured.

The definitions of the following writers, though differing materially in the language employed, all unite in limiting the function of international law to a violation of some principle of sovereignty:

This is an indictment containing three counts against Ramon Arjona, for violations of sections 3 and 6 of the Act of May 16, 1884, chap. 52, 23 Stat. at L. 22, "To prevent and punish the counterfeiting within the United States of notes, bonds and other securities of foreign governments." The first and second counts were found under section 6 of the statute, and the third under section 3.

The statute makes the following things criminal:

1. Sec. 1. Forging or counterfeiting within the United States, with intent to defraud, "any bond, certificate, obligation, or other security of any foreign government, issued or put forth under the authority of such foreign government, or any treasury note, bill or promise to pay issued by such foreign government, and intended to circulate as money, either by law, order, or decree of such foreign government."

2. Sec. 2. Knowingly, and with intent to de-
[481] fraud, uttering, passing or putting off in payment or negotiation, within the United States, any forged or counterfeit bonds, etc., such as are described in section 1.

3. Sec. 3. Falsely making, forging or counterfeiting within the United States, with intent to defraud, or knowingly assisting therein, "any bank note or bill issued by a bank or other corporation of any foreign country, and intended by the law or usage of such foreign country to circulate as money, such bank or corporation being authorized by the laws of such country."

4. Sec. 4. Knowingly uttering, passing, putting off or tendering in payment, within the United States, with intent to defraud, any such false or counterfeited bank note or bill as is mentioned in section 3, whether forged or counterfeited in the United States or not.

5. Sec. 5. Having in possession any forged or counterfeit instruments mentioned in the preceding sections, with intent to utter, pass, or put them off, or to deliver them to others, with the intent that they may be uttered or passed.

6. Sec. 6. Having in possession "any plate, or any part thereof, from which has been printed or may be printed any counterfeit note, bond, obligation, or other security, in whole or in part, of any foreign government, bank, or corporation, except by lawful authority;" or using such plate, or knowingly permitting or suffering "the same to be used, in counterfeiting such foreign obligations, or any part thereof;" or engraving, or causing or procuring to be engraved, or assisting "in engraving, any plate in the likeness or similitude of any plate designed for the printing of the genuine issues of the obligations of any foreign government, bank, or corporation;" or printing, photographing, or in any other manner making, executing, or selling, or causing "to be printed, photographed, made, executed, or sold," or aiding "in printing, photographing, making, executing, or selling any engraving, photograph, print or impression in the likeness of any genuine note, bond, obligation or other security, or any part thereof, of any foreign government, bank, or corporation;" or bringing "into the United States * * * any counterfeit plate, engrav-
[482] ing, photograph, print or other impressions of the notes, bonds, obligations or other securities of any foreign government, bank, or corporation."

The first count of the indictment charges Arjona with having "in his control and custody a certain metallic plate from which there might then and there be printed in part a counterfeit note in the likeness and similitude in part of the notes theretofore issued by a foreign bank; to wit, the bank known as El Banco del Estado de Bolivar, which said bank was then and there a bank authorized by the laws of a foreign State; to wit, the State of Bolivar; said State being then and there one of the States of the United States of Colombia."

In the second count, he is charged with having caused and procured "to be engraved a certain metallic plate in the likeness and similitude of a plate designated for the printing of the genuine issues of the obligations of a foreign bank, that is to say, of the bank notes of the bank known as El Banco de Estado de Bolivar the same being then and there a bank authorized by the laws of a foreign State; to wit the State of Bolivar, said State being then and there one of the States of the United States of Columbia."

In the third count, the charge is that he, "unlawfully and with intent to defraud, did cause and procure to be falsely made a certain note in the similitude and resemblance of the notes theretofore issued by a bank of a foreign country; to wit, the bank known as El Banco del Estado de Bolivar, the same being then and there a bank authorized by the laws of one of the States of the United States of Colombia, that is to say, the State of Bolivar, and the notes issued by the said bank being then and by the usage of the said State of Bolivar intended to circulate as money."

To this indictment a demurrer was filed, and the judges holding the court have certified that at the hearing the following questions arose, upon which their opinions were opposed:

1. Whether the third section of the statute is constitutional.

2. Whether the sixth section is constitutional so far as it relates to "foreign banks and corporations."

3. Whether the counterfeiting within the United States of the notes of a foreign bank or corporation can be constitutionally made by Congress an offense against the law of nations.

4. Whether the obligations of the law of nations, as referred to in the Constitution of the [483] United States, include the punishment of counterfeiting the notes of a foreign bank or corporation, or of having in possession a plate from which may be printed counterfeits of the notes of foreign banks or corporations, as mentioned in the third and sixth sections, "unless it appear or is alleged in the indictment that the notes of said foreign bank or corporation are the notes or money of issue of a foreign government, prince, potentate, state, or power."

5. Whether, if there is power to "so define the law of nations" as to include the offenses mentioned in the third and sixth sections, it is not necessary, in order "to define" the offense, that it be declared in the statute itself "to be an offense against the law of nations."

6. Whether the indictment is sufficient in law.

The fourth of the questions thus stated embraces the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th of those certified, and the fifth embraces the 9th and 10th.

Congress has power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, article I, section 8, clause 18; and the Government of the United States has been vested exclusively with the power of representing the Nation in all its intercourse with foreign countries. It alone can "regulate commerce with foreign Nations," article I, section 8, clause 3; make treaties, and appoint ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls. Art. II, § 2, clause 2. A State is expressly prohibited from entering into any "treaty, alliance, or confederation." Art. I, § 10, clause 1. Thus all official intercourse between a State and foreign Nations is prevented, and exclusive authority for that purpose given to the United States. The National Government is in this way made responsible to foreign Nations for all violations by the United States of their international obligations, and because of this Congress is expressly authorized "to define and punish * * * offenses against the law of nations." Art. I, § 8, clause 10.

The law of nations requires every national [484] government to use "due diligence" to prevent a wrong being done within its own dominion to another Nation with which it is at peace, or to the people thereof; and because of this the obligation of one Nation to punish those who, within its own jurisdiction, counterfeit the money of another Nation has long been recognized. Vattel, in his Law of Nations, which was first printed at Neuchâtel in 1758, and was translated into English and published in England in 1760, uses this language: "From the principles thus laid down, it is easy to conclude that if one Nation counterfeits the money of another, or if she allows and protects false coiners who presume to do it, she does that Nation an injury." When this was written money was the chief thing of this kind that needed protection, but still it was added: "There is another custom more modern, and of no less use to commerce than the establishment of coin; namely, exchange, or the traffic of bankers, by means of which a merchant remits immense sums from one end of the world to the other, at very trifling expense, and, if he pleases, without risk. For the same reason that Sovereigns are obliged to protect commerce, they are obliged to support this custom, by good laws, in which every merchant, whether citizen or foreigner, may find security. In general, it is equally the interest and duty of every Nation to have wise and equitable commercial laws established in the country." Vattel, Law of Nations, Phil. ed., 1876, book I, chap. 10, pp. 46, 47. In a note by Mr. Chitty in his London edition of 1834 it is said: "This is a sound principle, which ought to be extended so as to [485] deny effect to any fraud upon a foreign Nation or its subjects." Id. 47, note 50.

This rule was established for the protection of Nations in their intercourse with each other. If there were no such intercourse, it would be a matter of no special moment to one Nation that its money was counterfeited in another. Its own people could not be defrauded if the false coin did not come among them; and its own sovereignty would not be violated if the counterfeit could not under any circumstances be made to take the place of the true money. But national intercourse includes commercial intercourse between the people of different Nations. It is as much the duty of a Nation to protect such an intercourse as it is any other, and that is what Vattel meant when he said: "For the same reason that Sovereigns are obliged to protect commerce, they are obliged to support this custom;" "namely, exchange, or the traffic of bankers, by means of which a merchant remits immense sums from one end of the world to the other," "by good laws, in which every merchant, whether citizen or foreigner, may find security."

In the time of Vattel certificates of the public debt of a Nation, government bonds, and other government securities, were rarely seen in any other country than that in which they were put out. Banks of issue were not so common as to need special protection for them selves or the public against forgers and counterfeiters elsewhere than at home; and the great corporations, now so numerous and so important, established by public authority for the promotion of public enterprises, were almost unknown, and certainly they had not got to be extensive borrowers of money wherever it could be had, at home or abroad, on the faith of their quasi public securities. Now, however, the amount of national and corporate debt and of corporate property represented by bonds, certificates, notes, bills and other forms of commercial securities, which are bought and sold in all the money markets of the world, both in and out of the country under whose authority they were created, is something enormous.

[486] Such being the case, it is easy to see that the same principles that developed, when it became necessary, the rule of national conduct which was intended to prevent, as far as might be, the counterfeiting of the money of one nation within the dominion of another, and which, in the opinion of so eminent a publicist as Vattel, could be applied to the foreign exchange of bankers, may with just propriety be extended to the protection of this more recent custom among bankers of dealing in foreign securities, whether national or corporate, which have been put out under the sanction of public authority at home, and sent abroad as the subjects of trade and commerce. And especially is this so of bank notes and bank bills issued under the authority of law, which, from their very nature, enter into and form part of the circulating medium of exchange—the money—of a country. Under such circumstances, every Nation has not only the right to require the protection, as far as possible, of its own credit abroad against fraud, but the banks and other great commercial corporations which have been created within its own jurisdiction for the advancement of the public good may call on it to see that their interests are not neglected by a foreign government to whose dominion they have, in the lawful prosecution of their business, become to some extent subjected.

No nation can be more interested in this question than the United States. Their money is practically composed of treasury notes or certificates issued by themselves, or of bank bills issued by banks created under their authority and subject to their control. Their own securities, and those of the States, the cities, and the public corporations, whose interests abroad they alone have the power to guard against foreign national neglect, are found on sale in the principal money markets of Europe. If these securities, whether national, municipal, or corporate, are forged and counterfeited with impunity at the places where they are sold, it is easy to see that a great wrong will be done to the United States and their people. Any uncertainty about the genuineness of the security necessarily depreciates its value as a merchantable commodity; and against this, international [487] comity requires that national protection shall, as far as possible, be afforded. If there is neglect in that, the United States may, with propriety, call on the proper government to provide for the punishment of such an offense, and thus secure the restraining influences of a fear of the consequences of wrongdoing. A refusal may not, perhaps, furnish sufficient cause for war, but it would certainly give just ground of complaint, and thus disturb that harmony between the governments which each is bound to cultivate and promote.

But if the United States can require this of another, that other may require it of them, because international obligations are of necessity reciprocal in their nature. The right, if it exists at all, is given by the law of nations; and what is law for one is, under the same circumstances, law for the other. A right secured by the law of nations to a nation or its people, is one the United States as the representatives of this nation are bound to protect. Consequently, a law which is necessary and proper to afford this protection is one that Congress may enact, because it is one that is needed to carry into execution a power conferred by the Constitution on the Government of the United States exclusively. There is no authority in the United States to require the passage and enforcement of such a law by the States. Therefore, the United States must have the power to pass it and enforce it themselves, or be unable to perform a duty which they may owe to another Nation, and which the law of nations has imposed on them as part of their international obligations. This, however, does not prevent a State from providing for the punishment of the same thing, for here, as in the case of counterfeiting the coin of the United States, the act may be an offense against the authority of a State as well as that of the United States.

Again, our own people may be dealers at home in the public or quasi public securities of a foreign government, or of foreign banks or corporations, brought here in the course of our commerce with foreign Nations, or sent here from abroad for sale in the money markets of this country. As such they enter into and form part of the foreign commerce of the country. If such securities can be counterfeited here with [488] impunity, our own people may be made to suffer by a wrong done which affects a business that has been expressly placed by the Constitution under the protection of the Government of the United States.

It remains only to consider those questions which present the point whether, in enacting a statute to define and punish an offense against the law of nations, it is necessary, in order "to define" the offense, that it be declared in the statute itself to be "an offense against the law of nations." This statute defines the offense, and if the thing made punishable is one which the United States are required by their international obligations to use due diligence to prevent, it is an offense against the law of nations. Such being the case, there is no more need of declaring in the statute that it is such an offense than there would be in any other criminal statute to declare that it was enacted to carry into execution any other particular power vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States. Whether the offense as defined is an offense against the law of nations depends on the thing done, not on any declaration to that effect by Congress. As has already been seen, it was incumbent on the United States as a Nation to use due diligence to prevent any injury to another nation or its people by counterfeiting its money, or its public or quasi public securities. This statute was enacted as a means to that end, that is to say, as a means of performing a duty which had been cast on the United States by the law of nations; and it was clearly appropriate legislation for that purpose. Upon its face, therefore, it defines an offense against the law of nations as clearly as if Congress had in express terms so declared. Criminal statutes passed for enforcing and preserving the neutral relations of the United States with other nations were passed by Congress at a very early date: June 5, 1794, chap. 50, 1 Stat. at L. 381; June 14, 1797, chap. 1, 1 Stat. at L. 520; March 3, 1817, chap. 58, 3 Stat. at L. 370; April 20, 1818, 3 Stat. at L. 447; and those now in force are found in title LXVII of the Revised Statutes. These all rest on the same power of Congress that is here invoked, and it has never been supposed they were invalid because they did not expressly declare that the offenses there defined were offenses against the law of nations.

[489] If there is anything more in the eleventh question certified than has been already disposed of in answering the others, it is too broad and indefinite for our consideration under the rules which have been long established regulating the practice on a certificate of division.

All the questions certified, except the eleventh, are answered in the affirmative, and as to that no special answer will be made.

[569] CHICAGO, BURLINGTON AND KANSAS CITY RAILROAD COMPANY, Piff. in Err.,

v.

STATE OF MISSOURI, ex rel. JOHN F. GUFFEY, Collector of Revenue of PUTNAM COUNTY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 569-575.)

Constitutional law—railroads—immunity from taxation must be clear—construction of statute.

1. An immunity from state taxation will not be recognized unless granted in terms too plain to be mistaken.

2. A branch railroad constructed under the Missouri Act of March 21, 1868, providing for the construction of branches, by the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company, which should be for most purposes independent lines, is not entitled to immunity from state and county taxation under the charter of 1857, of said company.

Argued Jan. 3, 1887. Decided March 7, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Jeff. Chandler and L. T. Hatfield, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John P. Butler, B. G. Boone, Atty-Gen. of Missouri, and S. P. Huston, for defendant in error:

The immunity from taxation can only be conferred when clearly authorized by legislation. Unless so clearly authorized it is held to be an immunity personal to the company on which it is conferred and incapable of transfer. The language authorizing the mortgage only authorized a mortgage of the property and franchises. Immunity from taxation is not thereby described.

Morgan v. La. 93 U. S. 223 (23: 861); Louisville & N. R. R. Co. v. Palmes, 109 U. S. 244 (27: 922); Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. R. R. Comrs. 112 U. S. 617 (28: 840); Trask v. Maguire, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 391 (21: 938); Wilson v. Gaines, 103 U. S. 417 (26: 401); Arkansas R.R. Co. v. Berry, 41 Ark. 486; State v. Sherman, 23 Ohio St. 411.

When the Legislature cannot by law exempt a railroad from taxation, it cannot authorize a transfer by one company to another of the right of exemption.

Louisville & N. R. R. Co. v. Palmes, supra.

Elijah Smith could not purchase this immunity and then convey it to the plaintiff in error. That would be equivalent to creating a new corporation with an exemption then prohibited by the Constitution of the State.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of [570] the court:

The judgment which this writ of error brings up for review affirms the liability to taxation, in Missouri, for state and county purposes, of what was formerly known as the Central North Missouri Branch of the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad, more recently named the Linneus Branch of the Burlington and Southwestern Railway Company, and now owned by the Chicago, Burlington and Kansas City Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Missouri. The latter Company claims to have succeeded to all the rights, privileges and immunities granted to the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company in its charter of 1857, among which was an exemption of its stock from taxation for "state and county" purposes. As the construction which the Supreme Court of Missouri places upon certain legislation, enacted after the charter of the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company was granted, is inconsistent with the exemption claimed, the controlling question on this writ of error is whether the local statutes, as interpreted and applied by that court, impair the obligation of any contract which the company had with the State and thereby deprive its successor, the plaintiff in error, of any rights secured by the Constitution of the United States.

That question mainly depends upon the construction of an Act of the General Assembly of Missouri, entitled "An Act to Aid in the Building of Branch Railroads in the State of Missouri," approved March 21, 1868.

That Act took effect from its passage, and is [571] as follows:

"1. Any railroad company in this State authorized by law to build branches, and wishing to avail themselves of the provisions of this Act, shall, by its board of directors, pass, and cause to be entered upon its records, a resolution setting forth such desire, and designating the name under which such branch shall be built, its point of intersection with its main line and general course, a certified copy of which resolution shall be filed with the Secretary of State; after which they shall be governed by the provisions of this Act.

"2. Whenever any such railroad company shall undertake the construction of a branch designated as provided in the first section of this Act, they shall receive donations or subscriptions to stock to aid its construction in the name of such branch, which shall be expressed in the certificate of stock issued; the cost and expenses of constructing and operating such branch shall be kept separate and distinct from expenses on the main line; they may borrow money and issue bonds secured by mortgage on such branch road to aid in its construction, and, in general, may operate, lease, sell or consolidate with any connecting road, distinct and separate from their main line, and in any other way, may manage or dispose of such branch, as by law they may be authorized with reference to their main line, and separate therefrom.

"3. Any branch road so constructed shall not be holden for any debt, lien or liability of the main line; nor shall the main line be holden for any debt, lien or liability of such branch. Any dividends of profits arising out of the business of such branch road shall be divided among the stockholders in said branch; and in all respects the interest of the stockholders in the branch shall be kept separate and distinct from the interests of the stockholders in the main line.

"4. The holders of stock in any railroad company which was subscribed in aid of the construction of a branch road, according to the provisions of this Act, shall have the same rights as other stockholders in the company in the choice of officers; but in all matters directly and specially affecting the interests of such branch road the stockholders in such branch 572] shall control, and, for such purpose, the directors, under their by-laws, may, or on the petition of parties representing one tenth of such stock shall, call a meeting of the stockholders in such branch, setting forth the object of such meeting; and at any such meeting such stockholders may instruct the board of directors in all matters relating especially to their interests, and they shall be governed by such instructions, if not inconsistent with the laws of the State and the powers of such company." Laws Mo. 1868, p. 90.

The branch road in question was constructed under the provisions of that statute. That fact distinctly appears from the preamble and resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company, March 25, 1871 (a certified copy thereof being filed April 19, 1871, in the office of the Secretary of State of Missouri), and expressly stating the purpose of the company to avail itself of the provisions of the Act of 1868 in building this branch road.

The statute, it will be observed, does not exempt from taxation stock subscribed in aid of the construction of the branch roads for which it makes provision. But as it applies to railroad companies "authorized by law to build branches," and as the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company was authorized by its charter of 1857 to build such branch roads as it deemed proper (State, ex rel., etc. v. County Court of Sullivan Co. 51 Mo. 522, 531), it is contended that the exemption, by the company's original charter, of its stock from taxation for state and county purposes, extends to stock subscribed in the name and exclusively for the benefit of the branch road constructed under the Act of 1868.

When that statute was passed, the Constitution of Missouri of 1865 declared that "No property, real or personal, shall be exempt from taxation, except such as may be used exclusively for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, to this State, to counties, or to municipal corporations within this State." Art. 12, sec. 16.

As, perhaps, every railroad company, organized under the laws of the State prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1865, had general authority to construct branch roads, it is clear that the construction of the Act of 1868, for which the appellant contends, cannot be [573] accepted, except upon the theory that the Legislature intended to evade the constitutional inhibition upon exemptions of property from taxation; for it is plain, from the provisions of the Act of 1868, that the roads which it authorized to be built, although called branch roads, are, for all purposes of separate ownership and management, independent lines, quite as distinct from the main lines as if constructed and operated by other and different corporations. Such provisions as are to be found in that statute are rarely ever found in legislative enactments. An analysis of them shows that any "branch" road constructed under it must be designated by the name under which it is built; donations and subscriptions in aid of it must be received in that name; the cost of construction and management must be kept separate and distinct from expenses incurred on the main line; money may be borrowed and bonds issued secured by mortgage on the branch only; the branch road may be sold, operated, leased or consolidated with any connecting road of another corporation, or disposed of separately from the main line; it is liable only for its own debts, and not for those of the main line; profits arising out of the business of such branch road can be divided only among its stockholders, and their interests are to be kept distinct from those of the stockholders of the main line; and the board of directors of the company owning the main line are required, in all matters relating especially to the interests of the stockholders of the branch road, to follow all instructions given by the latter, without regard to their effect upon the main line. In other words, the stockholders of a branch road constructed under the Act of 1868 constitute, in effect, a separate organization, having no connection whatever with the stockholders of the main line, except that the main line and the branch road are, for purposes of convenience, managed by the same board of directors. It may be conceded, for all the purposes of this case, that if the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company, or the Company which succeeded to its rights, privileges and immunities, had built a branch road under the charter of 1857, it could, in respect to that branch, have stood upon the exemption con- [574] tained in its charter. Any stock issued by it and sold to aid in the construction of such a branch road would, in that case, have been on the same footing in all respects as other stock it may have issued; and its main and branch lines would have been parts of the same system, controlled by the board of directors as they deemed proper. But the company elected not to adopt that course, for the reason, perhaps, that it could not, in that mode, have raised the money necessary to build a branch road. In the condition in which all the railroads of Missouri were left by the civil war, it would have been difficult to raise money to build branch roads, if their future was to be endangered by connection with main lines which needed repairs, and the corporations owning which were without credit. It was, doubtless, for that reason the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company, instead of constructing a branch road under the charter of 1857, determined to avail itself of the provisions of the Statute of 1868, which permitted it to construct and maintain what is called a branch road, but what, in fact, would be a road having only nominal connection with the main line of the company.

The branch roads to which the charter of the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company referred were, in our judgment, such as would be subject to the same control and management as its main line, and not roads that were branch roads only in name, but were distinct lines, operated solely with reference to the interests and pursuant to the directions of those holding stock therein, irrespective of the necessities of the main line.

To avoid the conclusion that there was a purpose to devise a plan whereby railroad property should be exempt from taxation, which the Constitution of 1865 intended should be taxed, we must assume that the Legislature intended to invite railroad corporations having general power under their charters to construct branch roads, to waive the exercise of such power, and construct roads under the provisions of the Act of 1868 which, although not granting an immunity from taxation, yet afforded peculiar protection to those whose money might be used in such construction.

[575] To say the least, it is not clear that the Legislature intended that the exemption from taxation, given by such charters as that granted to the St. Joseph and Iowa Railroad Company, should be extended to branch roads constructed under the Act of 1868. As that statute does not grant immunity from taxation to roads constructed under its provisions, and as the system established by it is complete in itself without reference to other legislative enactments, the present claim to exemption must be denied; for it is the settled doctrine of this court that an immunity from taxation by the State will not be recognized unless granted in terms too plain to be mistaken. Providence Bank v. Billings, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 514 [7: 939]; Philadelphia & W. R. R. Co. v. Maryland, 51 U. S. 10 How. 376 [13: 461]; Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Commissioners, 112 U. S. 609, 617 [28: 837, 840]; Southwestern R. R. Co. v. Wright, 116 U. S. 231, 236 [29: 626, 628]; Vicksburg, etc. R. R. Co. v. Dennis, 116 U. S. 665, 667 [29: 770, 771].

As our conclusion upon this point accords with that of the state court, and is sufficient to dispose of the whole case, we omit any consideration of other questions presented in argument.

Judgment affirmed.

ROBERT GILMER, Appt., [586]
v.
WILLIAM W. STONE ET AL., Exrs. of ROBERT GILMER, Deceased, ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 586–595.)

Wills—latent ambiguity—extrinsic evidence, admissible—charitable bequest—Illinois Act of April 18, 1872.

1. Extrinsic evidence is admissible to remove a latent ambiguity in a will.

2. Extrinsic evidence of the uniform relations of the testator to the subject of foreign and home missions, and to certain societies engaged in that kind of work, and of his church relations, is admissible to explain a bequest to "The Board of Foreign and the Board of Home Missions," several different churches having such boards.

3. Neither the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church nor its Board of Home Missions is a church, congregation, or society formed for the purpose of religious worship, within the meaning of the Illinois Act of April 18, 1872, forbidding such societies from receiving by gift, devise or purchase more than ten acres of land.

Submitted Dec. 20, 1886. Decided March 7, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. D. T. Littler, Bradley & Bradley, L. A. Whipp and R. E. Lewis, for appellant:

The eleventh clause of the will which the court is now asked to construe is void and meaningless, and no estate can pass to the Board of Home and Foreign Missions, by reason of ambiguity, and the heir must take the estate.

A gift or devise of real estate to a corporation by name alone, where no use or purpose is expressed, is absolutely void and cannot be enforced by any aid to be derived from a court of equity.

The bequest being of real estate, the defendants, the Board of Home and Foreign Mission of the State of New York, being religious foreign corporations, cannot under the Statutes of Illinois take (if at all) more than ten acres each of lands by the devise.

Mr. James McCartney, for appellees:

When all the clauses of the will are properly considered, together with the evidence disclosed by the record showing that the testator was a member of the Presbyterian Church at Irish Grove, and had been since 1859; was an active, zealous and prompt supporter and contributor and attendant; was an elder and member of the session; was prompt and punctual in those relations; that the church to which he sustained such relations was in the habit of taking up collections for the Board of Home Missions and Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church of the United States; that the testator uniformly for a series of years, and only terminating with his death, appeared especially interested in these Boards, "and always desired his means should be contributed in that direction; it becomes clear that by the terms, "the Board of Foreign Missions and the Board of Home Missions," used in the connection in which these words were, the testator meant the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church of the United States and the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church of the United States. It can scarcely admit of well founded doubt that the circumstances under which the words were used by the testator in the will, together with his declarations before the making of the instrument, may be proven in order to determine what meaning is to be given to the words as used. This may well be considered the settled doctrine alike of the English and American courts.

Where a corporation by the law of its creation is authorized, in some cases and for some purposes, or to a certain extent, to take and hold the title to real estate, it cannot be a question by any party except the State whether its real estate has been acquired for the authorized uses or not, or is in excess of the capacity of the corporation to take and hold. The State alone, in a direct proceeding, must assert her policy in that regard.

Robert Gilmer, late of Irish Grove, Menard County, Illinois, died December 31, 1883, having made a last will by which he disposed of his entire estate, consisting of about $4,000 in personal property, and from three to four hundred acres of land in that State. The eleventh clause of the will is in these words: "I also, after paying all debts and claims against my estate, bequeath and devise the remainder of my estate to be equally divided between the Board of Foreign and the Board of Home Missions." The object of the present suit is to obtain a decree declaring that clause to be void, and directing the estate of the testator, after meeting the debts and the bequests contained in other clauses, to be paid to the complainant, the uncle and only heir at law of the decedent.

The "Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America" and the "Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America"—corporations created under the laws of New York—severally appeared, were made defendants, and filed answers, each claiming the right to share in the devise in the eleventh clause of the will. The executors admit the justice of these claims, but ask the direction of the court in the premises. To these answers a general replication was filed; and, the cause having been heard upon the pleadings and proofs, the bill was dismissed with costs.

It is agreed in the case that the Baptist, Methodist, Episcopal, and other churches, like the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, have boards of home and foreign missions; consequently, it is contended, the eleventh clause of the will is void for uncertainty as to the donee and the purposes of the gift. In this view we do not concur. It is undoubtedly the rule, in respect to the testamentary disposition of property, real and personal, that uncertainty either as to the subject or object of a devise will be fatal to its validity. But that rule has no application here; for, if there were no other fact in the case than that there are numerous boards which may be generally described by the words, the "board of foreign missions," and "the board of home missions," the devise in the eleventh clause would not fail. With respect to charities, gifts may be good which, with respect to individuals, would be void; "and where there are two charities of the same name the legacy will be divided between them, if it cannot be ascertained which was the intended object." 1 Jarm. Wills, 876. Can it be ascertained by competent evidence which of these various boards were the objects of the testator's bounty? [589]

In the fourth clause of the will, the testator bequeathed his library to the Presbyterian Church of Irish Grove; in the ninth, $500 toward the erection of a Presbyterian church in Greenview, Illinois, provided the same was built within two years from the date of the will; otherwise, the money should revert to his estate; and in the tenth, he bequeathed $50 to be paid on the minister's salary of the Presbyterian Church of Irish Grove for the year 1884.

And there was extrinsic evidence to the following effect: that the testator had been for many years a member and ruling elder of the Irish Grove Presbyterian Church, one of the local congregations of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America; that collections were annually taken up in that congregation for the various boards of that church, including its Boards of Foreign and Home Missions; that while it was announced from the pulpit that collections would be taken for the Board of Foreign Missions or the Board of Home Missions, without, in words, naming the Presbyterian Church, all such collections, with the knowledge and assent of the church session, of which the testator was an active and zealous member, were, without exception, sent to the officers of the Presbyterian Boards of Foreign and Home Missions in New York City, and regular reports thereof made to the session; that the testator took especial interest in the work of those particular Boards and uniformly contributed thereto; and that he did not, so far as his pastor or associates in the church session knew, make contributions to the societies of [590] any other church, except to the Bible Society which was sustained by several religious organizations.

Of the competency of this evidence there can be no doubt. The purpose of it was to place the court, as far as possible, in the situation in which the testator stood, and thus bring the words employed by him into contact with the circumstances attending the execution of the will. Such proof does not contradict the terms of that instrument, nor tend to wrest the words of the testator from their natural operation. It serves only to identify the institutions described by him as "the Board of Foreign and the Board of Home Missions;" and thus the court is enabled to avail itself of the light which the circumstances in which the testator was placed at the time he made the will would throw upon his intention. "The law is not so unreasonable," says Mr. Wigram, "as to deny to the reader of an instrument the same light which the writer enjoyed." Wigram, Wills, 2d Am. ed. 161. The proof made a case of latent ambiguity. Such an ambiguity may arise, "either when it names a person as the object of a gift or a thing as the subject of it, and there are two persons or things that answer such name or description; or, secondly, it may arise when the will contains a misdescription of the object or subject." Patch v. White, 117 U. S. 217 [29: 864]. In the same case it was observed that "as a latent ambiguity is only disclosed by extrinsic evidence it may be removed by extrinsic evidence." See also Allen's Exrs. v. Allen, 59 U. S. 18 How. 385, 393 [15: 396, 399]; Hinckley v. Thatcher, 139 Mass. 477; Breckenridge v. Duncan, 2 A. K. Marsh. 51, 12 Am. Dec. 359; Morgan v. Burrows, 45 Wis. 217; Brewster v. McCall, 15 Conn. 274; Tilton v. Am. Bible Society, 60 N. H. 382; 1 Jarm. Wills, 423, 431; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 290.

Construing, then, the will with reference to the extrinsic evidence of the uniform relations of the testator to the subject of foreign and home missions, and to certain societies engaged in that kind of work, it is not to be doubted that, in the eleventh clause, he had in mind the Boards of Foreign and Home Missions of the [591] general religious society or organization of which he was a member and officer. The words of the will very well apply to such an object, and, therefore, in so interpreting its provisions, no violence is done to the language employed by the testator.

It is also contended that the Boards of Foreign and Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America are foreign religious societies, or foreign societies organized for religious purposes, and, as such, cannot, under the laws of Illinois, take exceeding ten acres of land each, and that the devise in the eleventh clause, being of more than three hundred acres of land jointly, is void and must fail.

In the case of Christian Union v. Yount, 101 U. S. 360 [25: 891], decided in 1879, we considered the question whether a conveyance made in 1870, by a citizen of Illinois, of real estate there situated, of the value of $10,000, to the American and Foreign Christian Union, a New York corporation, was void under the laws of Illinois—the object of that corporation being, "by missions, colportage, the press, and other appropriate agencies, to diffuse and promote the principles of religious liberty and a pure evangelical Christianity, both at home and abroad, wherever a corrupt Christianity exists." The validity of the conveyance was sustained upon the ground that the law of Illinois, as it existed in 1870, did not preclude a benevolent or missionary corporation of another State, being thereunto authorized by its own charter, from taking title to real estate within her limits, by purchase, gift, devise or in any other manner.

It is however insisted that the force of that decision is weakened, if not destroyed, by the failure of the court to refer to section 44 of chapter 24 of the Revised Statutes of 1845, making it lawful for "the members of any society or congregation," theretofore formed or thereafter to be formed, "for purposes of religious worship," to "receive by gift, devise or purchase, a quantity of land not exceeding ten acres, and to erect or build thereon such houses and buildings as they may deem necessary for the purposes aforesaid, and to make such other use of the land and make such other improvements thereon as may be deemed necessary for the comfort and convenience of such society or [592] congregation." Rev. Stat. 1845, p. 120. Counsel overlook the fact that the court in Christian Union v. Yount referred incidentally, and as indicating the general course of legislation in Illinois, to the like provision in the Act of 1872. No comment was made upon that provision, for the reason that it had no application to the case; there being no claim, as there could not well have been, that the American and Foreign Christian Union was, within the meaning of the statute, a society or congregation "for purposes of religious worship."

In St. Peter's R. C. Congregation v. Germain, 104 Ill. 440, the Supreme Court of the State held that the foregoing section of the Act of 1845 was not repealed by the Act of March 8, 1869, providing "For the holding of Roman Catholic churches, cemeteries and other property," but was displaced by the 42d section of the Act of April 18, 1872 (chap. 32, Revision, 1874), which last section, however, the court said, was substantially the same as the 44th section of the Act of 1845, and to be regarded as, in effect, merely continuing the latter in force.

We have, therefore, to inquire whether the devise in question is void under the Act of April 18, 1872. That Act makes provision for the formation of corporations for any lawful purpose, except banking, insurance, real estate brokerage, the business of loaning money, and the operation of railroads other than horse and dummy railroads. It also makes provision for the incorporation of societies, corporations, and associations for any lawful purpose, not for pecuniary profit, "capable of taking, purchasing, holding and disposing of real and personal estate for purposes of their organization." Secs. 29, 31.

The Act proceeds:

"Sec. 35. The foregoing provisions shall not apply to any religious corporation; but any church, congregation, or society, formed for the purpose of religious worship, may become incorporated in the manner following, to wit.* * *

"Sec. 41. Upon the incorporation of any congregation, church or society, all real and personal property held by any person or trustees for [593] the use of the members thereof, shall immediately vest in such corporation and be subject to its control, and may be used, mortgaged, sold and conveyed the same as if it had been conveyed to such corporation by deed; but no such conveyance or mortgage shall be made so as to affect or destroy the intent or effect of any grant, devise or donation that may be made to such person or trustee for the use of such congregation, church or society.

"Sec. 42. Any corporation that may be formed for religious purposes under this Act or under any law of this State for the incorporation of religious societies, may receive by gift, devise or purchase, land not exceeding in quantity (including that already held by such corporation) ten acres, and may erect or build thereon such houses, buildings or other improvements as it may deem necessary for the convenience and comfort of such congregation, church or society, and may lay out and maintain thereon a burying ground; but no such property shall be used except in the manner expressed in the gift, grant or devise, or, if no use or trust is so expressed, except for the benefit of the congregation, church or society for which it was intended."

The 45th section permits any congregation, church or society incorporated under the Act, to receive by grant, devise or bequest, real estate, not exceeding forty acres, for the purpose of holding camp meetings. Rev. Stat. 1874, p. 292-3.

Assuming, for the purposes of this case only, that a church, congregation or society formed under the laws of another State, for the purposes of religious worship in that State, could not lawfully receive by gift, devise or purchase, land, in Illinois, in excess of the quantity which may be received in either of those modes by a similar corporation formed under the laws of Illinois, we are satisfied that the sections last quoted from the Act of 1872 do not embrace corporations of the class to which these Boards of Foreign and Home Missions belong. The Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America was formed "for the purpose of establishing and conducting Christian missions among the unevangelized or pagan nations, and the general diffusion of [594] Christianity." Its power to hold real or personal estate in New York is restricted to such quantity as will produce an annual income not exceeding $20,000. The object of the Board of Home Missions of that church is "to assist in sustaining the preaching of the Gospel in feeble churches and congregations in connection with the Presbyterian Church in the United States, and generally to superintend the whole of home missions in the behalf of such church as the General Assembly shall, from time to time, direct; and also to receive, take charge of, and disburse all property and funds which, at any time, and from time to time, may be intrusted to said church or said Board for home missionary purposes." It cannot take and hold real or personal property, the annual income of which shall exceed $200,000.

While these Boards are important agencies in aid of the general religious work of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, neither of them is, in any proper sense, or in the meaning of the 35th section of the Act of 1872, a church, congregation, or society formed for the purpose of religious worship. The counsel for the plaintiff in error seem to lay stress upon the more general words, "formed for religious purposes," in the 42d section of the Act; but manifestly the other parts of the same section, and previous sections, show that the only corporations intended to be restricted in the ownership of land to ten acres, were those formed for the purpose of "religious worship," and not to organizations commonly called benevolent or missionary societies. The reasons of public policy which restrict societies, formed for the purpose of religious worship, in their ownership of real estate, do not apply at all, or, if at all, only with diminished force, to corporations which have no ecclesiastical control of those engaged in religious worship, and cannot prescribe the forms of such worship, nor subject to ecclesiastical discipline those who fail to conform to the rules, usages, or orders of the religious society of which they are members.

This conclusion does not, in the slightest degree, conflict with the decision in St. Peter's R. C. Congregation v. Germain [supra]. That was the case of a conveyance of about eighty acres of land directly to a congregation or society [595] "formed for the purpose of religious worship," as distinguished from a benevolent or missionary organization. The court held that, under the legislation of Illinois, "A religious corporation is authorized to receive or acquire lands to the extent of ten acres, and no more. Any amount in excess of that is expressly forbidden by statute; and it follows that all conveyances, deeds, or other contracts made in violation of this prohibition are absolutely void."

As the eleventh clause was intended to pass, and was valid for the purpose of passing, to the Boards of Foreign and Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, the estate thereby devised, the decree must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

Reissued letters patent—validity—construction of—want of novelty.

Reissued letters patent Nos. 2355 and 2356, for an improved process of bronzing or coloring iron and for the product resulting therefrom, are either void for want of novelty, or they must be restricted exactly to what is described—a simultaneous and joint oxidation of the iron and the oil after the application of the oil to a cleansed surface of cast iron.

Argued Jan. 10, 11, 1887. Decided March 7, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut. Reported below, 19 Blatchf. 538. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. James E. Maynadier and Elihu G. Loomis, for appellant.

Messrs. John K. Beach, Charles E. Mitchell and John S. Beach, for appellee.

[443] Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity to restrain the alleged infringement of reissued letters patent Nos. 2355 and 2356, dated September 11, 1866, granted to the Tucker Manufacturing Company, as assignee of Hiram Tucker, and owned by the complainant; the former being for an improved process of bronzing or coloring iron, the latter for the product resulting from that process.

The specifications in the reissued patent No. 2355 are as follows:

"Metals have heretofore been lacquered or bronzed by the application of a solution of resin and metallic powders or salts, and dried by exposure to air or heat. Iron has been japanned by covering its surface with oily solutions of asphaltum and pigments and subsequent application of heat sufficient to produce hardness. These are well known operations.

"My invention consists in a process of covering iron with a very thin coating of oil, and then subjecting it to heat, the effect of which is to leave upon the iron a firm film, which is very durable, and gives the iron a highly ornamental appearance, like that of bronze.

"In practice I proceed as follows: The surface of the iron is cleansed from sand, scale, or [444] other foreign matter, and where fine effects are desired the surface is best made smooth or polished. Under given conditions of heating and oiling the finer the polish the lighter is the bronze tint produced. In cases where ornamentation is obtained by relief the salient parts should be the most highly polished or most smoothly surfaced in order that the color produced upon them shall not be so deep as it is on those parts which are in the rear, so as to imitate thereby more nearly the effects of genuine bronze, in which its natural oxidation is apt to be worn somewhat away from its salient parts, and therefore lighter in color.

"When the iron is thus prepared I cover it with a very thin coating of linseed oil, or any oil which is the equivalent therefor, for the purpose here specified (such a coating as I find best attained by applying the oil with a brush, and then rubbing off the oiled surface thoroughly with a rag, sponge, or other suitable implement), and then place it in an oven, where it is submitted to a degree of heat which may be measured by an intensity sufficient to change a brightened surface of clean, unoiled iron to a color varying from a light straw color to a deep blue, the lowest degree of heat producing the lightest colored changes and the lightest bronze, and the highest degree of heat producing the darkest colored changes and the darkest bronze. It is important that the coating of oil be made extremely thin, as a coating of any material thickness will leave a rough or varied surface after the heat is applied. As the oiled iron becomes heated the color obtained will be bronze, of an intensity corresponding to the degree of heat employed; but it should be observed that the heat may be made so intense and so long continued as to destroy the oil, in which case the iron will lose the bronze tint acquired and will assume the dark blue shade.

"The perfection of the results obtained under these instructions will of course depend, in a considerable degree, upon the dexterity and watchfulness of the operator in applying the oil and in regulating the heat.

"In practice I prefer to use boiled linseed oil. When the desired shade of bronzing is obtained the iron is removed from the oven or furnace, and, if desired, may again be treated with oil [445] as before, even if not cool, and then again submitted to the action of heat, as described, and the operation of oiling and heating may be repeated indefinitely, each repetition deepening the shade of the bronzing. I recommend that at each repetition the degree of heat should be less than the degree immediately before employed; and in oiling and heating more than once I recommend for the second and succeeding oilings the use of a dry hog-hair brush to take off the surplus oil. The process may be carried to such an extent by repetition of oiling and heating as to produce a very dark color; black even may be thus produced.

"I have specially described linseed oil as preferred by me for the practice of my invention because of its good drying quality and its capacity of giving a good, uniform, smooth film when spread thinly upon the iron, as before described.

"Slight variations from the degree of heat above mentioned may be allowed without departing from the principle of my invention.

"What I claim and desire to secure by letters patent is the process of ornamenting iron in imitation of bronze by the application of oil and heat, substantially as described."

Reissued patent No. 2356 is for a new article of manufacture, but the description of the method is the same as that contained in the specifications in the patent for the process; the claim, however, being as follows: "What I claim and desire to secure by letters patent is the new manufacture hereinabove described, consisting of iron ornamented in imitation of bronze by the application of oil and heat, substantially as described."

These two reissues were based upon the surrender of a prior original patent, dated December 15, 1863, covering both claims. These reissued patents were the subject of litigation before Mr. Justice Clifford in Tucker v. Tucker Mfg. Co. 4 Cliff. 397, and before Judge Lowell in Tucker v. Burditt, 5 Fed. Rep. 808, and Tucker v. Dana, 7 Fed. Rep. 213. The decree below was in favor of the defendants on the ground that there was no infringement. Tucker v. Sargent & Co. 19 Blatchf. 538. The infringe- [446] ment alleged was in the manufacture and sale of cast iron butts, samples of which were produced and marked as exhibits. These are described in the opinion of the circuit court, from whose decree this appeal is prosecuted, as follows:

"These butts are colored in this way: The sunken parts are first covered with a black japan, and this coat of blacking is baked in an oven at a temperature not exceeding 320 degrees Fahrenheit. This japanning of the sunken parts is immaterial. It is not really claimed to be a Tucker bronzing. The object probably is to make a marked contrast between the sunken and salient parts of the butt. All but the sunken parts are then ground and subjected to a heat of 480 degrees Fahrenheit, which colors the iron a dark straw color. The ground parts of one of the exhibits are nearly or quite blue. A coat of copal varnish of substantial thickness is then put on and baked in a heat of not over 300 degrees Fahrenheit. This produces a material coating of oxidized varnish upon the surface of the iron, which can be scraped up by a rapidly drawn knife blade as a shaving rolls up before the knife of a plane. It was not claimed by the defendant that the varnish was not oxidized by the heat. No proof was offered by the plaintiff in regard to the oxidation of the iron during the second heating, and I do not think it of importance. The plaintiff relies upon the uncontradicted fact that by successive applications of heat the iron and varnish were oxidized, and if an iron surface oxidized by heat with a coating of varnish oxidized by heat necessarily make Tucker bronze, then the defendant infringes the plaintiff's patents."

In order to determine the question of infringement it is necessary to consider the state of the art at the date of the patent. It appears from the evidence that one F. W. Brocksieper, in the employ of certain firms and companies, the predecessors of the defendant, between 1849 and 1859, as a foreman in the ornamental department of their work, in the year 1857, introduced into the business a mode of treating hat hooks, coat hooks, jamb hooks, sash fasteners, match boxes, looking-glass frames, and cast iron horses for saddlers' windows, in the following way :

[447] "We had the castings cast with a facing, so as to come out of the sand very nearly entirely free of sand, then those castings rolled, drilled and countersunk, the highest parts or the prominent parts of the ornaments brightened with sand paper or emery paper, brushed clean from dust, then sized and baked. In order to handle them easy, those hooks, we had them fastened on a block with a spring and sized them in quantities as they were ordered, let them stand long enough so that the size would not stick to the fingers, then we put them in pans, or on hooks, and put them in the kiln to bake. The size was a mixture of equal parts of turpentine, copal varnish and linseed oil, and was applied in a very thin coat, put on with a stiff, fine brush as lightly as he could. The kiln was heated to 420 degrees Fahrenheit. Several batches of hooks of from twelve dozen to twenty-four dozen each, between one hundred dozen and two hundred dozen sash fasteners, about one hundred looking-glass frames and horses in 'considerable quantities' were made and sold. The match boxes were probably made in larger quantities."

It was contended by the plaintiff that this process was not the same as that covered by his patents, for two reasons: 1, because, as he claimed, the iron was not oxidized by the heat; and 2, because the coating of size was too thick to make genuine Tucker bronze. The circuit court, in its opinion in this case, agreed upon this point with the plaintiff, that the process and article produced were different from those covered by the plaintiff's patents, on the ground that the coating of baked size over the iron was too thick, although it held that Brocksieper's method must have resulted in oxidizing the iron. The inference was that bright cast iron oxidized and covered with a coat of oxidized oil, varnish or size might be, but was not necessarily Tucker bronze. The latter product and process were defined by that court in its opinion as follows:

"Tucker bronze is a new surface of the iron produced by the joint oxidation or by the successive oxidations of the iron and a film of oil or varnish thereon, by means of high heat, and is not a new coating of oxidized oil or varnish upon the iron. The oil must be applied in such a way that after oxidation there is no substantial covering of baked oil upon the surface of the iron. The surface of the iron is a bronzed surface, because the film of the oil is [448] so thin and is so closely united with the pores of the iron as to be almost a part of it, and does not form a substantial covering like a coat of varnish over the surface of the iron.

"In Tucker bronze which has been subjected to one heat, the film of oil can with difficulty be scraped off with a knife. When the iron has had two or three successive applications of oil and has been heated two or three times, the oil comes off by scraping, in the form of little flakes or of powder.

"Tucker's discovery was that bright cast iron covered with a thin film of oil would take on, by the action of high heat, a new surface resembling bronze."

It was found from the evidence that the defendant covered the oxidized surface of iron with an oxidized coat of varnish, doing no more than what Brocksieper did in 1857, except that he did it in two successive stages instead of one, and for that reason there was no infringement. Although there are two patents, one for a process and the other for a product, there is in fact but one invention; and it may be assumed that the new article of manufacture called Tucker bronze is a product which results from the use of the process described in the patent, and not one which may be produced in any other way. So that, whatever likeness may appear between the product of the process described in the patent and the article made by the defendants, their identity is not established unless it is shown that they are made by the same process. The specimens exhibited in the case, as made by Brocksieper, have not the same external appearance as Tucker bronze; they are easily distinguished by inspection, and the process employed by Brocksieper seems to differ from that of the Tucker patents only in respect to the thickness of the sizing of oil or varnish applied upon the surface of the iron, unless the peculiarity of the Tucker bronze can be attributed to the fact that the thin film of oil or varnish was applied upon the surface of the iron before the application of the heat, and not after. For, although the patent contemplates and describes successive applications of heat, yet in each case it is to an oiled surface of iron. On the other hand, the method employed [449] by the defendants consists, first, in subjecting the cleansed surface of the iron to a heat of 480 degrees Fahrenheit, sufficient to change its color by oxidizing, and then applying a coat of copal varnish and heating again to a point not in excess of 300 degrees Fahrenheit, which, while sufficient to harden and color the varnish by what is called the process of oxidation, yet is not sufficient to oxidize the iron itself. It is difficult, if not impossible, to distinguish by the eye the result of this process from Tucker bronze made according to the patents, but the two processes differ in the particulars pointed out; the effect in Tucker bronze appearing to be produced by the joint oxidation of the iron and the oil, while in the defendant's product the result is attained by successive heatings, first of the iron and then of the iron and oil, the heat, in the second step of the process, not being sufficient to cause a joint oxidation of the iron and the oil.

It seems necessarily to follow from this view either that the Tucker patents are void by reason of the anticipation practiced by Brocksieper, or that the patented process and product must be restricted to exactly what is described, that is, to a simultaneous and joint oxidation of the iron and the oil after the application of the oil to a cleansed surface of cast iron. To that extent the patents may be sustained, but upon that construction they do not include the process and product of the defendants; there is consequently no infringement.

In opposition to this conclusion it is contended on the part of the appellants that the witnesses who testify to the methods employed by Brocksieper in 1857 have confounded in their memory the actual facts in regard to that method as then practiced with processes subsequently employed, and which could have been learned only after the issue of the Tucker patent in 1868; and in corroboration of that criticism upon this evidence it is shown that reproductions of the Brocksieper method, made under the eye of the examiner by a competent expert, during the progress of the taking of the testimony, were not distinguishable in appearance from Tucker bronze made according to the patents. We are not, however, able to [450] adopt that view of the evidence. The fact that by careful workmanship the products are indistinguishable by mere inspection does not establish the identity of the processes; and as the patent for the product must be limited to an article made by the particular process, the inquiry must be determined by a comparison between the methods actually employed. As that used by the defendants differs from that described in the patent, just as that employed by Brocksieper does, the process of the defendants cannot be construed as an infringement without at the same time declaring that used by Brocksieper to be an anticipation.

The decree of the Circuit Court must, therefore, be affirmed.

ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY OF NORTH AMERICA, Plff. in Err., [527]
v.
LORETTA M. CRANDAL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 527-534.)

Accident insurance—death of assured by hanging himself while insane—company liable—practice—waiver of objection.

1. A policy of insurance against "bodily injuries, effected through external, accidental and violent means," and providing that "This insurance shall not extend to death or disability which may have been caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease, or by suicide, or self inflicted injuries," covers a death caused by the assured hanging himself while temporarily insane.

2. The refusal by the trial court to instruct the jury, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, to find for the defendant, cannot be assigned for error where the defendant subsequently introduced evidence in his own behalf.

Submitted Dec. 21, 1886. Decided March 7, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Opinion below, 27 Fed. Rep. 40. Affirmed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action against an Accident Insurance Company upon a policy beginning thus:

"In consideration of the warranties made in the application for this insurance, and of the sum of fifty dollars, this Company hereby insures Edward M. Crandal, by occupation, profession or employment a president of the Crandal Manufacturing Company," in the sum of ten thousand dollars for twelve months, ending May 23, 1885, payable to his wife, the original plaintiff, "within thirty days after sufficient proof that the insured at any time within the continuance of this policy shall have sustained bodily injuries, effected through external, accidental and violent means within the intent and meaning of this contract and the conditions hereunto annexed, and such injuries alone shall have occasioned death within ninety days from the happening thereof; or if the insured shall sustain bodily injuries by means as aforesaid, which shall, independently of all other causes, immediately and wholly disable and [528] prevent him from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to the occupation under which he is insured, then, on satisfactory proof of such injuries, he shall be indemnified against loss of time caused thereby in the sum of fifty dollars per week for such period of continuous total disability as shall immediately follow the accident and injuries as aforesaid, not exceeding, however, twenty-six consecutive weeks from the time of the happening of such accident."

Then followed certain conditions, the material part of which was as follows: "Provided, always, That this insurance shall not extend to hernia, nor to any bodily injury of which there shall be no external and visible sign; nor to death or disability which may have been caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease, or by the taking of poison, or by any surgical operation or medical or mechanical treatment; and no claim shall be made under this policy when the death or injury may have been caused by dueling, fighting, wrestling, unnecessary lifting, or by over exertion, or by suicide, or by freezing, or sunstroke, or self-inflicted injuries."

The application was signed by the assured, and began as follows:

"The undersigned hereby applies for a policy of insurance against bodily injuries effected through external and accidental violence, said policy to be based upon the following statement of facts, which I hereby warrant to be true."

The rest of the application consisted of fifteen numbered paragraphs, stating the name, age, residence and occupation of the applicant, the amount, term and payee of the policy applied for; affirming that he had never been "subject to fits, disorders of the brain or any bodily or mental infirmity;" that he had not "in contemplation any special journey or any hazardous undertaking," and that "his habits of life are correct and temperate;" and expressing his understanding of the effect of the insurance in several particulars; the last of which was as follows:

"15. I am aware that this insurance will not extend to hernia, nor to any bodily injury of [529] which there shall be no external and visible sign, nor to any bodily injury happening directly or indirectly in consequence of disease, nor to death or disability caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or by disease, or by the taking of poison, or by any surgical operation or medical or mechanical treatment, nor to any case except when the accidental injury shall be the proximate and sole cause of disability or death."

The assured died July 7, 1884; and the plaintiff soon afterwards gave to the defendant written notice and proofs of the death, which stated that the assured, while temporarily insane, hanged himself with a pair of suspenders attached to a doorknob in his bedroom. At the trial, the plaintiff introduced evidence that the death of the assured was caused by strangulation from his so hanging himself; and, against the defendant's objection and exception, was permitted to introduce evidence tending to show that he was insane at the time. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury that under the law and the evidence in the case the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The court overruled the motion, and the defendant excepted. The defendant then introduced evidence, and the case was argued to the jury.

The jury, under instructions to which no exception was taken, and in answer to specific questions from the court, returned a special verdict that Edward M. Crandal made the application; that the defendant issued the policy; that the premiums were fully paid, and the policy was in force at the time of his death; that he hanged himself on July 7, 1884, and thereof died on the same day; that he was insane at the time of his act of self-destruction; and that due notice and proof of death were given to the defendant; and, according to what, upon these facts, the opinion of the court in matter of law might be, found for the plaintiff in the full amount of the policy, or for the defendant.

The court overruled a motion for a new trial, and rendered judgment on the verdict for the plaintiff. 27 Fed. Rep. 40.

The defendant sued out this writ of error.

Messrs. Thomas Bates, Thomas B. Brougham and Emerson B. Tuttle, for plaintiff in error:

The court erred in its construction of the contract, and in its finding that the policy of accident insurance covered the case shown by this record.

The court erred in finding that Edward M. Crandal's death was caused by accidental injuries alone, and to the exclusion of every other cause. Disease in a case like that at bar is the direct and proximate cause of death.

"When death is the result of insanity it is equally the result of disease, for which the insane is in no respect responsible. It is a well settled, philosophical fact that disturbed intelligence has the same relation to the brain that distorted respiration has to the lungs and pleura. Death then by an insane suicide is as much death by disease as if it were death by fever or consumption."

Eastabrook v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 54 Me. 224. See also St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Graves, 6 Bush, 268.

The court erred in finding that the death of Edward M. Crandal resulted from bodily injuries effected through external, accidental and violent means within the true intent and meaning of the policy in suit, and was not caused wholly or in part, either directly or indirectly, by bodily infirmities or disease.

The disease of insanity was the actual and proximate cause of Crandal's death.

Messrs. George S. House, Geo. C. Fry and Thomas E. Babb, for defendant in error:

The insured came to his death by external, accidental and violent means. This question arises upon the facts found in the special verdict, which, so far as material, are that the insured hanged himself and died from the effects thereof; that at the time of such act of self destruction he was insane.

The question presented is whether self destruction by an involuntary, irrational act is a death effected by external, accidental and violent means. "Human acts or actions are internal or external. In other words, they are not perceptible by sense, or they are perceptible by sense. Internal acts are demonstrations of the will. External acts are such motions of the body as are consequent upon determinations of the will."

1 Austin, Jur. 376.

"That which is purely accidental or fortuitous, can no more be charged to the account of the person whose act happens to be the occasion of the accident, than to that of anyone else."

Lawrence v. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 5 Ill. App. 280; Breasted v. Farmers L. & T. Co. 4 Hill, 73, 75.

"Self destruction by a fellow being bereft of reason can with no more propriety be ascribed to his own hand than to the deadly instrument that may have been used for the purpose."

Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Broughton, 109 U. S. 121 (27: 882); Karow v. Continental Ins. Co. 57 Wis. 56.

The case does not come within the condition against death caused by suicide or self-inflicted injuries.

The policy referring only to the warranties in the application, and containing no words to make the application or any part thereof, other than the warranties, a part of the policy, does not incorporate within itself the fifteenth clause of the application, which is not a warranty.

When a policy is issued with terms more favorable to the insured than his application, its language, wherein it differs from the application, controls, on its acceptance by the insured. This case shows an acceptance.

Myers v. Keystone Mut. L Ins. Co. 27 Pa. 268; Lawson, Presumptive Ev. rule 70, p. 303.

Granting that the fifteenth clause of the application is part of the contract, or, if not, that the condition against death caused by bodily disease extends to a death caused by mental disease, yet in the case at bar the proximate cause of death was not the disease but the immediate act of self destruction.

Scheffer v. R. R. Co. 105 U. S. 249 (26:1070); Reynolds v. Accidental Ins. Co. 22 L. T. (N. S.) 820; Lawrence v. Accidental Ins. Co. 7 L. R. Q. B. Div. 216; Miller v. Mut. B. F. Ins. Co. 31 Iowa, 236; Carter v. Towne, 103 Mass. 507; State v. Jones, 50 N. H. 398.

If there be a doubt whether the case is within the conditions of the policy, that doubt is to be resolved in favor of the defendant in error.

May, Ins. 2d ed. § 175; Eastabrook v. Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. 54 Me. 227.

[530] Mr. Justice Gray, after stating the case as above reported, delivered the opinion of the court:

The refusal of the court to instruct the jury, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, that she was not entitled to recover, cannot be assigned for error, because the defendant at the time of requesting such an instruction had not rested its case, but afterwards went on and introduced evidence in its own behalf. Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Cummings, 106 U. S. 700 [27: 266]; Bradley v. Poole, 98 Mass. 169. The subsequent instructions to the jury were not excepted to. No error is assigned in the previous rulings upon evidence, except in the admission, against the defendant's objection and exception, of evidence tending to prove the insanity of the assured. The only other matter open upon this record is whether the judgment for the plaintiff is supported by the special verdict, which finds that, while the policy was in force, the assured died by hanging himself, being at the time insane, and that due notice and proof of death were afterwards given. [531]

The single question to be decided therefore is whether a policy of insurance against "bodily injuries, effected through external, accidental and violent means," and occasioning death or complete disability to do business, and providing that "this insurance shall not extend to death or disability which may have been caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease, or by suicide, or self-inflicted injuries," covers a death by hanging oneself while insane.

The decisions upon the effect of a policy of life insurance, which provides that it shall be void if the assured "shall die by suicide," or "shall die by his own hand," go far towards determining this question. This court, on full consideration of the conflicting authorities upon that subject, has repeatedly and uniformly held that such a provision, not containing the words "sane or insane," does not include a self-killing by an insane person, whether his unsoundness of mind is such as to prevent him from understanding the physical nature and consequences of his act, or only such as to prevent him, while foreseeing and premeditating its physical consequences, from understanding its moral nature and aspect. Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 580 [21: 236]; Bigelow v. Berkshire L. Ins. Co. 93 U. S. 284 [23:918]; Insurance Co. v. Rodel, 95 U. S. 232 [24:433]; Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Broughton, 109 U. S. 121 [27: 878]. In the last case, which was one in which the assured hanged himself while insane, the court, repeating the words used by Mr. Justice Nelson, when Chief Justice of New York, said that "Self destruction by a fellow being bereft of reason can with no more propriety be ascribed to the act of his own hand than to the deadly instrument that may have been used by him for the purpose," and "was no more his act, in the sense of the law, than if he had been impelled by irresistible physical force." 109 U. S. 132 [27: 882]; Breasted v. Farmers Loan & T. Co. 4 Hill, 73. In a like case, Vice-Chancellor Wood (since Lord Chancellor Hatherley) observed that the deceased was "subject to that which is really just as much an accident as if he had fallen from the top of a house." Horn v. Anglo-Australian Ins. Co. 30 L. J. (N. S.) Ch. 511; S. C. 7 Jur. [532]

*See note to this case, Lawyers' edition. [Ed.]

(N. S.) 678. And in another case, Chief Justice Appleton said that "The insane suicide no more dies by his own hand than the suicide by mistake or accident," and that, under such a policy, "death by the hands of the insured, whether by accident, mistake, or in a fit of insanity, is to be governed by one and the same rule." Eastabrook v. Union Ins. Co. 54 Me. 224, 227, 229.

Many of the cases cited for the plaintiff in error are inconsistent with the settled law of this court as shown by the decisions above mentioned.

In this state of the law, there can be no doubt that the assured did not die "by suicide," within the meaning of this policy; and the same reasons are conclusive against holding that he died by "self-inflicted injuries." If "self-killing," "suicide," "dying by his own hand," cannot be predicated of an insane person, no more can "self-inflicted injuries;" for in either case it is not his act.

Nor does the case come within the clause which provides that the insurance shall not extend to "death or disability which may have been caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease."

If insanity could be considered as coming within this clause, it would be doubtful, to say the least, whether, under the rule of the law of insurance which attributes an injury or loss to its proximate cause only, and in view of the decisions in similar cases, the insanity of the assured, or anything but the act of hanging himself could be held to be the cause of his death. Scheffer v. R. R. Co. 105 U. S. 249, 252 [26: 1070, 1071]; Trew v. Railway Passengers Assur. Co. 5 H. & N. 211, and 6 H. & N. 839, 845; Reynolds v. Accidental Ins. Co. 22 Law Times (N. S.) 820; Winspear v. Accident Ins. Co. 42 Law Times (N. S.) 900; affirmed, 6 Q. B. D. 42; Lawrence v. Accidental Ins. Co. 7 Q. B. D. 216, 221; Scheidlerer v. Travellers' Ins. Co. 58 Wis. 13.

But the words "bodily infirmities or disease" do not include insanity. Although, as suggested by Mr. Justice Hunt, in Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 589 [21: 241], insanity [533] or unsoundness of mind often, if not always, is accompanied by or results from disease of the body, still, in the common speech of mankind, mental are distinguished from bodily diseases. In the phrase "bodily infirmities or disease," the word "bodily" grammatically applies to "disease," as well as to "infirmities;" and it cannot but be so applied, without disregarding the fundamental rule of interpretation, that policies of insurance are to be construed most strongly against the insurers who frame them. The prefix of "bodily" hardly affects the meaning of "infirmities," and it is difficult to conjecture any purpose in inserting it in this proviso, other than to exclude mental disease from the enumeration of the causes of death or disability to which the insurance does not extend.

In the argument for the plaintiff in error, some stress was laid on the fact that the concluding paragraph of the application differs in form of expression, so as to include mental as well as bodily diseases. It is by no means clear that this is so; but if it were, it would not affect the case. The whole application is not made part of the contract, and the only mention of it in the policy is in the opening words: "In consideration of the warranties made in the application for this insurance." This does not include all the statements in the application, but only those which are warranties. Some of them may be; others clearly are not. The statements as to the age, occupation, previous state of health and present habits of the assured, and as to his other insurance, may be warranties on his part. Those as to the amount, terms and payee of the policy applied for certainly are not. The statements expressing his understanding of what will be the effect of the insurance are statements not of fact, but of law, and cannot control the legal construction of the policy afterwards issued and accepted.

The death of the assured not having been the effect of any cause specified in the proviso of the policy, and not coming within any warranty in the application, the question recurs whether it is within the general words of the leading sentence of the policy, by which he is declared to be insured "against bodily injuries effected through external, accidental and violent means." This sentence does not, like the proviso, speak of what the injury is "caused [534] by;" but it looks only to the "means" by which it is effected. No one doubts that hanging is a violent means of death. As it affects the body from without, it is external, just as suffocation by drowning was held to be, in the cases of Trew, Reynolds and Winspear, above cited. And, according to the decisions as to suicide under policies of life insurance, before referred to, it cannot, when done by an insane person, be held to be other than accidental.

The result is that the judgment of the Circuit Court in favor of the plaintiff was correct, and must be affirmed.

Jurisdiction—original proceeding for mandamus, not within jurisdiction of circuit courts—such a proceeding, not removable—Act of March 3, 1875—section 716, R. S.

1. The circuit courts have no jurisdiction to award a mandamus, except as ancillary to some other proceeding establishing a demand, and reducing it to judgment, the mandamus being in the nature of process for executing the judgment.

2. An original proceeding for a mandamus is not a suit of a civil nature within the meaning of the Removal Act of March 3, 1875, and is not removable.

Submitted Jan. 17, 1887. Decided Mar. 7, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California. Opinion below, 28 Fed. Rep. 238. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. L. Rhodes and A. H. Garland, for plaintiff in error:

The action in each of these causes comes within the meaning of section 2 of the Act of 1875, and is a suit.

Weston v. Charleston, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 464 (7: 486).

Mandamus in modern practice is nothing more than an action at law between the parties, and is not now regarded as a prerogative writ.

Commonwealth of Ky. v. Dennison, 65 U. S. 24 How. 97 (16: 725); Kendall v. U. S. 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 615 (9: 1217); U. S. v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 392 (26: 170); Louis v. Brown Township, 109 U. S. 166 (27: 893); Kendall v. Stokes, 44 U. S. 3 How. 100 (11: 512).

The jurisdiction of the circuit court, on the removal of a cause, is not dependent upon the original jurisdiction of the circuit court.

Lexington v. Butler, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 292 (20: 811); Gaines v. Fuentes, 92 U. S. 17 (23: 527); Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 404 (25: 207); Hess v. Reynolds, 113 U. S. 73 (28: 927); Claflin v. Commonwealth Ins. Co. 110 U. S. 81 (28: 76); Davies v. Corbin, 112 U. S. 39 (28: 629).

The United States Courts afford to nonresidents remedies commensurate with the remedies given in and by the State where these courts are held.

Payne v. Hook, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 425 (19: 260); Whitton's Case, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 270 (20: 571); Thacher, Pr. 27-33.

Suits of a civil nature at common law are not restricted to the old settled forms of the common law, but include all remedies that are to be administered, not equitable, criminal, or of admiralty cognizance.

Thacher, Pr. 27.

Messrs. Philip G. Galpin and Geo. Flournoy, Jr., for defendants in error.

[451] Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 13th of October, 1885, Albert S. Rosenbaum brought an action in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, in the State of California, against John A. Bauer, Treasurer of the City and County of San Francisco. The complaint set forth the issuing of certain bonds, called Montgomery Avenue bonds, by the board of public works of the City and County of San Francisco, under an Act of the Legislature of California, approved April 1, 1872 (Stat. 1871-2, chap. 626), entitled "An Act to Open and Establish a Public Street in the City and County of San Francisco, to be called 'Montgomery Avenue,' and to Take Private Lands Therefor." The Act provided for the creation by taxation of a fund for the payment of interest on the bonds, and of a sinking fund for their redemption; and enacted that whenever such Treasurer should have in his custody $10,000 or more belonging to the sinking fund, he should advertise for proposals for the surrender and redemption of the bonds. The complaint alleged that the plaintiff owned twenty-one of the bonds of $1,000 each; that the Treasurer had in his hands over $12,000 belonging to the sinking fund; that the plaintiff had exhibited his bonds to the Treasurer and demanded that he advertise for proposals for the surrender of bonds issued under the Act; that he refused so to do; and that no part of such bonds had been paid. The complaint prayed for a judgment that the defendant, "as Treasurer of the City and County of San Francisco, be commanded to advertise for the redemption of Montgomery Avenue bonds, as in section eleven of the Act hereinabove referred [452] to provided."

Three days afterwards the plaintiff filed a petition for the removal of the suit into the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California on the ground that the plaintiff was a citizen of New York and the defendant a citizen of California. The state court made an order of removal. The record being filed in the federal court, the defendant demurred to the complaint, specifying as a ground of demurrer that the federal court had no jurisdiction of the subject of the action. The case being heard on the demurrer, the court made an order, on the 18th of January, 1886, that the cause be remanded to the state court, "this court having no jurisdiction of this cause in this form." The plaintiff has brought a writ of error to review that order.

The same Act provided that an annual tax should be levied on the property therein mentioned to raise money to pay the coupons annexed to the bonds, and another annual tax to create a sinking fund for the redemption of the bonds, the taxes to be levied in the manner in which other taxes are levied, that is by the Board of Supervisors. The same Rosenbaum, being the owner of twenty-one of the bonds, and of eight matured coupons, of $30 each, attached to each bond, each coupon being for six months interest, the first of them having matured January 1, 1882, brought an action on the 12th of December, 1885, in the said Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, against the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco. The complaint set forth that there were no funds in the hands of the Treasurer applicable to the payment of any of the coupons; and that the plaintiff had demanded of the Board that it levy a tax sufficient to pay the coupons, but it had refused so to do. The complaint prayed for a judgment "against said Board of Supervisors, commanding them to levy the tax hereinabove mentioned, and to continue to levy said tax from year to year until all the interest upon said bonds, and said bonds themselves, are fully paid."

On the 21st of December, 1885, the plaintiff [453] filed a petition for the removal of this latter suit into the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, on the ground of diversity of citizenship in the parties. The state court made an order of removal. The defendant made a motion in the federal court to remand the case to the state court on the ground of want of jurisdiction by the federal court "of the subject matter contained in the complaint." On the 24th of May, 1886, the court made an order granting the motion, and the plaintiff has brought a writ of error to review that order.

The circuit court, in remanding the causes (28 Fed. Rep. 223), proceeded on these grounds: (1) That it had always been held by this court that the circuit courts had no jurisdiction to award a mandamus except as ancillary to some other proceeding establishing a demand, and reducing it to judgment, the mandamus being in the nature of process for executing the judgment. (2) That a proceeding for a mandamus was not a suit of a civil nature, within the meaning of any provision of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470, and was not removable under it.

Prior to the Act of 1875 it was well settled that the circuit courts had no jurisdiction to issue a writ of mandamus in a case like the present.

In McIntire v. Wood, in 1813, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 504 [3: 420], it was held that a circuit court had no power to issue a mandamus to the register of a land-office of the United States, commanding him to grant a final certificate of purchase to the plaintiff for lands to which he supposed himself entitled under the laws of the United States. In that case the plaintiff's alleged right to a certificate of purchase was claimed under the laws of the United States, but this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Johnson, said that the power of the circuit courts to issue the writ was confined by section 14 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. at L. 81, to those cases in which it might be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction. This provision of section 14 appears now in section 716 of the Revised Statutes in these words: "Sec. 716. The supreme court and the circuit and district courts shall have power to issue writs of scire facias. They shall also have power to issue all writs not specifically provided for by statute, which [454] may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the usages and principles of law."

In McClung v. Silliman, in 1821, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 598 [5: 340], a mandamus was applied for in a Circuit Court of the United States to compel the register of a land-office of the United States to issue papers to show the preemptive interest of the plaintiff in certain land. The writ was refused. In this court, the case was sought to be distinguished from McIntire v. Wood, on the ground that the parties were citizens of different States. But the court, speaking again by Mr. Justice Johnson, said that no just inference was to be drawn from the decision in McIntire v. Wood, in favor of a case in which the circuit court was vested with jurisdiction by citizenship under section 11 of the Act of 1789. And then, in answer to the argument that, as the parties were citizens of different States, and competent to sue under section 11, the circuit court was, by section 14, vested with power to issue the writ as one "necessary for the exercise of its jurisdiction," the court said: "It cannot be denied that the exercise of this power is necessary to the exercise of jurisdiction in the court below; but why is it necessary? Not because that court possesses jurisdiction, but because it does not possess it. It must exercise this power and compel the emanation of the legal document, or the execution of the legal act by the register of the land-office, or the party cannot sue. The 14th section of the Act under consideration could only have been intended to vest the power now contended for in cases where the jurisdiction already exists, and not where it is to be courted or acquired by means of the writ proposed to be sued out."

Consistently with the views in those cases, this court, in Riggs v. Johnson County, in 1867, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 166 [18: 768], held that a circuit court had power to issue a mandamus to officers of a county, commanding them to levy a tax to pay a judgment rendered in that court against the county for interest on bonds issued by the county, where a statute of the State under which the bonds were issued had made such levy obligatory on the county. This ruling has been repeatedly followed since, and rests on the view that the issue of the mandamus is an award of execution on the judgment, and is a proceeding necessary to complete the jurisdiction exercised by rendering the judgment. [455]

In many cases adjudged in this court since McIntire v. Wood, that case has been referred to as settling the law on the point to which it relates; as in The Secretary v. McGarrahan, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 298, 311 [19: 579, 583]; Bath Co. v. Amy, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 244 [20: 539], and Heine v. Levee Comrs. 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 655 [22: 223].

In Bath County v. Amy, in 1871, ubi supra, the holder of bonds issued by a county in Kentucky applied to the Circuit Court of the United States for a mandamus to compel the county court to levy a tax to pay the interest on the bonds, on the ground that a statute of the State required the county court to do so. No judgment had been obtained for the interest. In Kentucky such a proceeding could have been maintained in a court of the State, without a prior judgment, and would have been there treated as a suit of a civil nature at common law, and not a mere incident to another suit. The circuit court awarded the mandamus, but this court reversed the judgment, holding that it was doubtful whether the writ of mandamus was intended to be embraced in the grant of power in the 11th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789 to the circuit courts, to take cognizance of suits of a civil nature, at common law, where the diversity of citizenship there specified existed; but that the special provision of the 14th section of the Act, while, no doubt, including mandamus under the term "other writs," indicated that the power to grant that writ generally was not understood to be covered by the 11th section. Citing the prior cases, the court said: "The writ cannot be used to confer a jurisdiction which the circuit court would not have without it. It is authorized only when ancillary to a jurisdiction already acquired."

The same doctrine was applied in Graham v. Norton, in 1872, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 427 [21: 177], where a Circuit Court of the United States had affirmed the action of a district court in granting a mandamus to compel a state auditor to issue certificates as to the amount of illegal taxes paid by the applicant, the issuing of such certificates being provided for by a statute of the State. This court held that neither the circuit court nor the district court had jurisdiction to issue the writ.

The same principles have been asserted by this court in cases arising since the Act of March 3, [456] 1875; as in County of Green v. Daniel, 102 U. S. 187, 195 [26: 99, 101]; in U. S. v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 378, 393 [26: 167, 170]; in Davenport v. County of Dodge, 105 U. S. 237, 242, 243 [26: 1018, 1021]; and in Louisana v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 711, 727 [27: 448, 453].

But now it is contended for the plaintiff in error that the circuit court can obtain jurisdiction of these cases by their removal under section 2 of the Act of 1875. It was evidently thought that the circuit court would have no original cognizance of them, if commenced in that court, for they were not brought in that court, although in the petition for removal in each proceeding the plaintiff states that he was a citizen of New York when it was commenced, and in the petition for removal in the first proceeding he states that Bauer was at its commencement a citizen of California, the defendant in the second proceeding being, when it was brought, a municipal corporation of California. The proceedings were evidently instituted with the purpose of removing them, for the petitions for removal were severally filed by the plaintiff three days and ten days after process was served on the defendant, and nothing was done in the state court but to file a complaint, and to serve a summons, and to take proceedings for a removal.

To maintain the jurisdiction by removal it is contended that that jurisdiction does not depend on the original jurisdiction of the circuit court; that the former may exist without the latter; and that in the present case it does exist.

The only possible ground of jurisdiction in the present cases is diversity of citizenship; for the right of action claimed does not arise under the Constitution, or a law or treaty of the United States. It exists, if at all, under a statute of the State. The State is not alleged to have passed any law impairing the obligation of any contract of which the plaintiff claims the benefit, or to have deprived him of any right secured to him by the Constitution of the United States. In respect to jurisdiction by citizenship, as applicable to this case, section 1 of the Act of 1875, in regard to original jurisdiction, and section 2, in regard to jurisdiction by removal, describe the subject matter of the [457] suit in terms which are the same legally. In section 1, the suit of which "original cognizance" is given is a suit "of a civil nature, at common law or in equity," where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $500, and "in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States." In section 2 the language is identical except that the suit is to be a suit "of a civil nature, at law or in equity." In section 11 of the Act of 1879, the original cognizance given to the circuit courts was of "all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity," where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $500, and "the suit is between a citizen of the State where the suit is brought and a citizen of another State." In section 12 of that Act, jurisdiction by removal was given to the circuit courts of a like suit. Now, if, as has always been held, "original cognizance," under section 11 of the Act of 1789, did not exist, of proceedings like those before us, founded on citizenship, it must necessarily follow that original cognizance cannot exist, under section 1 of the Act of 1875, of such a proceeding, founded on citizenship. If so, it is impossible to see how, with legally identical language in section 2 with that in section 1, jurisdiction by removal can exist, under section 2 of the Act of 1875, of proceedings like those before us, founded on citizenship. This view is entirely aside from the principle which has controlled in some cases, where a restriction as to original jurisdiction, contained in other provisions of section 11 of the Act of 1789, did not exist in section 12 of that Act, in regard to jurisdiction by removal, or in other removal statutes. Of that character was the restriction in section 11 on the right of an assignee of a chose in action to sue if the suit could not have been prosecuted in the court had the assignment not been made; as illustrated by the cases cited by the plaintiff in error, of City of Lexington v. Butler, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 282 [20: 809]; and Claflin v. Commonwealth Ins. Co. 110 U. S. 81 [28: 76].

In Gaines v. Fuentes, 92 U. S. 10 [23: 524], an application for removal was sustained under the Local Prejudice Act of March 2, 1867, 14 Stat. at L. 558, of a suit to annul a will, on the ground that the Act, in authorizing the removal, invested the federal court by that fact with all needed jurisdiction to adjudicate the case. But that case was not one of a mandamus, to which the implied restriction of the [458] statute in respect to that writ was applicable. The same remark may be made as to Boom Company v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403 [25: 206], where the removed proceeding was one to condemn lands for the use of a boom company; and as to Hess v. Reynolds, 113 U. S. 73 [28: 927], where the removal was of a proceeding in a probate court to obtain payment of a claim against the estate of a deceased person; and as to Bliven v. New England Screw Co. 3 Blatchf. 111, and Barney v. Globe Bank, 5 Blatchf. 107, where foreign corporations successfully maintained jurisdiction by removal, in ordinary suits, although they could not have been compulsorily brought into the circuit court by original process.

As this court, while sections 11 and 12 of the Act of 1789 were in force, and section 14 of that Act was also in force, always held, even where the requisite diversity of citizenship existed, that the restriction of section 14 operated to prevent original cognizance by a circuit court, under section 11, of a proceeding by mandamus not necessary for the exercise of a jurisdiction which had previously otherwise attached, so, with sections 1 and 2 of the Act of 1875 in force at the same time with section 716 of the Revised Statutes, the restriction of section 716 must operate to prevent cognizance by removal, by a circuit court, under section 2 of the Act of 1875, even where the requisite diversity of citizenship exists, of a like proceeding by mandamus. As was said by this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Miller, in Hess v. Reynolds, 113 U. S. 73, 79, 80 [28: 927, 929] the language of the repealing clause of the Act of 1875, is "that all Acts and parts of Acts in conflict with the provisions of this Act are hereby repealed," and the statute to be repealed must be in conflict with the Act of 1875, or that effect does not follow. There is nothing in section 2, or any other part of the Act of 1875, which is in conflict with, or has the effect to abolish, the restriction of section 716, just as there was nothing in section 11 or section 12, or any other part, of the Act of 1789, which was in conflict with, or had the effect to abolish, the restriction of section 14 of that Act.

These cases fall directly within the provision

[459] of section 5 of the Act of 1875, that if, in any suit removed from a state court to a Circuit Court of the United States, it shall appear to the satisfaction of said circuit court, at any time after such suit has been brought or removed thereto, that such suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly "within the jurisdiction" of said circuit court, the said circuit court shall proceed no further therein, but shall dismiss the suit or remand it to the court from which it was removed, as justice may require. What is meant by the expression "within the jurisdiction?" It means within the judicial cognizance—within the capacity to determine the merits of the dispute or controversy, and to grant the relief asked for. The provision does not give countenance to the idea that the suit or proceeding is to be retained in the circuit court till brought to a formal adjudication on the merits, when, at that ultimate stage, the court must say that the case is not within its jurisdiction, after the party successfully challenging the jurisdiction has been harassed by expense and injured by delay. But it means what it says, that the dismissal or remanding "shall" be made whenever, "at any time" after the suit is brought or removed to the circuit court, it shall appear to the satisfaction of that court that there is, really and substantially, no dispute or controversy of which it has jurisdiction, in the sense above pointed out; the right to have a review by this court of the order dismissing or remanding the suit being given to the aggrieved party at once, instead of his being compelled to await the making of such an order at the end of a full and formal hearing or trial, on issues and proofs, on the merits alleged on either side.

Orders affirmed.

Mr. Justice Bradley, dissenting:

Mr. Justice Harlan and Mr. Justice Matthews agree with me in dissenting from the judgment of the court in this case.

It is a constitutional right of the citizens of the several States having controversies with the citizens of other States, to have a national forum in which such controversies may be litigated.

[460] It was one of the declared purposes of the Constitution, that the judicial power of the United States should extend to certain cases enumerated, one of which was, "to controversies between citizens of different States;" and it was declared that this power should be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress might from time to time ordain and establish; thus making it the duty of Congress to establish such tribunals. If Congress fails in this constitutional duty, the citizens have no redress but the ballot-box. But Congress has not failed. It has established the requisite tribunals, and has invested them with the powers necessary to give the citizens their constitutional rights. Or, if it has failed in any respect, either with regard to persons or causes, we think it has not failed in respect to the class of cases to which the present belong.

Congress, by the Act of March 3, 1875, passed to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, has declared that they shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, amongst other things, of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, involving over five hundred dollars, in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States; and that any such suit brought in any state court may be removed by either party into the circuit court for the proper district. This jurisdiction should be liberally construed so as to give full effect, as far as may be, to the constitutional right, as presumably within the intent of Congress. The terms "suits at common law and in equity," or "suits at law and in equity," which is the same thing, are in themselves of the most general character and of the broadest signification; and this court ought not, by its decisions, to restrict their application. It is not meant by the expression "suits at common law" to confine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts to the old technical actions of trespass, trover, trespass on the case, debt, detinue, assumpsit, etc., but it extends to and includes any form of proceeding of a civil nature in which a legal right cognizable by the courts of common law is sought to be judicially enforced by whatever name, under the new-fangled nomenclature adopted by the different States, the proceeding may be called. [461]
Suits at law and equity include every form of proceeding except those peculiar to admiralty, ecclesiastical or probate and military jurisdictions. And even in matters savoring of ecclesiastical process, after an issue has been formed between definite parties, we have held that the controversy came under the head of a suit at at law. Gaines v. Fuentes, 92 U. S. 17 [23:527]; Hess v. Reynolds, 113 U. S. 73 [28:927]. The broad terms used in the law were purposely employed, as it seems to us, to make the jurisdiction complete, to the full extent which the Constitution intended it should have. It is true that in one or two cases we have intimated a distinction between the extent of jurisdiction given in the first and that given in the second sections of the Act of 1875; but that distinction, if well founded, does not affect the present cases, since they arise under the second section, which has been supposed to be the broader of the two, and, in any event, the ground of distinction is not here involved.

Now, a mandamus, which was originally a prerogative writ only, has come to be in many cases, and in most States, a private suit, brought for the purpose of enforcing a private right. This is true in the two cases now before us. The appellant has a money demand against the City and County of San Francisco, and is seeking to collect it in the usual way in which such demands are collectible by the law of procedure of California. The mandamus which he seeks is the mere process for commencing his action, and is a proper process suited to his case. The City and County of San Francisco can set up any defenses to the action in this form which it could do in the ordinary action of debt or upon contract. It is essentially a civil suit at law, no matter by what name it is called,—certainly as much so as were the proceedings in Gaines v. Fuentes, Hess v. Reynolds, already cited, and in Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 404 [25: 207], where there was an issue to ascertain the value of property taken by virtue of eminent domain. In Davies v. Corbin, 112 U. S. 36 [28: 627], we sustained a writ of error from this court to the circuit court on a judgment in a proceeding for mandamus to carry into effect a judgment for a debt. The Chief Justice there said: "While the writ of mandamus, [462] in cases like this, partakes of the nature of an execution to enforce the collection of a judgment, it can only be got by instituting an independent suit for that purpose. There must be: first, a showing by the relator in support of his right to the writ; and second, process to bring in the adverse party, whose action is to be coerced, to show cause, if he can, against it. If he appears and presents a defense, the showings of the parties make up the pleadings in the cause; and any issue of law or fact that may be raised must be judicially determined by the court before the writ can go out. Such a determination is, under the circumstances, a judgment in a civil action brought to secure a right, that is to say, process to enforce a judgment. Such a judgment is, in our opinion, a final judgment in a civil action, within the meaning of that term as used in the statutes regulating writs of error to this court."

In the jurisprudence of California, it has frequently been held that a mandamus is a civil action. It is only necessary to refer to the cases to show that this is a point beyond all dispute. Perry v. Ames, 26 Cal. 372; Cariaga v. Dryden, 30 Cal. 246; Courtwright v. Bear River Mining Co. 30 Cal. 583; Knowles v. Yeates, 31 Cal. 90; People v. Kern County, 45 Cal. 679; People v. Thompson, 66 Cal. 398.

But it is urged that the power given to the Circuit Courts of the United States to issue writs of mandamus is limited by Act of Congress to certain special cases; namely, only where they may be necessary for the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction (R. S. § 716), and that, according to the decisions of this court, in suits for the collection of money, the writ can only be used as ancillary to an execution after a judgment has been obtained in an ordinary suit. It is sufficient to say that all of these decisions, except two, relate to the law as it was before the passage of the Act of 1875. That Act, as we have seen, is expressed in general terms, without any qualification as to the writs or process which shall be employed, and repeals any restraining effect of section 716 of the Revised Statutes if in conflict with it. The two cases to which we have referred as decided since the Act are County of Green v. Daniel, 102 U. S. 187 [26: 99], and Davenport v. County of Dodge, 105 U. S. 237 [26: 1018]. But the point [463] decided in these cases was that, although the state law gave the remedy of mandamus to compel the levy of taxes for the payment of bonds, an ordinary action might nevertheless be brought on the bonds for the purpose of obtaing a judgment. They do not decide, whatever dicta may appear to have been made, that mandamus might not have been brought originally.

The inference drawn from section 716, R. S., is, that as it grants power to this court and the circuit courts "to issue all writs not specifically provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the usages and principles of law," (which is rightly supposed to include the writ of mandamus) it must be construed as denying the power to issue that writ in any other case. This conclusion might be admissible if it is restrained to the instance of the particular writ of mandamus which alone was in contemplation; that is, the prerogative writ of mandamus as known to the practice of the King's Bench in England. The object of this section of the statute was to give the courts of the United States the power to issue such a writ when necessary in the exercise of a jurisdiction in which the use of such a writ was conformable to law. But the section had no reference to mandamus as a form of civil action, as it has become in modern times, having a definite purpose and scope, and as distinct in its use, for the purpose of enforcing private rights of a particular description, as are the forms of actions known to the common law, such as assumpsit, debt or trespass. Viewed as a civil action, authorized by the laws of the State in which the suit is brought, the jurisdiction of the circuit courts is established by section 1 of the Act of 1875, which embraces "all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, * * * in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States." If there be such a suit, in which, by the law of the State, the form of proceeding is required to be in mandamus, section 914, R. S. applies, which requires that "The practice, pleadings and forms and modes of proceeding in civil cases, other than equity and admiralty cases, in the circuit and district courts, shall conform, as near as [464] may be, to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the State within which such circuit or district courts are held, any rule of court to the contrary notwithstanding." Effect may be given in the present case to this provision of the statute, without running counter to section 716. The fallacy of the argument against the jurisdiction of the circuit court, in such cases, is in construing section 716 as an exception out of the general grant of jurisdiction to that court over all suits in which the controversy is between citizens of different States; whereas, it is a general grant of power to issue all writs necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction—a power which would probably have been implied without an express grant.

In our judgment, the cases ought not to have been remanded, and the judgments of the circuit court remanding the same should be reversed.

Ejectment—Pennsylvania titles by warrant and survey, valid—date of warrant—"John Keble's Purchase Blotter" as evidence—rejection of evidence.

1. In Pennsylvania an estate held by a warrant and survey attended with payment of the purchase money is considered in most respects the same in effect as the legal estate; and the State cannot affect such title by a subsequent patent to a stranger.

2. Ejectment may be maintained upon a warrant and survey by the owner who paid the purchase money, without any conveyance from the person in whose name the application was made and the warrant issued.

3. Under a Pennsylvania Statute copies of entries from the old purchase blotter in the land-office of the State are prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated.

4. The orders, judgments and decrees of the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia County, in a case where it had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, cannot be impeached collaterally.

5. A recital in a patent of a prior conveyance to the patentee is not evidence against third parties to affect rights previously vested in them.

6. In an action of ejectment evidence tending to show that certain payments of taxes might have been on other tracts is held to have been properly rejected.

Argued Jan. 19, 20, 1887. Decided March 7, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. R. P. Allen, A. H. Dill and John G. Reading, Jr., for plaintiffs in error:

"In actions of ejectment in the United States courts the strict legal title prevails. If there are equities which show the right to be in another, these can only be considered on the equity side of the federal courts."

Foster v. Mora, 98 U. S. 425 (25: 191). See also Gilmer v. Poindexter, 51 U. S. 10 How. 257 (13: 411); Sheirburn v. Cordova, 65 U. S. 24 How 423 (16: 741); Singleton v. Touchard, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 342 (17: 50); Hickey (Steel) v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 3 How. 751 (11: 814).

A patent is a complete appropriation of the land it describes; and at law no defects in the preliminary steps can be tried.

Boardman v. Lessors of Reed, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 328 (8. 415).

The orphans' court never confirmed the sale to Brobst. The petition of LeFavre's administrator to the orphans' court, upon which the order to sell was granted, upon its face showing that the debts of the decedent were all barred by the statute, such order was void for want of jurisdiction in the court to grant it, and the sale to Brobst was in like manner void. The validity of such sale may be contested in any case involving title to the land sold.

Messrs. James Ryon, John W. Ryon and Samuel Linn, for defendants in error:

The trust was a dry one; there was no control and no duty to perform by trustee, and under the Statute of 27 Henry VIII., commonly called the Statute of Uses, which is in force in Pennsylvania (see Robert's Digest of British Statutes, 412), the trust was immediately stricken down and the use executed, thereby making Dr. Ruston the complete owner of the lands as well at law as in equity.

The Supreme Court of the United States has held a warrant survey with payment of the purchase money as vesting the owner with an estate strictly legal, upon which ejectment will be supported in the courts of the United States.

Sims v. Irvine, 3 U. S. 3 Dall. 425 (1: 665); Evans v. Patterson, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 224 (18: 393).

The Circuit Courts of the United States in Pennsylvania have uniformly held a warrant, survey and return as a perfect legal title, and ejectment has always been sustained upon such titles. A warrant, survey, and payment of the purchase money are sufficient to give a legal right of entry, and is a sufficient legal title to support ejectment in United States Courts.

Willink v. Miles, Pet. (C. C.) 429.

A warrant and survey returned into the land-office and accepted vests a legal title of entry, and is such a legal title as will support ejectment in United States courts.

Griffiths v. Tunckhouser, Pet. (C. C.) 418.

A warrant, survey, and payment of the purchase money give a sufficient title in Pennsylvania to enable the plaintiff to maintain an ejectment in the Circuit Court of the United States.

Copley v. Riddle, 2 Wash. (C. C.) 354; James v. Gordon, 1 Wash. (C. C.) 338.

In a controversy respecting the title to lands in a State this court will administer the law of the State in all respects as if it were a court sitting there and reviewing the decree of an inferior court in that locality.

Olcott v. Bynum, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 44 (21: 570); Slaughter v. Glenn, 98 U. S. 242 (25: 122).

A title to lands can only be acquired and lost according to the laws of the State in which they are situated.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court: [465]

This is an action of ejectment brought by the defendants in error in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania, to recover possession of a tract of land situated in Northumberland and Columbia Counties, containing about 230 acres. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of [466] the plaintiffs below, to reverse which this writ of error is brought.

Both parties claim title under the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. It appears from the bills of exceptions taken during the progress of the trial that the plaintiffs put in evidence a certified copy of a document called an application, No. 12969, as follows:

"William Elliott applies for four hundred acres of land on a branch of Roaring Creek, adjoining Dr. Thomas Ruston's lands, in Catawissa Township, Northumberland County.

*See also note by the Editor.

"Joseph Tyson applies for four hundred acres of land lying one mile north of a road leading from Reading to Sunbury adjoining Dr Thomas Ruston's other land, in Catawissa Township, in North'd County.

"William Shannon applies for four hundred acres of land lying one mile north of a road leading from Reading to Sunbury, adjoining other lands of Dr. Thomas Ruston in Catawissa Township, North'd County.

"Lewis Walker applies for four hundred acres of land lying one mile north of a road leading from Reading to Sunbury, adjoining Dr. Thomas Ruston's other lands in Catawissa Township, North'd County.

"Nathaniel Brown applies for four hundred acres of land on a branch of Roaring Creek, adjoining Dr. Thomas Ruston's lands, in Catawissa Township, North'd County.

"Ebenezer Branham applies for four hundred acres of land on a branch of Roaring Creek, adjoining Dr. Thomas Ruston's lands, in Catawissa Township, North'd County."

Also a certified copy of old purchase voucher No. 12969, as follows:

"26 November, 1793. Certified copy of old purchase voucher No. 12969. Joseph Tyson, 400 a's lying one mile north of a road leading from Reading to Sunbury, adjoining Dr. Thomas Ruston's other land, in Northumberland County.

"William Elliott—400 a's situate on a branch of Roaring Creek, adjoining Dr. Thomas Ruston's other land, in Catawissa Township—said county.

"Lewis Walker—400 a's lying one mile north [467] of a road leading from Reading to Sunbury, adjoining Dr. Thomas Ruston's other land, in said county.

"William Shannon—400 a's lying one mile north of a road leading from Reading to Sunbury, adjoining Dr. Thomas Ruston's other lands, in said county.

"Ebenezer Branham—400 a's on a branch of Roaring Creek, joining Dr. Thomas Ruston, in said county.

"Nathaniel Brown—400 a's on a branch of Roaring Creek, joining land of Dr. Thomas Ruston, in said county.

"Amount, £60—interest from date thereof.

"[On the side]: A gen'l rec't wrote."

The plaintiffs also offered in evidence a copy of old purchase blotter No. 12969, as follows:

"1794, June 14. } 12969 Dr. Ruston. 6 W'r'ts of 400 a's Am't, 2400 a's, 50s p. c't p'd specie ch., £60—

Fees 60s p'd, rem'r Charge of 168 D's.

"Rec'd d'd."

To this the counsel for the defendants objected on two grounds: 1, that the warrant to Lewis Walker appearing to be dated November 26, 1793, it was not competent to prove payment of the purchase money by Ruston, on June 14, 1794; and 2, that if any title whatever accrued to Ruston, it would be but a resulting trust, as the plaintiffs did not propose to follow it with any evidence showing a conveyance of the legal title to Ruston or those claiming under him, or any possession of the land by him or them, or the bringing of any action of ejectment to recover it within twenty-one years from the date of the warrant. The objections were overruled, and an exception taken.

The plaintiffs also put in evidence a copy of the warrant to Lewis Walker, dated the 26th of November, 1793, for 400 acres adjoining Dr. Thomas Ruston's other lands; and a copy of a survey for Lewis Walker, dated the 22d of October, 1794, in pursuance of the warrant, containing 871¼ acres. The survey was followed by a certified copy of the return made by William Gray, deputy surveyor, into the land-office, showing that on February 23, 1795, he [468] returned to the land-office the Lewis Walker survey for 871¼ acres. Warrants and surveys of five other tracts were introduced in evidence in connection with the warrant and survey of the Lewis Walker tract, being the same tracts of land which are mentioned in the application and purchase voucher. The plaintiffs then traced title into Nicholas LeFavre by virtue of a judgment against Thomas Ruston in 1796, and levy on lands of the defendant Ruston, including the Lewis Walker tract, and a sale and conveyance of the same to LeFavre by a marshal's deed. Nicholas LeFavre having died, his will was admitted to probate on the 12th of August, 1815, on which day William R. Smith took out letters of administration with the will annexed. A schedule attached to the will of the testator, of his lands in Pennsylvania, included the Lewis Walker tract of 871¼ acres. In 1836, William R. Smith, the administrator with the will annexed of Nicholas LeFavre, petitioned the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia for an order to sell real estate to pay the debts of the decedent. By further proceedings upon said application in the Orphans' Court of Northumberland County, where a portion of the lands of LeFavre were located, a decree of sale was obtained; and the Lewis Walker tract, among others, was sold on the 9th of May, 1837, to Joseph Brobst, as the property of Nicholas LeFavre. A deed was made to Brobst for the land, and the sale confirmed in Northumberland County, where the lands were located. By sundry mesne conveyances the title of Brobst was vested in the plaintiffs below.

There was evidence tending to show that the lands in controversy were wild and unimproved until 1864, when the parties through whom the plaintiffs claim title took actual possession thereof, and improved the same by the erection of a house and sawmill, and put to work a corps of men for the purpose of proving the coal veins. These operations and expenditures were continued for a period of about eighteen months, at a cost of between $40,000 and $50,000, when the work was suspended as not being profitable, but possession was maintained through agents and tenants until 1875, when the defendants took forcible possession, claiming title. [469]

The defendants below objected to the admission in evidence of the records from the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia, showing the proceedings resulting in the sale of the lands of Nicholas LeFavre to Joseph Brobst, on the ground that the debts of the decedent, as set forth in the petition of the administrator, to pay which the order of sale issued, were barred by the Statute of Limitations and their lien extinguished, by reason of which it was claimed that the orphans' court had no jurisdiction to grant the order. The objection was overruled, and an exception taken.

There was also evidence introduced by the plaintiffs, which was objected to, tending to show payment of taxes by those under whom the plaintiffs claim.

The defendants below offered in evidence on their part an application of Daniel Reese, Lewis Walker, and others, filed in the land-office November 26, 1793, indorsed "Ent'd by Wm. Lane for Daniel Rees;" also the warrant from the Commonwealth to Lewis Walker for 400 acres, dated November 26, 1793; also the survey to Lewis Walker made October 22 1794, in pursuance of the warrant of November 26, 1793, describing the tract in dispute; and then offered a certified copy of a patent from the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to Peter Grahl, dated April 12, 1797, for the same tract, which patent contained a recital to the effect that Lewis Walker, by deed dated November 27, 1793, had conveyed the said tract with the appurtenances to Peter Grahl. Counsel for the plaintiffs below objected to the introduction in evidence of this patent, on the ground that Dr. Ruston held a prior title to the land from the Commonwealth. This objection was sustained, the court refusing to allow the patent to be read to the jury, to which the defendants excepted.

The defendants below then renewed the offer of the patent to Peter Grahl for the land in dispute, in connection with an offer to prove a connected chain of title from Peter Grahl to themselves, to be followed by proof that they took actual possession of the the land in dispute in 1875, paid taxes by redeeming the land from tax sales, made improvements, expended large sums of money in opening coal mines, [470] and have ever since held actual possession of the land; and also that Nicholas LeFavre, who purchased the alleged title of Dr. Ruston at marshal's sale on October 11, 1803, received notice in October, 1814, of the title of Peter Grahl under the patent to him, and that the plaintiffs below, when they purchased at sheriff's sale in 1872, received notice of the same facts. This offer was rejected, and an exception duly taken.

The court below also refused to allow the defendants to read in evidence certain parts of the return of William Gray, deputy surveyor, to the commissioners of Northumberland County, made in 1796, other parts of which had been read by the plaintiffs below, in order to show that the taxes paid by Dr. Ruston on the lands which he did in fact own in the same county, and paid into the same office during the same time, were paid to or by a different person than the taxes paid on the land in dispute; and to show that there was another tract surveyed by the Commonwealth in the same locality and in the same county in the name of Lewis Walker as warrantee, which was claimed by Dr. Ruston. These offers were also rejected by the court, to which ruling the defendants excepted.

The court below charged the jury, among other things, as follows:

"The plaintiffs put in evidence a certified copy of an ancient paper, dated November 26, 1793, on file in the land-office, designated as old purchase voucher No. 12969, and in connection therewith a certified copy of an entry, under date of June 14, 1794, from the old purchase blotter in the land-office. These documents were offered to show, and they are evidence tending to show, that Dr. Thomas Ruston was the owner of the Lewis Walker warrant, and paid to the Commonwealth the purchase money for said tract of land."

And also:

"The plaintiffs have shown that by sundry mesne conveyances the title which Nicholas LeFavre thus acquired became vested in them prior to the bringing of this action. In connection with their paper title the plaintiffs gave evidence tending to show that for many years they and those under whom they claim asserted title to the land and paid taxes thereon without any hostile claim being set up against them until the year 1875, when the defendants took possession. If the evidence on the part of the plaintiffs is believed by the jury, it makes out a prima facie case for the plaintiffs, and they are [471] entitled to your verdict upon this branch of their title."

To these charges the defendants excepted. These several rulings of the court are now assigned for error.

In the case of Sims v. Irvine, 3 U. S. 3 Dall. 425 [1:665], which was an ejectment for land lying in Pennsylvania, decided by this court in 1799, it was said that, in that State, "Payment, or, as in this case, consideration passed, and a survey, though unaccompanied by a patent, gave a legal right of entry which is sufficient in ejectment. Why they have been adjudged to give such right, whether from a defect of chancery powers or for other reasons of policy or justice, is not now material. The right once having become an established legal right, and having incorporated itself as such with property and tenures, it remains a legal right notwithstanding any new distribution of judicial powers, and must be regarded by the common-law courts of the United States in Pennsylvania as a rule of decision."

The case of Evans v. Patterson, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 224 [18:393], decided in 1866, was similar. In that case Mr. Justice Grier, delivering the opinion of the court, said, p. 230 [394], "The case cannot be made intelligible without a brief notice of the very peculiar land law of Pennsylvania. The proprietors of the Province, in the beginning, allowed no one man to locate and survey more than three hundred acres. To evade this rule in after times, it was the custom for speculators in land to make application in the names of third persons, and, having obtained a warrant, to take from them what was called a 'deed-poll' or a brief conveyance of their inchoate equitable claim. Pennsylvania, until of late years, had no courts of equity. Hence, in an action of ejectment, the plaintiff might recover without showing a legal title. If he had a prior inchoate or equitable title, either as trustee or cestui que trust, he might recover. The courts treated the applicant or warrantee as trustee for the party who paid the purchase money, or paid even the surveying fees; for the purchase money, under the locatiou or application system, was not paid at [472] the time, and sometimes never. When the State succeeded to the title of the proprietors, the application system was abandoned, and warrants were granted on payment of the purchase money for the number of acres for which his warrant called. Hence, where the claimant of the warrant was unable to show his deed-poll, he might recover by showing that he paid the purchase money; that the warrantee whose name was used was, therefore, trustee for him. And an ejectment might also be maintained in the name of the warrantee, although he had no beneficial interest in the land, and no knowledge of the institution of the suit. See Campbell v. Galbreath, 1 Watts, 78, and also Ross v. Barker, 5 Watts, 391, which was decided on the title now in question."

It is equally well established that the action of ejectment may be maintained upon a warrant and survey by the owner who paid the purchase money, without any conveyance from the person in whose name the application was made and the warrant issued. Brown v. Galloway, Pet. (C. C.), 291; Willink v. Miles, Pet. (C. C.) 429. It was said by Mr. Justice Washington in Huidekoper v. Burrus, 1 Wash. (C. C.) 113, that "The person whose name appears on the warrant is considered as merely a nominal grantee, and a trustee for the person who pays for the warrant and has it executed;" stating, as a matter of fact in the history of the practice of the State, that "Whenever one person takes out many warrants he borrows the names of certain persons, no matter who they are." See also Griffiths v. Tunckhouser, Pet. (C. C.) 418; James v. Gordon, 1 Wash. (C. C.) 338; Copley v. Riddle, 2 Wash. (C. C.) 354. This doctrine is established as the law of Pennsylvania by many decisions of the Supreme Court of that State. In Duer v. Boyd, 1 Serg. & R. 210, that court said: "For above fifty years past lands held by warrant and survey, without patents, have been considered as the legal estate in England, subject to the liens of judgment, curtesy, dower, and other incidents of real property."

[473] In McClay v. Work, 5 Binn. 158, it is said: "An estate held by warrant or survey, or other imperfect title, without patent, is of a singular nature. In many, and indeed in most respects, it is considered as a legal estate against all persons but the Commonwealth. It is subject to the same laws of descent, devise, and conveyance as the legal estate. Tenancy by the curtesy and in dower are attached to it. An ejectment may be supported on it." And in Gingrich v. Foltz, 7 Harris, 40, it is said: "In Pennsylvania a warrant and survey, attended with payment of the purchase money, is to be considered, as against all but the Commonwealth, in the same light as the legal estate in England, and is not to be distinguished, as to the mode of conveying, entailing, and barring entails, from estates strictly legal. * * * If the warrant, survey, and payment of the purchase money constitute a legal title, it is impossible to comprehend how the Commonwealth can, by any act whatever, after she has parted with that title, prejudice, much less extinguish, it."

Upon this view of the law, it appears from the record that the plaintiffs below proved a legal title to the Lewis Walker tract in controversy in Dr. Thomas Ruston. The old purchase voucher No. 12969, offered in evidence, shows that the purchase money for the six tracts described was paid by one person; and the receipt, being a copy from the old purchase blotter, also No. 12969 to correspond, shows that the owner of the warrants, by virtue of the payment of the purchase money, was Dr. Ruston.

Counsel for the plaintiffs in error seek to read the abbreviations in that extract from the old purchase blotter as showing that the purchase money had not been paid in full; but we think it otherwise sufficiently appears, not only on the face of the receipt itself, but also from the statement on the margin of the old purchase voucher, that a general receipt had been given, corroborated by the fact that the warrants were actually issued.

A point is made on behalf of the plaintiffs in error that the issue of the warrant cannot be considered as evidence of the payment of the purchase money, because it is dated prior to the date of the receipt taken from the old purchase blotter, the warrant being dated the 26th of November, 1793, and the receipt the 14th of [474] June, 1794. This, however, is explained by the practice, known to have existed, that while a warrant was never issued except after the payment of the purchase money, yet it was dated as of the date of the entry in the old purchase voucher, which was the authority given to the surveyor to locate the land, the warrant being subsequently issued so as to relate back to that date.

In Brown v. Galloway, Pet. (C. C.) 291, Mr. Justice Washington said: "A warrant for land is, according to long and uniform practice, dated on the day the application is made for the land, although it is retained in the office until the purchase money is paid, when, and not before, it issues to the party." To the same effect is Lewis v. Meredith, 3 Wash. (C. C.) 81.

The competency and value of the two documents from the old purchase voucher and the old purchase blotter, to prove the fact of the payment of the purchase money, and by whom it was paid, are stated by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in the case of Oliphant v. Ferren, 1 Watts, 57. It is there said that these entries were made by John Keble, who was chief clerk in the Receiver-General's Office. Prior to 1823 proof of the payment of the purchase money was made by the production of the original receipt, or the testimony of Keble during his lifetime, and, after his death, proof of his handwriting and entry in these books. In 1823, however, by a statute passed during that year, the books themselves, and copies from them, were made prima facie evidence.

The matter is thus explained by Judge Huston in his essay on the History and Nature of Original Titles to Land in the Province and State of Pennsylvania, Charles Huston, p. 335:

"Even on warrants where money was paid, there was sometimes difficulty as to who was the owner. The warrant, being in a name different from that of the claimant on its face, proved nothing. Where the owner, when he took out his warrant, took a receipt for his purchase money and preserved it, this often decided the question of ownership, and it became usual for a plaintiff to recover on such a receipt, without producing any conveyance from the person whose name was used in the warrant. [475] But where the owner either took no receipt, or it was lost or mislaid, the ownership must be proved by other means. The common books of the land-office charged the warrantee with the land and credited him with the payment of the money. When it became necessary to pay the money before you got the warrant, and while John Keble was chief clerk in the Receiver-General's Office, he kept an account of who paid the money on every warrant sealed in that office. The entry, however, is not easily understood, except by those acquainted with the office. Every application was numbered successively, as they were handed in, from one up to near twenty thousand. Some of these applications were for a single tract, and many for more than one hundred, the last written on a single sheet of paper, or several sheets attached together. On each of these was marked the date when filed, and the name of the man who paid the money always appeared. When you applied for a warrant, there were marks by which you could refer to and find the application, and from the application and its number and date, you could find the entry in John Keble's blotter, and there see who paid the purchase money. The right to many tracts has been ascertained by searching as here mentioned; and a copy of that blotter under seal of office, is now evidence in a court of justice, by a particular Act of Assembly. So careful was John Keble that if the person who paid the money told him by whom it was sent, that also appeared in the blotter." Vide also Campbell v. Galbreath, 1 Watts, 70.

There is nothing in the case of Strimpfler v. Roberts, 18 Pa. 283, cited and relied upon by the plaintiffs in error, inconsistent with the foregoing. In that case the plaintiffs in the ejectment were permitted to prove that Benson, under whom they claimed, had paid the purchase money, and they did so by the blotters, vouchers, etc., as in the present instance; and it was admitted and decided in that case that such proof established a prima facie title in them, but one, however, which might be overcome by proof of the fact that Benson, who appeared to have paid the purchase money, had done so, not on his own behalf, but as agent [476] for others; and that fact being made to appear, it was held that a patent issued to the assignee of the warrantee conveyed a superior legal title. The conclusion is summed up by Chief Justice Black, in the opinion of the court, as follows, p. 302: "That where a warrant is issued to one person and the purchase money is paid by another, and the patent is afterwards taken out by the nominal warrantee, the right of him who paid the purchase money is gone, unless he takes possession of the land or brings ejectment to recover it within twenty-one years from the date of the warrant; and after that lapse of time he cannot recover, no matter how clearly he may be able to prove that the legal owner was in the beginning a trustee for him. * * * When I say that the suit must be brought within twenty-one years from the date of the warrant, I speak of a case like the present one in which the alleged trust is proved by the naked and solitary fact of the payment of purchase money. Where the cestui que trust has superintended the survey, and paid the officer's fees, or exercised other acts of ownership over the land, the presumption in favor of the trustee would perhaps not begin to arise until he did some act of hostility, such as selling his title, or taking out a patent to himself."

In the present case the evidence admitted was held to establish a prima facie legal title in Dr. Thomas Ruston. It was sufficient to establish that he paid the purchase money, and the other proof in the case showed that he and those who claimed under him exercised acts of ownership over the property until their possession was disturbed violently by the defendants below in the year 1875. The defendants were able to offer nothing in opposition to this, except the patent under which there had been no claim of title for more than seventy-five years, and which was not connected by any proof, other than its own recitals, with the warrant and survey.

In Glass v. Gilbert, 8 P.F. Smith, 266, it was decided that the doctrine of Strimpfler v. Roberts, 18 Pa. 283, and McBarron v. Glass, 6 Casey, 138, that a trust will not be sustained between the warrantee and one who has paid the purchase money after twenty-one years, without possession taken by the claimant, etc., does not apply to a stranger to the title of the warrantee. If twenty-one years elapse before [477] interference by a junior survey, the presumption in favor of the first, although a chamber survey, becomes absolute. It follows from the foregoing that the evidence introduced by the plaintiffs below was competent and sufficient to establish in Dr. Ruston a legal title to the lands in question.

The next assignment of error is founded upon the objection made to the admission of the record and proceedings in the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia County, resulting in the sale of the title of Nicholas LeFavre to the Lewis Walker tract to Joseph Brobst, by the deed of May 9, 1837. This objection was that it appeared from the face of the petition for the sale of the real estate of the decedent that the debts, to pay which it was alleged that the sale was necessary, were barred by the Statute of Limitations, and that, as a consequence, the orphans' court had no jurisdiction to make the order of sale. The course of proceeding taken in the present case, as shown by the transcript, was: 1, a petition to the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia for authority to sell, that being the court which had jurisdiction of the accounts of the executor; 2, a petition to the Orphans' Court of Northumberland County, in which the land was situated, an order of sale granted thereon, and sale made, and, as required by the express provisions of the Statute of 1832, then in force, the return of the sale made to and confirmed by the same court sitting in the county where the land is situated. It is scarcely necessary to cite authority in support of the proposition that the orders, judgments, and decrees of the orphans' court, in a case where it had jurisdiction of the subject matter, cannot be impeached collaterally; much less is it so in the present case, because the Statute of Pennsylvania of March 29, 1832 (2 Brightly's Purd. Dig. p. 1279, pl. 3), provides as follows: "The orphans' court is hereby declared to be a court of record, with all the qualities and incidents of a court of record at common law; its proceedings and decrees in all matters within its jurisdiction shall not be reversed or avoided collaterally in any other court; but they shall be liable to reversal or modification or alteration on appeal to the supreme court, as hereinafter directed." Iddings v. Cairns, 2 Grant, 88;

[478] Riland v. Eckert, 11 Harris, 215. In Dresher v. Allentown Water Co. 52 Pa. 229, Mr. Justice Strong said: "Orphans' Court decrees are doubtless conclusive; they cannot be impeached collaterally."

The next assignment of error is founded upon the refusal of the court to admit as evidence the certified copy of the patent from the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to Peter Grahl, dated April 12, 1797, with a recital therein of the fact that Lewis Walker, by deed dated November 27, 1793, had conveyed the tract in question to Peter Grahl. The legal title of Thomas Ruston to the premises in dispute, established by the warrant and survey and payment of the purchase money, was perfected by the return made by the deputy surveyor into the land-office on February 23, 1795. According to the doctrine established by the authorities already cited, it was not competent for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to affect that title by a subsequent patent to a stranger. Peter Grahl, the patentee, was not connected with the title under the warrant and survey, otherwise than by the recital contained in the patent itself, that the tract had been previously conveyed to him by Lewis Walker. Clearly, that recital was not evidence against the plaintiffs, for, if the patent could not take effect against them without it, it could not give any effect to that recital. Their right had already vested prior to the existence of the patent, and the grant to them could not be affected by a subsequent grant to a stranger. That such is the uniform course of decisions in Pennsylvania appears by numerous cases. Penrose v. Griffiths, 4 Binn. 231; Maclay v. Work, 5 Binn. 154; Woods v. Wilson, 37 Pa. 379; Delaware & Hudson Canal Co. v. Dimmock, 47 Pa. 393; Urket v. Coryell, 5 Watts & S. 60; Balliot v. Bauman, 5 Watts & S. 155; Smith v. Vasbinder, 77 Pa. 180.

It is next assigned for error that the court below erred in rejecting that portion of the return of William Gray, deputy surveyor, offered to be read in evidence by the defendants below. That portion of the return related to other surveys in the same township, returned as belonging to Dr. Ruston, and was offered for the [479] ostensible purpose of explaining that part of the return of William Gray, the deputy surveyor, and the assessment for taxes received in evidence on the part of the plaintiff below, and in order to show that the taxes alleged to have been paid by Dr. Thomas Ruston might have been paid upon other tracts than the Lewis Walker tract in controversy. It seems to us, however, very clear that the offer was rightly rejected; that the part of the return offered related to other lands than the tract in question, was wholly irrelevant to the issue in the case, and did not tend to prove any material fact.

Neither was there any error in the other rulings of the court excepted to, in reference to other offers of evidence by the defendants below, made with the view of showing that Thomas Ruston paid taxes and made claims to other surveys in the name of Lewis Walker than that of the tract in dispute. None of them tended to show that Ruston was not the owner of the Lewis Walker tract in controversy, whatever they may have shown with reference to his claims to other tracts for which warrants and surveys had been made in the same name.

This disposes of all the questions raised by the assignments of error.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

PEOPLE'S SAVINGS BANK AND LEOPOLD FREUD, Plffs. in Err., [556]

v.

LEVI M. BATES ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 556–569.)

Chattel mortgages — Michigan Statutes — construction of — good faith of mortgage a question for jury — rights of second mortgagee — consideration — parties — review of Michigan authorities.

1. Under the Statutes of Michigan, relating to chattel mortgages, the good faith of a chattel mortgage on a stock of goods, where the mortgagor remains in possession and prosecutes his business as usual, is a question for the jury.

2. A creditor at large cannot attack a chattel mortgage as fraudulent until he has obtained a judgment and execution, or some legal process against the mortgaged property. It seems that this rule applies to a second mortgagee in possession seeking to attack a prior mortgage.

3. The words "mortgagee in good faith," as used in said statutes, mean the same thing as "mortgagee for a valuable consideration without notice."

4. Where a second mortgage, although first recorded, was given merely as collateral security for a pre-existing indebtedness, the prior mortgage confers the superior right.

Argued Nov. 15, 16, 1886. Decided Mar. 7, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John Atkinson, James T. Keena, Ashley Pond, and George V. N. Lothrop, for plaintiffs in error:

The Bank was in a position to attack these mortgages, as a subsequent creditor, although it had neither attached, nor levied an execution. Under the decisions in Michigan, a mortgagee is a creditor secured by a lien on the thing mortgaged.

Lucking v. Wesson, 25 Mich. 443; Gardner v. Matteson, 38 Mich. 200.

A person does not cease to be a creditor by becoming a mortgagee. The statute has been frequently construed by the Supreme Court of the State, to protect all persons who become creditors after a mortgage is given, and before it is put on file or possession taken under it.

Kohl v. Lynn, 34 Mich. 360.

The second and third of these mortgages must be treated as renewals merely of the first. They gave to Bates, Reed and Cooley no rights which the first did not confer.

Gill v. Griffith, 2 Md. Ch. 270.

The People's Savings Bank must be treated as a subsequent creditor within the meaning of the statute, as to the first and second mortgage, and prior in time as to third, if it is to be treated as anything but a renewal.

It was not necessary that it should have an attachment or an execution levied upon the property to put it in a position to attack the mortgages of Bates, Reed and Cooley.

In the case of Putnam v. Reynolds, 44 Mich. 118, the defendant obtained possession by an assignment for the benefit of creditors. Putnam held a mortgage which had been withheld from the records, which he sought to foreclose. Reynolds defended on the ground that he represented creditors, as to whom the mortgage was void, because so withheld. He was met by the assertion that he was neither an attachment or judgment creditor, nor a purchaser for value. The supreme court had frequently held the general rule as above stated as to creditors, and had also held that an assignee for the benefit of creditors was not to be considered a bona fide purchaser.

Farrington v. Sexton, 43 Mich. 454.

It has been held, however, that the defendant represented creditors, and having, as such, obtained possession of the property by voluntary action of the debtor had a right to keep it.

See also Lee v. Brown, 7 Ga. 275.

It is not necessary in this case to uphold the right of a subsequent purchaser or mortgagee to attack a previous conveyance, on the ground of fraud in the party making it. The attack here is really made on the ground that Bates, Reed and Cooley were guilty of a fraud in leaving Freedman Bros. & Co. in possession as ostensible owners and withholding their mortgages from the record.

Putnam v. Reynolds, 44 Mich. 118; Shaw v. Levy, 17 Serg. & R. 99; Winslow v. Leonard, 12 Harris, 14; Lanfear v. Sumner, 17 Mass. 110; Frank v. Miner, 50 Ill. 444.

When the second mortgagee is also a creditor against whom the previous mortgage is void, possession puts him in a position to assert its invalidity as to him as creditor.

The charge of the court that the pre-existing indebtedness is not a sufficient consideration to constitute one a mortgagee in good faith is not the law of this court.

This is not a case where we are bound by state decisions. It is not in any sense one calling for the construction of a state statute; but one where the meaning of "a valuable consideration" is to be settled as a question of commercial law.

If decisions affecting commercial paper are applicable to the question now under discussion, it is useless to cite more than the decisions of this court. In Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 1 (10: 865), the question involved was whether one taking a note in payment of an antecedent debt was a holder for value. The decision went further and held that even where it was received as security, the party receiving it was a holder for value.

See also R. R. Co. v. Nat. Bank, 102 U. S. 14 (26: 61); Bank of the Metropolis v. New Eng. Bank, 42 U. S. 1 How. 234 (11: 115); S. C. 47 U. S. 6 How. 212 (12: 409).

As between successive vendees the first to obtain possession must prevail.

Shaw v. Levy, Winslow v. Leonard, Lanfear v. Sumner, and Frank v. Miner, supra; Judson v. Corcoran, 58 U. S. 17 How. 612 (15: 231); Lamb v. Durant, 12 Mass. 54.

In nearly all these cases the consideration for the sale which was held to take the property was a past indebtedness.

Mr. Don M. Dickinson, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of replevin involving conflicting claims under certain chattel mortgages executed by Freedman Bros. & Co., formerly merchants in the City of Detroit. The firm was composed of Herman Freedman, who managed its business in Detroit; Benjamin Freedman, who resided in New York and had entire charge of the buying and of the firm's financial affairs in that city; and Rosa Freedman. At the beginning of the action the mortgaged property was in the custody of Leopold Freud as agent of the People's Savings Bank, plaintiff in error.

Bates, Reed and Cooley, the defendants in error, who were the plaintiffs below, claim priority under a mortgage given by Freedman Bros. & Co. February 7, 1881, to secure both the past indebtedness of the latter, amounting to $45,000 and upwards, for goods, wares and merchandise sold and money loaned to them, and any future liabilities which might be incurred by the mortgagors for other goods purchased or other moneys borrowed from the mortgagees; the mortgage, covering not only the goods, wares, merchandise and other personal property then in the mortgagors' stores in Detroit, but also their notes, book accounts and securities, and all future additions to or substitutions for such goods and merchandise. No part of said indebtedness was created at the time of the execution of the mortgage. [557]

The People's Savings Bank claims under a mortgage made by Freedman Bros. & Co. on the 11th of February, 1881, to secure certain demand notes aggregating $49,000, which were executed by that firm on the 7th day of February, 1881, and also "all other paper indorsed" by it and held by the Bank; that mortgage covering all the goods and merchandise then in the mortgagors' stores and all thereafter put into them. This last mortgage provided that Leopold Freud, the Bank's agent, should take immediate possession and sell the goods in the ordinary course of business, applying the proceeds to said indebtedness until the same was paid. The said demand notes represented past indebtedness; for they were given in place of other paper of the mortgagors' then outstanding, and which had not then matured. Each demand note was accompanied by a cognovit or "confession of judgment," under which, however, no action was taken. The mortgage to the Bank was the first one filed in the proper office in Detroit, though it was not lodged until after the Bank had notice, through its agent, that Bates, Reed and Cooley claimed to be in possession of or to have rights in the mortgaged property. Whether the Bank, before the mortgage to it was given, had actual notice of the prior mortgage to Bates, Reed and Cooley does not clearly appear.

By the Statutes of Michigan relating to chat-

[558] tel mortgages it is provided that "Every mortgage or conveyance intended to operate as a mortgage of goods and chattels which shall hereafter be made, which shall not be accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things mortgaged, shall be absolutely void as against the creditors of the mortgagor and as against subsequent purchasers or mortgagees in good faith, unless the mortgage or a true copy thereof shall be filed in the office of the township clerk of the township or city clerk of the city, or city recorder of cities having no officer known as city clerk, where the mortgagor resides, except when the mortgagor is a nonresident of the State, when the mortgage or a true copy thereof shall be filed in the office of the township clerk of the township, or city clerk of the city, or city recorder of cities having no officer known as city clerk, where the property is." 2 Howell, Annotated Stat. p. 1609, § 6198.

The mortgagees respectively insist that there was, within the meaning of the statute, an immediate delivery to them followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things mortgaged; the Bank claiming to have taken possession under its mortgage on the 11th of February, 1881, while Bates, Reed and Cooley, denying that the Bank ever had such possession as the law requires, contend that they took possession on the 15th of February, 1881. But the claim of neither party in that respect is satisfactorily sustained by the proof. The evidence does not show such open, visible and substantial change of possession as the law required in order to give notice to the public of a change of ownership. Doyle v. Stevens, 4 Mich. 93. In a sense, both parties were in possession by agents early on the morning of the 15th of February, each claiming the exclusive right to manage and control the property under the terms of the respective mortgages. As the contest for such management and control was likely to result in an unseemly display of force, the parties on that day entered into an agreement which recited their respective claims of priority both of possession and of right, and [561] provided—"neither party waiving or surrendering any right or advantage"—that the possession of each should remain as it then was and that the business should continue as it was then being conducted, all the proceeds of sale being deposited in bank and remaining there intact until these conflicting claims should be settled by judicial decision or by agreement. The claims were not settled by agreement; and the defendants in error, having insisted that this arrangement was not being carried out in good faith, and having been refused exclusive possession, brought this action—as they might do consistently with the agreement—to obtain a judicial determination of their rights. In adopting that course they surrendered no right they had in the premises.

In behalf of the Bank it is contended that the mortgage to Bates, Reed and Cooley was fraudulent as against subsequent creditors and mortgagees in good faith, in that the mortgagees contemplated that the mortgagors should remain in possession and prosecute the business in the ordinary mode. The mortgage of February 7, 1881, certainly contains no provision of that kind. But if the extrinsic evidence establishes that such a course upon the part of Freedman Bros. & Co. was in fact contemplated by Bates, Reed and Cooley, it would only show that the mortgagees were willing to give the mortgagors an opportunity to avoid a suspension of their business and bankruptcy—the additions to the stock in trade being bought under the mortgage, so as to compensate the mortgagees for any diminution in value by reason of goods disposed of in the usual course of business. If the mortgage had in terms made provision for such a course upon the part of the mortgagors as the Bank contends was in the contemplation of the mortgagees, it would not be held, as matter of law, to be absolutely void or fraudulent as to other creditors. Oliver v. Eaton, 7 Mich. 108, 112; Gay v. Bidwell, 7 Mich. 519, 523; People v. Bristol, 35 Mich. 28, 32; Wingler v. Sibley, 35 Mich. 281; Robinson v. Elliott, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 523 [22: 762]. The good faith of such transactions, where they are not void upon their face, is, under the Statutes of Michigan, a question of fact for the determination of the jury. Oliver v. Eaton and Gay v. Bidwell. That rule does not however restrict [562] the power of the court to give to the jury a peremptory instruction covering such an issue when the evidence is all on one side, or so overwhelmingly on one side as to leave no room to doubt what the fact is. In this case there is an entire absence of any evidence impeaching the good faith of Bates, Reed and Cooley in procuring the mortgage of February 7, 1881. There is nothing whatever to show that they had any purpose to commit a fraud or to put their mortgagors in such a position that the latter could more readily deceive or defraud other creditors.

Besides, as the court below held, upon this branch of the case, the Bank, in its capacity as a creditor at large, is not entitled to attack the prior mortgage as fraudulent upon the grounds just stated. This general proposition is conceded by counsel, the usual way, he admits, being for the creditor, who has no particular claim in the property, to acquire a specific interest therein through the levy of an attachment or execution. Hence, he says that while it is often stated that conveyances of this sort are void as to creditors generally, they must put their claims in the form of a judgment or attachment before they are in a position to attack them—the object of the attachment or execution being to bring the attacking party into privity with the property. And such seems to be the rule recognized by the Supreme Court of Michigan. In Fearey v. Cummings, 41 Mich. 376, 383, the court, construing a somewhat similiar statute, said: "If the mortgage was made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors (Comp. L. sec. 4713), or, inasmuch as the possession was not altered, if it was not put on file prior to plaintiff becoming creditor, it was invalid as against them; the law being that those who became creditors whilst the mortgage is not filed are protected, and not merely those who obtain judgments or levy attachments before the filing. Still no one, as creditor at large, can question the mortgage. He can only do that by means of some process or proceeding against the property. Sec. 4706." In that case the court cites Thompson v. Van Vechten, 27 N.Y. 568, 582, in which it was held [563] in reference to a somewhat similar statute, that "The mortgage cannot be legally questioned until the creditor clothes himself with a judgment and execution, or with some legal process against his property; for creditors cannot interfere with the property of their debtor without process."

But it is argued that this rule does not apply in the case of a creditor who is a second mortgagee in possession. Such possession, it is claimed, gives him the right by way of defense, and without resorting to attachment and before obtaining judgment, to assert the invalidity of the prior mortgage. There is some apparent support to this position in Putnam v. Reynolds, 44 Mich. 115. That was a suit in equity brought to foreclose a chattel mortgage not filed until after the mortgagor had become insolvent, and while his estate was being disposed of by an assignee for the benefit of creditors. The court said that there was reason to believe that the mortgagor acted in bad faith; that the mortgage was left off the record for the purpose of giving the mortgagor a credit to which he was not entitled in which case the mortgage was void in fact, irrespective of the statute. Upon this ground alone the court declined to give the relief asked, remitting the mortgagee to his remedy, if any he had at law. It expressly declined to decide whether the rule that creditors cannot attack a mortgage, except indirectly, through a seizure of the property by attachment or other suitable process, applies where the mortgage was originally valid, but is made void by the subsequent neglect of the mortgagee. The case in hand cannot be brought within the principle announced in Putnam v. Reynolds, for the reason if there were no other, that there was no fraud in fact upon the part of Bates, Reed and Cooley, nor any unreasonable delay in filing the mortgage of February 7, 1881. It was filed shortly after the mortgage to the Bank was lodged for record.

This disposes of all the material questions in the case preliminary to the main inquiry whether the Bank—the mortgage to it having been really given to secure past indebtedness of the mortgagors—is, in the meaning of the statute, a subsequent "mortgagee in good faith," If not, the mere filing of the mortgage of Feb-[564] ruary 11, 1881 before that of February 7, 1881, did not give it priority of right over Bates, Reed and Cooley; and the mortgage that was in fact first executed and delivered must be held to give priority of right.

In Kohl v. Lynn, 34 Mich. 360, the Supreme Court of Michigan said that "The statute which makes a mortgage of chattels, which has not been recorded, void against subsequent purchasers or mortgagees in good faith, uses those terms in the sense which has always been attached to them by judicial decisions." Guided by this rule, which we deem a sound one, we concur with the court below in holding that the words "mortgagee in good faith" mean the same thing as "mortgagee for a valuable consideration without notice."

It is insisted that the principles announced in Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 1 [10:865] and R. R. Co. v. Nat. Bank, 102 U. S. 14 [26:61], sustain the proposition that the Bank was a mortgagee in good faith, although the mortgage to it may be held to have been given merely as security for past indebtedness. The general doctrine announced in Swift v. Tyson was that one who becomes the holder of negotiable paper, before its maturity, in the usual course of business and in payment of an existing debt, is to be deemed to have received it for a valuable consideration, and is, therefore, unaffected by any equities existing between antecedent parties. In that case Mr. Justice Story said that the rule was applicable as well when the negotiable instrument was received as security for, as when received in payment of a pre-existing debt. In Railroad Company v. National Bank it was held conformably to the recognized usages of the commercial world, that "The transfer before maturity of negotiable paper as security for an antecedent debt merely, without other circumstances, if the paper be so indorsed that the holder becomes a party to the instrument, although the transfer is without express agreement by the creditor for indulgence, is not an improper use of such paper, and is as much in the usual course of commercial business as its transfer in payment of such debt. In either case the bona fide holder is unaffected by equities or defenses between prior parties, of which he had no notice."

Do these principles apply to the case of a chattel mortgage given merely as security for [565] a pre-existing debt, and in obtaining which the mortgagee has neither parted with any right or thing of substance nor come under a binding agreement to postpone or delay the collection of his demand? Upon principle, and according to the weight of authority, this question must be answered in the negative.

The rules established in the interests of commerce to facilitate the negotiation of mercantile paper, which, for all practical purposes, passes by delivery as money, and is the representative of money, ought not, in reason, to embrace instruments conveying or transferring real or personal property as security for the payment of money. At any rate, there is nothing in the usages of merchants, as shown in this record, or so far as disclosed in the adjudged cases, indicating that the necessities of commerce require that chattel mortgages be placed upon the same footing in all respects as negotiable securities which have come to the hands of a bona fide holder for value before their maturity. Such a result, if desirable, must be attained by legislation, rather than by judicial decisions.

One of the earliest cases in the federal courts upon this subject is that of Morse v. Godfrey, 3 Story, 364, 389. It there appeared that one Reed mortgaged to Godfrey all stock in trade and nearly all his real estate. The latter subsequently mortgaged the same property to a bank. In a contest between the bank and the assignee in bankruptcy of Reed, the former claimed to be a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the invalidity, under the bankrupt law, of the mortgages to Godfrey. Mr. Justice Story said:

"This leads me to remark that the bank does not stand within the predicament of being a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, in the sense of the rule upon this subject. The bank did not pay any consideration therefor, nor did it surrender any securities or release any debt due, either from Reed or Godfrey, to it. The transfer from

Godfrey was a simple collateral security, taken as additional security for the old indebtment and liability of the parties to the notes described in the instrument of transfer. It is true that, as between Godfrey and Reed and the bank, [566] the latter was a debtor for value, and the transfer was valid. But the protection is not given by the rules of law to a party in such a predicament merely. He must not only have had no notice, but he must have paid a consideration at the time of the transfer, either in money or other property, or by a surrender of existing debts or securities held for the debts and liabilities.

"But here the bank has merely possessed itself of the property transferred as auxiliary security for the old debts and liabilities. It has paid or given no new consideration upon the faith of it. It is, therefore, in truth, no purchaser for value in the sense of the rule." * * *

After referring to Dickerson v. Tillinghast, 4 Paige, 215, in which it was held by Chancellor Walworth that the transfer of an estate upon which there was a prior unrecorded mortgage, in payment of a pre-existing debt, without the transferee giving up any security or devesting himself of any right, or placing himself in a worse situation than he was in before, did not make the latter, who was without notice of the prior mortgage, a grantee or purchaser for a valuable consideration, Mr. Justice Story proceeded: "I do not say that I am prepared to go quite to that length, seeing that by securing the estate as payment the pre-existing debt is surrendered and extinguished thereby. But here there was no such surrender or extinguishment or payment; and the general principle adopted by the learned Chancellor is certainly correct: that there must be some new consideration moving between the parties, and not merely a new security given for the old debts or liabilities without any surrender or extinguishment of the old debts and liabilities or the old securities therefor; so that upon this ground alone the title of the bank would fail. The case of Swift v. Tyson, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 1 [10: 865] does not apply. In the first place there the bill was taken in payment or discharge of a pre-existing debt. In the next place it was a case arising upon negotiable paper, and who was to be deemed a bona fide holder thereof, to whom equities between other parties should not apply. And such a case is not necessarily governed by the same consider- [567] ations as those applicable to purchasers of real or personal property under the rule adopted by courts of equity for their protection." See also Rison v. Knapp, 1 Dill. 186, 200–1.

In Johnson v. Peck, 1 Woodb. & Min. 336, which was a case of a mortgage given to secure a pre-existing debt due from a mortgagor who had previously purchased the goods under such representations as entitled his vendor to sue to recover them back, Mr. Justice Woodbury said: "When rights of third persons intervene in this class of cases they are to be upheld, if those persons purchased the property absolutely and parted with a new and valuable consideration for it without notice of any fraud. * * * But if they have notice of the fraud or give no new valuable consideration, or are mere mortgagees, pawnees, or assignees in trust for the debtor, or for him and others, such third persons are to be regarded as holding the goods open to the same equities and exceptions as to title as they were open to in the hands of the mortgagor, pawner, or assignor."

And so in American Leading Cases, 5th Am. ed. p. 233, it is stated, and we think properly, as the doctrine established by a preponderance of authority, that "Whatever the rule may be in the case of negotiable instruments, it is well settled that the conveyance of lands or chattels as security for an antecedent debt will not operate as a purchase for value or defeat existing equities." See 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 104, 3d Am. ed.; Id. 83, 4th Am. ed. Vol. 2, pt. 1.

Such, we think, is also the doctrine of the Supreme Court of Michigan. In Kohl v. Lynn, 34 Mich. 360, the court, after observing that the object of the statute is to protect those who have acquired rights under the circumstances which would render them liable to be defrauded unless protected against instruments of which they knew nothing when acquiring their rights, said: "It has always been held that a purchaser who had paid nothing could not be thus defrauded, and that no one could be protected as a bona fide purchaser, except to the extent of his payments made before he received such notice as should have prevented him from making further payments. This doctrine has [568] been too uniformly recognized to require discussion or citation of authorities. As Kohl had made no payments at all before the property was replevied from him, he was not a bona fide purchaser, and his rights are subject to the mortgage."

In Stone v. Welling, 14 Mich. 514, 525, where the issue was between the holder of an unrecorded mortgage and a subsequent grantee, who agreed to surrender indebtedness of the grantor to him and others, and put the deed on record without notice of the mortgage, the court said:

"Welling claims that the agreement which was given for the deed was amply sufficient to support it, and to entitle him to the rights of a bona fide purchaser under the recording laws. It was satisfactory, it is said, to Hart; and as to the indebtedness held by Welling and Root against him, it would have the effect of a present discharge. That it was satisfactory to Hart can be of no consequence on this question, since, to constitute Welling a bona fide purchaser he must have parted with something of value, and not merely given a contract which he could avoid, if his title under the deed proved defective. Thomas v. Stone, Walker, Ch. 117; Dixon v. Hill, 5 Mich. 404; Warner v. Whittaker, 6 Mich. 133; Blanchard v. Tyler, 12 Mich. 339. Nor do we think the agreement had the effect to discharge any indebtedness. It was executory in its character, covering not only the claims of Welling and Root, but also other claims to be procured by them, and upon which it cannot be claimed that the agreement itself would have any effect whatever."

In Boxheimer v. Gunn, 24 Mich. 373, 379, the defendant in a suit brought to foreclose a recorded mortgage relied upon a subsequent deed of the mortgagor, which he was induced to take under the representation of the latter that the mortgage debt had been paid. After sustaining the claim of the plaintiff upon certain grounds, the court said that the defendant must fail in the suit upon the further ground that, although he acted with good faith, he was not [569] a bona fide purchaser or incumbrancer for value, with equities superior to those of the plaintiff, because it appeared that the conveyance to him was "merely as a security for a precedent debt," without his paying or agreeing to pay any other consideration or relinquishing any remedy or right he may have had.

Without further discussion of the authorities cited by counsel, all of which have been carefully examined, we are of opinion that the claim of the Bank to be a subsequent mortgagee in good faith cannot be sustained, because the mortgage of February 11, 1881, although first filed, was not given in consideration of its having surrendered, or agreed to surrender, or to postpone the exercise of any substantial right it had against the mortgagors, but merely as collateral security for past indebtedness. Under such circumstances, the mortgage which was prior in time confers a superior right.

Other questions of a minor character are discussed by counsel, but it is not deemed necessary to consider them.

We perceive no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

v.
NATHAN FULLER, in His Own Right, and as Trustee for TRUMAN B. FULLER ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 534-555.)

Real property—long continued possession and use raise a presumption of grant—nature of this presumption—belief of actual existence, not necessary—rebuttal—erroneous instruction.

1. When the possession and use of real property have been long continued, they create a presumption of lawful origin; and this presumption does not always proceed on a belief that the thing presumed has actually taken place.

2. The presumption of a grant is indulged merely to quiet a long possession which might otherwise be disturbed by reason of the inability of the possessor to produce the muniments of title, which were actually given to him or those under whom he holds, but have been lost, or which he or they were entitled to have, but neglected to obtain, and of which the witnesses have passed away, or their recollection of the transaction has become dimmed and imperfect.

3. Though a presumption of a deed is one that may be rebutted by proof of facts inconsistent with its supposed existence, yet where no such facts are shown, and the things done and the things omitted, with regard to the property in controversy, by the respective parties, for long periods of time after the execution of the supposed conveyance, can be explained satisfactorily only upon the hypothesis of its existence, then the jury may be instructed that it is their duty to presume such a conveyance, and thus quiet the possession.

4. In the case presented it is held that the claim to the lands in controversy by the defendants and their ancestors in title for over a century, with the payment of taxes thereon, and acts of ownership suited to the condition of the property, and its actual use for thirty-six or twenty-eight years would justify a presumption of a deed to the original ancestor to quiet the title of the defendants claiming under him; and that an instruction to the effect that in order to presume a lost deed the jury must be satisfied it had actually existed, was error.

Argued Jan. 18, 19, 1887. Decided Mar. 7, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Rhode Island. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Wm. H. Greene, James Tillinghast and Charles Hart, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Livingston Scott, Elisha C. Mowry and James O. Collins, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of [537]
the court:

This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of twenty-seven twenty-eighths undivided parts of a tract of land, containing about 14 acres, situated in the Town of Lincoln, formerly Smithfield, in the State of Rhode Island. The plaintiff, a citizen of Connecticut, sues the defendants, citizens of Rhode Island, in his own right and as trustee for others.

The declaration contains several counts, all of which except two are withdrawn. In these the plaintiff alleges that on the 25th of October, 1874, he was "seised and possessed in his demesne as of fee in his own right and as Trustee" of twenty-seven twenty-eighths undivided parts of the tract of land which he has described, and that the defendants on that day and year, with force and arms, entered thereon and ejected him therefrom, and have ever since withheld the possession, to his damage of $1,000. The two counts differ merely in the description of some of the boundary lines of the tract. The defendants pleaded the general issue and twenty years' possession under the Statute of Possessions. Upon these pleas issues were joined and the case was tried, the parties stipulating that the plea of the statute should be held to apply to any period or periods of twenty years that could be covered by any other like plea that might have been filed, and that either party might offer any evidence and rely upon any matters that would be admissible under such plea or pleas, and any proper replications or other proceedings thereon. The case was tried three times, resulting the first time in a verdict for the defendants, and at the other times in a verdict for the plaintiff. The judgment on the last verdict is brought before us for review by the defendants on a writ of error. Numerous exceptions were taken in the progress of the trial to the rulings of the court in the admission and rejection of evidence, and to the instructions given and refused to the jury. But the conclusions we have reached with respect to the instructions given and refused, as to the presumption of a deed to the ancestors in title of the defendants, render it unnecessary to consider the others.

It appears from the evidence at the trial that [538]
the land in controversy was the westerly part of a tract of 38¼ acres, belonging, in 1750, to one James Reed, and which, by early conveyances, became divided into three parcels, one containing 22½ acres, one 5½ acres, and the third 6 acres, as shown by a diagram submitted by consent of parties, to the jury, of which the following is a reduced copy:

A turnpike, running through the tract north- [539] erly and southerly, was opened in 1816. The 22½ acre parcel was conveyed to Francis Richardson, of Attleboro, Massachusetts, by deed dated April 10, 1750. The land in controversy is a portion of this parcel lying west of the turnpike. The 5½ acre parcel was conveyed to Ezekiel Fuller by deed dated November 17, 1750. The 6 acre parcel was conveyed to Abigail Fuller, wife of Ezekiel, and daughter of Francis Richardson, by deed dated January 21, 1756.

The plaintiff claims to derive title under the will of Francis Richardson, dated May 26, 1749, and the codicil thereof dated August 10, 1750, which were admitted to probate in Massachusetts, January 19, 1756. A copy of the will and codicil, and of the Massachusetts probate, was produced and given in evidence, together with a certificate of their having been filed and recorded in the probate office in Lincoln on the 27th of August, 1881.

It does not appear that there was any direct evidence that Francis Richardson was seized of the 22½ acre parcel at the time of his death. The presumption, in the absence of any opposing circumstances, is undoubtedly that, being the owner at the date of the codicil, August 10, 1750, he continued such owner up to the time of his death, which occurred some years afterwards. Whether sufficient opposing circumstances to rebut this presumption are found in the absence of all claim to the land for three quarters of a century by the devisee or her husband, or her heirs, and the continued claim of ownership by the ancestors in title of the defendants during that period, is a question to be hereafter considered.

It is stated in the record that there was evidence tending to show that Abigail Fuller, the devisee, and her husband entered into possession of the property devised under the will and codicil, but what that evidence was does not appear. Abigail died prior to 1766, leaving her husband surviving her. He left Smithfield some time in 1761 "for parts unknown." It appears also that in a deed executed by him on the 11th of April, 1761, of the 20 acre lot designated on the diagram, he recited that such lot was bounded on the north by "his former land."

With the exception of the evidence tending to show that the devisee and her husband entered into possession of the property devised, and the reference by the husband in his deed to the tract as his former land, there was nothing to show that any claim of right or title to the land had been made by them, or by their heirs, for nearly three quarters of a century, either by the exercise of acts of ownership over it, such as its occupation or the use of its products, or by leasing or selling it, or by the payment of taxes, or in any other way. And for over forty years after the lapse of the three quarters of a century, the only claim of title made by the heirs of the devisee to any portion of the 22½ acre lot consisted in the fact that in 1835 they brought an action against certain persons with whom the defendants were not in privity of title or ancestry, for the recovery of another portion of the 22½ acre parcel, which action was discontinued in 1838 on account of the poverty and pecuniary inability of the heirs to carry it on; and in the fact that, at varying intervals between 1826 and 1857 (not 1858, as stated in one part of the record) they had been in the habit, under such claim, of cutting wood thereon openly for family use, and the manufacture of baskets, in which business some of them were engaged, and carrying it to their homes; and that on three occasions, once in 1840, once in 1845, and once in 1852, some of them, in contemplation of taking legal proceedings to establish their title, had gone around and upon the land and pointed out its boundaries. [540]

When Ezekiel Fuller departed from Smithfield in 1761, he left two children, Francis and Abigail, without means of support; and at a meeting of the town council in September following, proceedings were taken to provide for them. In a resolution reciting that "Ezekiel is gone, we know not where;" that his children were then and likely to be chargeable to the town; that little or nothing of Ezekiel's estate was to be found to support them, but that it was assumed there was some estate belonging to him, a person was appointed to make proper inquiry and search for it, "to know what land there is belonging to the family of said Ezekiel and secure the same for the support of the children." It would seem that the person thus appointed reported that there was a piece of land—a six acre parcel—which was possessed by Ezekiel in right of his wife; for the town council, at a meeting in March, 1776 [1766], after reciting that there was nothing of said Fuller's estate left behind to maintain his children but a small piece of land, and that no provision for their support could be had without the favor and authority of the General Assembly to sell and give a deed of it, appointed one Edward Mowry to lay the matter before the Assembly and request that it would pass an Act to enable some proper person to dispose of the parcel, and clothe him with authority to give a deed thereof. Mowry presented a proper petition to the Assembly, which granted the prayer and empowered the town treasurer, with the consent and advice of the town council to sell the land and apply the money received for the purpose stated; that is, the support of the children. A [541] sale of the six acre lot for £30 was accordingly made by the town treasurer under the authority thus conferred.

Abigail, the wife of Ezekiel, left five children surviving her, all of whom died before their father except Abigail, Jr., who was one of the two supported by the town. The father, who disappeared from Smithfield in 1761, died in the poor house in Attleboro, Massachusetts, in 1800. Abigail, the daughter, was born December 29, 1757, became of age December 29, 1778, and was married to Benjamin Fuller December 1, 1779. He died in 1832, and she died in 1835 intestate. The plaintiff is the grandson of this Abigail, and the parties for whom he is Trustee are her other descendants. They all derive whatever title they have from her.

On the 24th of May, 1874, a century and eighteen years after the probate of the will of Francis Richardson, all the heirs of Abigail Fuller, except one, executed a power of attorney to Theodore C. Fuller, also one of said heirs, authorizing him to sell to Nathan Fuller, the plaintiff in this action, all their title and interest in the tract conveyed by James Reed to Francis Richardson by deed dated April 10, 1750, and devised to Elizabeth [Abigail] Fuller, wife of Ezekiel, by his last will and testament probated [542] January 19, 1756, to hold the same upon trust to prosecute to final conclusion legal proceedings necessary to recover possession of the premises, to employ counsel for that purpose, to conduct the proceedings, and to make such compromises of the grantors' claims as to him and his counsel might seem best.

The same grantors, by their attorney, on the same day, executed a deed of the same tract of land to Nathan Fuller, reciting a consideration of $10, upon trusts similar to those contained in the power of attorney. Both documents were duly acknowledged by the grantors. The delivery of the deed was made by the attorney in this way; he and the grantee went upon the land with three other persons, and whilst upon it he delivered the deed to the grantee. He also took up some earth in his hands and passed it to the grantee. This he had been instructed to do by his counsel as the form of delivering possession. The parties were about fifteen minutes on the land. There was no evidence of any notice to or knowledge by the defendants of these acts, and they testified that they had neither. This is the case of the plaintiff, briefly stated.

The defendants trace their title to the land in question by continuous claim of title from a deed of the 22¼ acre parcel, made by one Jeremiah Richardson, a grandson of the testator, Francis Richardson, to Stephen Jenks, dated April 8, 1768, containing full covenants of title and warranty, and recorded in the records of Smithfield on July 10 following. Jeremiah Richardson was the son of Francis Richardson, who was a son of the testator, and is named in the will as having died. Jeremiah had a brother also called Francis Richardson, who died prior to March, 1766. Stephen Jenks, by deed dated August 12, 1796, containing full covenants of warranty, to secure several notes, amounting to $3,000, mortgaged the land in controversy, with adjoining lands to which he had acquired title, making in all 50 acres; of which the 20 acre lot, designated on the diagram, was one parcel, which he had purchased in 1763 for £640, and the 6 acre lot, also designated on the diagram, was another parcel, which he had purchased in 1768 for £45. He died in 1800, leaving a will, by which he devised his real estate in Smithfield and elsewhere to his children. Stephen Jenks, Jr., his son, acquired the in- [543] terests of the other heirs, and by deed dated May 18, 1804, conveyed the whole, including by specific description the land in controversy, to his brother, Jerahmael Jenks, who was the grandfather and ancestor in title of the defendants. Other portions of the 22¼ acre parcel were conveyed by ancestors in title of the defendants, by deeds to different parties, containing full covenants of title and warranty, dated respectively April 12, 1841, December 3, 1845, and May 21, 1860, and they entered into possession of the respective parcels, and enclosed and improved them. In May, 1864, the father of the defendants, from whom they derive their title, surveyed and plotted into town lots the remaining portion of that parcel, being the land in controversy. In the partition of the estate of the grandfather, Jerahmael Jenks, between his heirs at law, in 1824, this land had been taken by him as part of his estate, and plotted as such in the partition plot. He died in 1866.

The land was not inclosed on the line of the turnpike. In 1838 a fence was put up on the westerly side by an adjoining owner. On the southerly side there was at one time a fence running from the turnpike westerly to the other side of the ledge hereafter mentioned, but it disappeared in 1835. On the northerly line there was only a brush fence until 1867, when a purchaser of adjoining land erected one. The land has never been put under cultivation. Prior to 1858 it was covered with wood; and every year from 1829 to 1857 the ancestors of the defendants cut wood upon it for family use. In 1857 the father of the defendants cut and applied to his use all the wood of value then remaining. The land had an extensive ledge of rock running across its center from north to south, which was opened by defendants' ancestors as early as 1835. In 1845 or 1846 large quantities of stone were quarried and sold by them to railroad companies; and from that time down to the trial, with longer or shorter intervals, never of more than a year or two, the ledge was worked more or less extensively by the defendants or their ancestors in title, or their lessees and tenants, and the stone removed. There is no evidence that any other person had ever worked the ledge or taken stone off the land, or attempted to do so. [544]
The father of the defendants put up a sign on the land, stating that all persons were forbidden from taking wood or stone from it. In 1860 or 1861 his lessee built a barn and tool shed on the land near the ledge for his use in quarrying, these structures being in full view from Broad Street, formerly the turnpike. He also dug a well, from which he obtained water for his business. The barn, with lofts for hay, was of sufficient capacity "to accommodate and did accommodate six or eight horses, or more." It remained on the land, with some additions, until some time in 1869, when it was removed by the lessee. The land was assessed for taxes to the ancestors in title of the defendants, and paid by them, for twenty years, between 1770 and 1805. The tax lists for the other years up to 1805 could not be found. From 1805 to the time of the trial, a period of seventy-seven years, the land was assessed to them, and the taxes were paid by them. The Statute of Rhode Island respecting the assessment of taxes, in force between 1798 and 1825, required the assessors to assess taxes on real estate to persons who held and occupied it, and the one in force between 1825 and 1855 required them to assess the taxes to those who held and occupied it or to the owners thereof, and the one in force after 1855, to the owners thereof. No taxes were ever assessed to the Fullers or paid by them. Neither plaintiff nor defendants, nor their ancestors, ever resided on the premises, and the land was occupied and possessed by the ancestors in title of the defendants only in the way mentioned.

Upon the case thus presented, and we have not omitted, we think, any material circumstance in the statement, the defendants asked an instruction to the jury as to the presumption they might make of a lost grant to their ancestor in title, which the court refused. Its charge was thus:

"Of course, gentlemen, if you find that you can presume a grant, if you find from the testimony that there was a lost deed which passed from Abigail Fuller to Jeremiah Richardson, or to Francis Richardson, and the property was inherited by Jeremiah, so that Jeremiah had a good title to convey to Stephen Jenks, that makes the title of the defendants here complete. * * * But, gentlemen, you are to look [545] into the evidence upon this question of a grant; and if the evidence in favor of the presumption is overcome by the evidence against such a grant, then, of course, you will not presume one. It is a question of testimony."

The defendants requested the court to instruct the jury "that the presumption they were authorized to make of a lost deed was not necessarily restricted to what may fairly be supposed to have occurred, but rather to what may have occurred and seems requisite to quiet title in the possessor."

This instruction the court refused to give, or to modify its charge in conformity with it. The defendants now contend that the court thus erred, its charge being in effect that in order to presume a lost deed the jury must be satisfied that such a deed had in fact actually existed. Such seems to us to be the purport of the charge, and therein there was error.

In such cases "presumptions" as said by Sir William Grant, "do not always proceed on a belief that the thing presumed has actually taken place. Grants are frequently presumed, as Lord Mansfield says, merely from a principle and for the purpose of quieting the possession. There is as much occasion for presuming conveyances of legal estates; as otherwise titles must often be imperfect, and in many cases unavailable when from length of time it has become impossible to discover in whom the legal estate (if outstanding) is already vested." Hillary v. Waller, 12 Ves. 239, 252; Eldridge v. Knott, Cowp. 215.

The owners of property, especially if it be valuable and available, do not often allow it to remain in the quiet and unquestioned enjoyment of others. Such a course is not in accordance with the ordinary conduct of men. When, therefore, possession and use are long continued, they create a presumption of lawful origin; that is, that they are founded upon such instruments and proceedings as in law would pass the right to the possession and use of the property. It may be, in point of fact, that permission to occupy and use was given orally, or upon a contract of sale, with promise of a future conveyance, which parties have subsequently neglected to obtain, or the conveyance [546] executed may not have been acknowledged, so as to be recorded, or may have been mislaid or lost. Many circumstances may prevent the execution of a deed of conveyance, to which the occupant of land is entitled, or may lead to its loss after being executed. It is a matter of almost daily experience that reconveyances of property, transferred by the owners upon conditions or trusts, are often delayed after the conditions are performed or the trusts discharged, simply because of the pressure of other engagements, and a conviction that they can be readily obtained at any time.

The death of parties may leave in the hands of executors or heirs papers constituting muniments of title, of the value of which the latter may have no knowledge, and therefore for the preservation and record of which may take no action; and thus the documents may be deposited in places exposed to decay and destruction. Should they be lost, witnesses of their execution, or of contracts for their execution, may not be readily found, or if found, time may have so impaired their recollection of the transactions that they can only be imperfectly recalled, and of course imperfectly stated. The law, in tenderness to the infirmities of human nature, steps in and by reasonable presumptions, that acts to protect one's rights, which might have been done, and in the ordinary course of things generally would be done, have been done in the particular case under consideration, affords the necessary protection against possible failure to obtain or to preserve the proper muniments of title, and avoids the necessity of relying upon the fallible memory of witnesses, when time may have dimmed their recollection of past transactions; and thus gives peace and quiet to long and uninterrupted possessions.

The rule of presumption, in such cases, as has been well said, is one of policy, as well as of convenience, and necessary for the peace and security of society. "Where one uses an easement whenever he sees fit, without asking leave and without objection," says the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, "his adverse and uninterrupted enjoyment for twenty-one years is a title which cannot afterwards be disputed. Such enjoyment, without evidence to explain [547] how it began, is presumed to have been in pursuance of a full and unqualified grant." Garrett v. Jackson, 20 Pa. 335. The same presumption will arise whether the grant relate to corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments. As said by this court in Ricard v. Williams, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 109 [5: 410], speaking by Mr. Justice Story: "A grant of land may as well be presumed as a grant of a fishery, or of a common, or of a way. Presumptions of this nature are adopted, from the general infirmity of human nature, the difficulty of preserving muniments of title, and the public policy of supporting long and uninterrupted possessions. They are founded upon the consideration that the facts are such as could not, according to the ordinary course of human affairs, occur, unless there was a transmutation of title to, or an admission of an existing adverse title in, the party in possession."

It is not necessary therefore, in the cases mentioned, for the jury, in order to presume a conveyance, to believe that a conveyance was in point of fact executed. It is sufficient if the evidence leads to the conclusion that the conveyance might have been executed and that its existence would be a solution of the difficulties arising from its nonexecution. In Edson v. Munsell, 10 Allen, 557, which was an action for obstructing the enjoyment of an easement, the doctrine of acquiring such rights by prescription or adverse possession is elaborately considered; and it is there said that "The fiction of presuming a grant from twenty years' possession or use was invented by the English courts in the eighteenth century, to avoid the absurdity of their rule of legal memory, and was derived by analogy from the limitation prescribed by the Statute of 21 Jac. 1, c. 21, for actions of ejectment. It is not founded on a belief that the grant has actually been made in a particular case, but on the general presumption that a man will naturally enjoy what belongs to him, the difficulty of proof after lapse of time, and the policy of not disturbing long continued possessions."

In Casey's Lessees v. Inloes, 1 Gill, 508, which was an action of ejectment, the Court of Appeals of Maryland held that where there had [548] been a continuous possession of land for twenty years or upwards by a party or persons claiming under him, the court was authorized to instruct the jury, in the absence of a deed to such party, to presume that one had been executed to him. It also approved the refusal of the court below to instruct the jury that before they could find a title in the defendants, or any one of them, by presumption of a grant by the plaintiff or those under whom he claims, they must believe on their consciences and find as a fact that such grant was actually made. "The granting of such a prayer," said the court, "would have a tendency to mislead the jury, by inducing them to believe that a presumption of a grant could not be made, unless the jury in point of fact believed in the execution of the grant; whereas, it is frequently the duty of the jury to find such presumption as an inference of law, although in their consciences they may disbelieve the actual execution of any such grant."

In Williams v. Dowell, 2 Head, 695, 698, which was also an action of ejectment, the Supreme Court of Tennessee, speaking on the same point, said: "It is not indispensable, in order to lay a proper foundation for the legal presumption of a grant, to establish the probability of the fact that in reality a grant ever issued. It will be a sufficient ground for the presumption to show that by legal possibility a grant might have issued; and this appearing, it may be assumed, in the absence of circumstances repelling such conclusions, that all that might lawfully have been done to perfect the legal title was in fact done, and in the form prescribed by law."

In accordance with the doctrine thus explicitly declared, there can be no doubt that the court below should have instructed the jury as requested. It would seem from the instruction given that the deed which the defendants insisted might be presumed was one from Ezekiel and Abigail Fuller, or from Abigail Fuller, to Jeremiah Richardson. We think, however, that the facts point with equal directness to a conveyance from his grandfather. The codicil to his will, by which he devised the property to his married daughter, was dated several years before his death; and there was no evidence that he was seised of it at that time, except the presumption arising from his having once possessed it. It does not appear that either the [549] devisee or her husband ever exercised any acts of ownership in any way, or ever claimed to own it. After he left Smithfield, two of his children were supported by the town, and the agent of the town, appointed to search for any property belonging to the father, from the sale of which the children might be supported, reported that there was only the 6 acre parcel, which was held by him in the right of his wife. He afterwards went to the poor house, where he died in 1800. During the thirty-nine years after he left Smithfield, and notwithstanding his having been part of that time in the poor house, no word appears to have come from him asserting that he had any interest in the property. It is difficult to reconcile his conduct or that of his wife, the devisee, if in truth the testator continued the owner of the property until his death, and it passed under the codicil to his will. While Ezekiel Fuller was still living, and for several years after he had left Smithfield, Jeremiah Richardson, the testator's grandson, asserted ownership of the tract by its sale to Stephen Jenks by a deed, with covenants of title and warranty, which was recorded in the town records. No word of opposition to this sale or to the subsequent mortgage of the property by the grantee was ever made, so far as the record discloses. The fact that Jeremiah Richardson was a minor when his grandfather died does not militate against the presumption of a deed to him. Nothing would be more natural than a deed of gift from the grandfather to the grandson. It would also seem from the charge of the court, that in the deed of Jeremiah to Jencks he recited that the property had come from his honored grandfather, or words to that effect.

If, however, the evidence which, as the record says, tended to show that the devisee and her husband entered into the possession of the property devised, and the recital in his deed of April 11, 1761, of the 20 acre parcel, that it was bounded on the north by his former land, can be considered as rebutting the presumption of such a deed by the testator, then the defendants may fall back on the presumption of a deed to Jeremiah Richardson by Ezekiel and Abigail Fuller, the devisee, and her husband. [550] There is nothing in the conduct or language of either of these parties which in any way repels such a presumption. Their silence and nonclaim of the property would rather indicate that they had parted with their interest. The minority of Jeremiah at the time only shows his inability to purchase the property, but those under whose charge he was could have purchased it for him, and had the deed executed to him. His orphanage may have induced such a proceeding. We do not, therefore, think that his minority at the time can be urged against the presumption of a deed to him.

For the refusal of the court below to give the instruction requested, the case must go back for a new trial. We will add, moreover, that though a presumption of a deed is one that may be rebutted by proof of facts inconsistent with its supposed existence, yet where no such facts are shown, and the things done, and the things omitted, with regard to the property in controversy, by the respective parties, for long periods of time after the execution of the supposed conveyance, can be explained satisfactorily only upon the hypothesis of its existence, then the jury may be instructed that it is their duty to presume such a conveyance, and thus quiet the possession.

How long a period must elapse after the date of the supposed conveyance before it may be presumed to have existed has not always been a matter of easy determination. "In general," said this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Story, "it is the policy of courts of law to limit the presumption of grants to periods analogous to those of the Statute of Limitations in cases where the statute does not apply. But where the statute applies, it constitutes ordinarily a sufficient title or defense independently of any presumption of a grant, and, therefore, it is not generally resorted to. But if the circumstances of the case justify it, a presumption of a grant may as well be made in the one case as in the other; and where the other circumstances are very cogent and full, there is no absolute bar against the presumption of a grant, within a period short of the Statute of Limitations." Ricard v. Williams, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 59, 110 [5: 398, 410].

[551] The general statement of the doctrine, as we have seen from the authorities cited, is that the presumption of a grant is indulged merely to quiet a long possession which might otherwise be disturbed by reason of the inability of the possessor to produce the muniments of title, which were actually given at the time of the acquisition of the property by him or those under whom he claims, but have been lost, or which he or they were entitled to have at that time, but had neglected to obtain, and of which the witnesses have passed away, or their recollection of the transaction has become dimmed and imperfect. And hence, as a general rule, it is only where the possession has been actual, open and exclusive for the period prescribed by the Statute of Limitations to bar an action for the recovery of land, that the presumption of a deed can be invoked. But the reason for attaching such weight to a possession of this character is the notoriety it gives to the claim of the occupant; and, in countries where land is generally occupied or cultivated, it is the most effective mode of asserting ownership. But, as Mr. Justice Story observes, in delivering the opinion of this court in Green v. Liter, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 249 [3: 552]. "In the simplicity of ancient times there were no means of ascertaining titles but by the visible seisin; and indeed, there was no other mode between subjects of passing title but livery of the land itself by the symbolical delivery of turf and twig. The moment that a tenant was thus seised he had a perfect investiture, and if ousted could maintain his action for the realty, although he had not been long enough in possession even to touch the esplees. The very object of the rule, therefore, was notoriety; to prevent frauds upon the land and upon the other tenants." There may be acts equally notorious, and therefore equally evincive of ownership, which, taken in connection with a long possession, even if that possession has been subject to occasional intrusion, are as fully suggestive of rightful origin as an uninterrupted possession. Where any proprietary right is exercised for a long period, which, if not founded upon a lawful origin, would in the usual course of things be resisted by parties interested, and no such resistance is made, a presumption may be indulged that the proprietary right had a lawful origin. The principle is thus stated by Mr. Justice Stephen [552] of the High Court of Justice of England, in his Digest of the Law of Evidence, using the term "grant" in a general sense, as indicating a conveyance of real property, whether corporeal or incorporeal: "When it has been shown that any person has, for a long period of time, exercised any proprietary right which might have had a lawful origin by grant or license from the Crown or from a private person, and the exercise of which might and naturally would have been prevented by the persons interested, if it had not had a lawful origin, there is a presumption that such right had a lawful origin and that it was created by a proper instrument which has been lost." Art. 100.

This presumption may therefore, in some instances, be properly invoked where a proprietary right has long been exercised, although the exclusive possession of the whole property to which the right is asserted may have been occasionally interrupted during the period necessary to create a title by adverse possession, if in addition to the actual possession there were other open acts of ownership. If the interruptions did not impair the uses to which the possessor subjected the property, and for which it was chiefly valuable, they should not necessarily be held to defeat the presumption of the rightful origin of his claim to which the facts would otherwise lead. It is a matter which, under proper instructions, may be left to the jury.

In the present case, acts of ownership over the property in controversy by the ancestors in title of the defendants, so far as they could be manifested by written transfers of it, either as conveyances of title or by way of security, were exercised from 1768 for more than a century. The first conveyance, from which the defendants traced their title, was duly recorded in the land records of the town soon after its execution in that year. The assessment of taxes on the property to those ancestors, and their payment of the taxes for twenty years between 1770 and 1805, and the assessment of taxes to them or to the defendants for seventy-seven years after 1805, and the payment of taxes by them, such assessment being required to be made, under the laws of the State, to occupants or owners of the land, are circumstances of great significance, taken in connection [553] with their constantly asserted ownership. In Ewing v. Burnet, this court speaks of the uninterrupted payment of taxes on a lot for twenty-four consecutive years as "powerful evidence of claim of right to the whole lot." 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 54 [9: 630]. Here, as seen, the taxes were uninterruptedly paid by the defendants or their ancestors in title for a much longer period.

In St. Louis Public Schools v. Risley's Heirs, the Supreme Court of Missouri said: "Payment of taxes has been admitted in questions of adverse possession and may have an important bearing, as it is not usual for one owning realty to neglect paying taxes for a period which would be sufficient to constitute a bar under the Statute of Limitations, or for one to pay taxes, having no claim or color of title." 40 Mo. 370. In Davis v. Easley, which was an action of ejectment, the Supreme Court of Illinois held that receipts for taxes paid by the plaintiff were admissible, and said: "The payment of taxes indicated that the plaintiff claimed title to the whole tract. It likewise tended to explain the character and extent of his possession." 13 Ill. 201.

In this case, the ancestors of the defendants entered upon the land under claim of title, and opened and worked the ledge of rock running through it, as early as 1835, and from 1846 they or their tenants or lessees continued, with occasional intervals, to work that ledge to the time of trial in 1882, a period of thirty-six years, and it does not appear that during that time anyone ever interfered with their work or complained of it. To constitute an adverse possession it was not necessary that they should have actually occupied or inclosed the land. It was sufficient that they subjected it to such uses as it was susceptible of to the exclusion of others. Ellicott v. Pearl, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 442 [9: 487]. That subjection might be shown by the quarrying of the ledge and the removal of the stone, without disturbance or complaint from any quarter. The exclusive working of the quarry, under claim of title to the whole tract by virtue of conveyances in which it was described, might operate in law to carry the possession over the whole; and the payment of taxes thereon might authorize the jury to infer a continu- [554] ous possession of the whole, notwithstanding any temporary and occasional intrusion by others upon a different part of the tract, which did not interfere with the work.

The entry of the plaintiff with the attorney of his coheirs in 1874, and the delivery of the deed to him with a handful of earth, if weight and consideration are to be given to that proceeding under the circumstances in which it was made, would only reduce the period of undisturbed possession to twenty-eight years. The cutting of wood on a different portion of the land by the Fullers for family use, or the manufacture of baskets, at occasional intervals during a portion of this period, though competent for the consideration of the jury, was not necessarily an interruption to the peaceable occupation of the land, so far as quarrying of the ledge and the removal of the stone were concerned, to which uses the defendants and their ancestors in title subjected it, and which appear to have constituted its principal value. Nor did it necessarily change the legal effect of the possession for quarrying the ledge with the attendant claim to the whole tract.

In Webb v. Richardson, the Supreme Court of Vermont, in speaking of interruptions in the actual occupancy of real property as effecting the claim of continuous possession said: "To constitute a continuous possession it is not necessary that the occupant should be actually upon the premises continually. The mere fact that time intervenes between successive acts of occupancy does not necessarily destroy the continuity of the possession. The kind and frequency of the acts of occupancy necessary to constitute a continuous possession depend somewhat on the condition of the property, and the uses to which it is adapted in reference to the circumstances and situation of the possessor, and partly on his intention. If, in the intermediate time between the different acts of occupancy, there is no existing intention to continue the possession, or to return to the enjoyment of the premises, the possession, if it has not ripened into a title, terminates, and cannot afterwards be connected with a subsequent occupation so as to be made available toward gaining title; while such continual intention might, and generally would, preserve the possession unbroken." 42 Vt. 465–473. That was an action of [555] trespass for cutting timber on the land of the plaintiff, who was in possession at the time, and offered testimony to prove that his possession was earlier than the defendant's, and also that he had acquired the land by fifteen years' adverse possession. The defendant did not show a chain of title back to the original proprietor of the land, but showed that his grantors entered into possession in 1835, and cut timber and claimed to own the land, and it was held that the question whether this entry interrupted the plaintiff's possession should have been submitted to the jury under proper instructions, in connection with the plaintiff's evidence of continuous possession under those through whom he claimed, and that it was error to refuse to submit it.

Our conclusion is that the claim to the land in controversy by the defendants and their ancestors in title for over a century, with the payment of taxes thereon, and acts of ownership suited to the condition of the property, and its actual use for thirty-six or twenty-eight years, it matters not which, would justify a presumption of a deed to the original ancestor, Jeremiah Richardson, to quiet the possession of the defendants claiming under him, and the jury should have been permitted to presume such a deed without finding from the testimony that there was in point of fact a deed which was lost. If the execution of a deed was established, nothing further would be required than proof of its contents; there would be no occasion for the exercise of any presumption on the subject. It is only where there is uncertainty on this point that the presumption is indulged to quiet the possession.

The judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

THOMAS BALDWIN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
J. C. FRANKS, Marshal of the UNITED STATES OF AMERICA FOR THE DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 678-707.)

Criminal law—conspiracy to drive Chinese subjects from their homes not within sections 5508, 5336, R. S.—section 5519 R. S., invalid in its operation within the States—construction of statutes—civil rights.

1. Statutes that are constitutional in part only will be upheld so far as they are not in conflict with the Constitution, provided the allowed and prohibited parts are severable, so that each may be read alone.

2. Section 5519, R. S., cannot be sustained in whole or in part in its operation within a State, neither as to a conspiracy to deprive a person of protection under state laws nor a conspiracy to deprive him of rights secured to him by the Constitution, laws or treaties of the United States.

3. A conspiracy to deprive Chinese subjects, residing within a State, of rights secured to them by treaty, by forcibly expelling them from their homes and the town in which they reside, is not an offense within section 5508, R. S., which is held to apply only to conspiracies affecting citizens in their enjoyment of the elective franchise and their civil rights as citizens.

4. A conspiracy to deprive Chinese subjects of their rights under the laws and treaties of the United States is not within section 5336, R. S. An offense within that section means something more than setting the laws themselves at defiance. There must be a forcible resistance of the authority of the United States while endeavoring to carry the laws into execution.

5. Penal statutes must be strictly construed.

Submitted Apr. 26, 1886. Decided Mar. 7, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California. Opinion below published, 27 Fed. Rep. 187. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. A. L. Hart, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Hall McAllister, for defendant in error:

Any attempt to compel or constrain any Chinese resident of this country to remove from or to any particular place, or to refrain from following any lawful occupation, or doing any lawful work that he may find to do, is not only morally wrong, but contrary to the law of the land.

The words "privileges and immunities," used in the Constitution in relation to rights of citizens of the different States, have been fully considered by this court and generally defined, and there can be no doubt that the definitions given are equally applicable to the same words as used in the Treaty with China.

Ward v. Md. 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 430 (20: 452); Slaughter House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 76 (21: 408); Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. (C. C.) 380, 384. See also Holden v. Joy, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 242 (21: 533); U. S. v. 43 Gallons of Whisky, 93 U. S. 196, 198 (23: 847).

This case is not obnoxious to the several cases in which this court has decided that certain provisions of the United States Statutes were merely intended to prohibit state action, and had no reference to the conduct of individuals.

Neither is this case within the operation of those decisions of this court which hold that the complaint is insufficient in failing to show that the crime charged is violative of some federal right possessed by the injured party. Here the allegations of the complaint are clear and distinct, that the whole object of the conspiracy charged, and of all the overt acts committed in pursuance thereof, was to drive and expel the Chinese aliens in question from their homes, from the County of Sutter, from their rights of residence in the Town of Nicolaus, from their right of labor in said town where they then lived, and from their right to there earn a livelihood at their respective lawful vocations as theretofore.

The distinction which runs through the cases decided by this court is that the complaint (to bring the offense within federal jurisdiction) must clearly show, not merely that the offenders have committed a crime, but that the crime has been committed with the manifest intent of defeating a federal right possessed by the injured party; that where the State interferes with rights of individuals, guaranteed to them by the Constitution or laws or treaties of the United States, then such state action comes within the prohibition of the Acts of Congress, provided Congress has taken appropriate action in the premises. And so, also, where Congress has made it an offense to violate certain rights of individuals, that where such individual rights are violated, and such rights are federal in their character, that is, rights guaranteed to the injured individuals by the Constitution, or laws, or treaties of the United States, that then they constitute federal offenses within the appropriate action of Congress, and within the jurisdiction of the federal tribunals.

U. S. v. Reese, 92 U. S. 217 (23: 564); U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 548 (23: 590); U. S. v. Harris, 106 U. S. 636-640 (27: 292-294); Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S. 657-666 (28: 275-279); U. S. v. Waddell, 112 U. S. 79 (28: 673).

The circumstance that the offense named was committed within the territory of the State of California does not deprive the federal court of jurisdiction nor Congress of the power "to define and punish" the offense.

U. S. v. Holliday, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 407 (18: 182); U. S. v. 43 Gallons of Whisky, 93 U. S. 188 (23: 846); Ex parte Yarbrough, and U. S. Waddell, supra.

As to the scope of the treaty-making power, see:

Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 561 (10: 589); Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483 (25: 628).

The Government of the United States, and not the State of California, is responsible for the damages sustained by the Chinese aliens in question.

Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275 (23: 550).

The question in this case could not have been involved in U. S. v. Harris, 106 U. S. 641 (27: 294). In that case the law alleged to have been violated was a law of the State; but here the law alleged to have been violated is a law of the United States, a treaty—which is the supreme law of the land.

A statute may be regarded as constitutional for one purpose and not for another.

Tiernan v. Rinker, 102 U. S. 123 (26: 103); People v. Hill, 7 Cal. 104; Oregon v. Wiley, 4

Oreg. 187; Mundy v. Monroe, 1 Mich. 68; Cargill v. Power, 1 Mich. 369; Baker v. Braman, 6 Hill, 47.

This is a writ of error brought by Thomas Baldwin, the plaintiff in error, for the review of a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, refusing his discharge on a writ of habeas corpus, from the custody of the Marshal of the district; and the questions presented for consideration arise on a certificate of the judges holding the court, of a division of opinion between them in the progress of the trial. The record shows that Baldwin was held in custody by the Marshal, under a warrrant issued by a commissioner of the circuit court, on a charge of conspiracy with Bird Wilson, William Hays and others, to deprive Sing Lee and others, belonging to "a class of Chinese aliens, being * * * subjects of the Emperor of China, of the equal protection of the laws and of equal privileges and immunities under the laws, [681] for that said * * * persons so belonging to the class of Chinese aliens did then * * * reside at the Town of Nicolaus, in said County of Sutter, in said State of California, and were engaged in legitimate business and labor to earn a living, as they had a right to do, and they at that time had a right to reside at said Town of Nicolaus, * * * and engage in legitimate business and labor to earn a living, under and by virtue of the Treaties existing, and which did then exist, between the Government of the United States and the Emperor of China, and the Constitution and laws of the United States; but, nevertheless, while said * * * persons were * * * so residing and pursuing their legitimate business and labor for the purpose aforesaid, said conspirators * * * did, * * * having conspired together for that purpose, unlawfully and with force and arms, violently and with intimidation, drive and expel said persons, * * * belonging to said class of Chinese, * * * from their residence at said Town of Nicolaus, * * * and did * * * deprive them * * * of the privilege of conducting their legitimate business and of the privflege of laboring to earn a living, and, without any legal process, * * * placed said Chinese aliens * * * under unlawful restraint and arrest, and so detained them for several hours, and * * * by force and arms, and with violence and intimidation, placed them * * * upon a steamboat barge, then plying on the Feather River, and drove them from their residence and labor and from said county."

The questions certified relate only to the sufficiency of this charge for the detention of the prisoner. There are nine questions in all, the first six having reference to section 5519 of the Revised Statutes, and the others to sections 5508 and 5336, as the authority for the prosecution. The fourth fairly presents the whole case as it arises under section 5519, and that is as follows:

"4. Whether a conspiracy of two or more persons in the State of California, for the purpose of depriving Chinese residents, lawfully residing in California, in pursuance of the provisions of the several treaties between the United States and the Emperor of China, of the right to live and pursue their lawful vocations at the Town of Nicolaus in said State, and in pursuance of such conspiracy actually forcibly expelling such Chinese from said town, in [682] the manner shown by the record, is: 1. A violation of and an offense within the meaning of section 5519 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; 2. Whether said section, so far as it applies to said state of facts and such Chinese residents, and makes the acts stated an offense against the United States, is constitutional and valid."

The seventh presents all the points for consideration under sections 5508 and 5336, as follows:

"7. Where two or more persons, with or without disguise, go upon the premises of Chinese subjects, lawfully residing in the State of California, with intent to prevent and hinder their free exercise or enjoyment of any right secured to them by the several Treaties between the United States and the Emperor of China, and in pursuance of such conspiracy, forcibly prevent their exercise and enjoyment of such rights, and expel such Chinese subjects from the town in which they reside:

"Whether (1) such acts so performed constitute an offense within the meaning of the provisions of section 5508 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and,

"(2) If so, whether the provisions of said section, so making said acts an offense, are constitutional and valid;

"(3) Whether such acts so performed constitute an offense within the meaning of that clause of section 5336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which makes it an offense for two or more persons in any State to conspire, 'by force, to prevent, hinder or delay the execution of any law of the United States,' or within the meaning of any other clause of said section; and,

"(4) Whether said section, so far as applicable to the facts stated, is a constitutional and valid law of the United States."

The precise question we have to determine is not whether Congress has the constitutional authority to provide for the punishment of such an offense as that with which Baldwin is charged, but whether it has so done.

That the treaty-making power has been surrendered by the States and given to the United States is unquestionable. It is true, also, that [683] the treaties made by the United States and in force are part of the supreme law of the land, and that they are as binding within the territorial limits of the States as they are elsewhere throughout the dominion of the United States.

Articles II and III of a Treaty between the United States and the Emperor of China, concluded November 17, 1880, and proclaimed by the President of the United States October 5, 1881, are as follows:

Article II. "Chinese subjects, whether proceeding to the United States as teachers, students, merchants, or from curiosity, together with their body and household servants, and Chinese laborers who are now in the United States, shall be allowed to go and come of their own free will and accord, and shall be accorded all the rights, privileges, immunities and exemptions which are accorded to the citizens and subjects of the most favored Nation."

Article III. "If Chinese laborers, or Chinese of any other class, now either permanently or temporarily residing in the territory of the United States, meet with ill treatment at the hands of any other persons, the Government of the United States will exert all its power to devise measures for their protection and to secure to them the same rights, privileges, immunities and exemptions as may be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored Nation, and to which they are entitled by treaty." 22 Stat. at L. 827.

That the United States have power under the Constitution to provide for the punishment of those who are guilty of depriving Chinese subjects of any of the rights, privileges, immunities or exemptions guaranteed to them by this Treaty, we do not doubt. What we have to decide, under the questions certified here from the court below, is whether this has been done by the sections of the Revised Statutes specially referred to. These sections are as follows:

Sec. 5519. "If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire, or go in disguise on the highway or on the premises of another, for the purpose of depriving, either directly or indirectly, any person or class of persons of the equal protection of the laws, or of equal privileges and immunities under the laws; or for the purpose of preventing or hindering [684] the constituted authorities of any State or Territory from giving or securing to all persons within such State or Territory the equal protection of the laws; each of such persons shall be punished by a fine of not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

Sec. 5508. "If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same; or if two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured, they shall be fined not more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not more than ten years; and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office, or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States."

Sec. 5336. "If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire to overthrow, put down, or to destroy by force the Government of the United States, or to levy war against them, or to oppose by force the authority thereof; or by force to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States; or by force to seize, take or possess any property of the United States contrary to the authority thereof; each of them shall be punished by a fine of not less than five hundred dollars and not more than five thousand dollars; or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for a period not less than six months, nor more than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

As the charge on which Baldwin is held in custody was evidently made under section 5519, and that is the section which was most considered in the court below, we will answer the questions based on that first. It provides for the punishment of those who "in any State or Territory conspire * * * for the purpose of de- [685] priving, either directly or indirectly, any person or class of persons of the equal protection of the laws, or of equal privileges or immunities under the laws."

In United States v. Harris, 106 U. S. 629 [27: 290], it was decided that this section was unconstitutional, as a provision for the punishment of conspiracies of the character therein mentioned, within a State. It is now said, however, that in that case the conspiracy charged was by persons in a State against a citizen of the United States, and of the State, to deprive him of the protection he was entitled to under the laws of that State, no special rights or privileges arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States being involved; and it is argued that, although the section be invalid so far as such an offense is concerned, it is good for the punishment of those who conspire to deprive aliens of the rights guaranteed to them in a State by the Treaties of the United States. In support of this argument reliance is had on the well settled rule that a statute may be in part constitutional and in part unconstitutional, and that under some circumstances the part which is constitutional will be enforced, and only that which is unconstitutional rejected. To give effect to this rule, however, the parts—that which is constitutional and that which is unconstitutional—must be capable of separation, so that each may be read by itself. This statute, considered as a statute punishing conspiracies in a State, is not of that character, for in that connection it has no parts within the meaning of the rule. Whether it is separable, so that it can be enforced in a Territory, though not in a State, is quite another question, and one we are not now called on to decide. It provides in general terms for the punishment of all who conspire for the purpose of depriving any person, or any class of persons, of the equal protection of the laws, or of equal privileges or immunities under the laws. A single provision, which makes up the whole section, embraces those who conspire against citizens, as well as those who conspire against aliens—those who conspire to deprive one of his rights under the laws of a State, and those who conspire to deprive him of his rights under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. The lim- [686] itation which is sought must be made, if at all, by construction, not by separation. This, it has often been decided, is not enough.

Thus, in United States v. Reese, 92 U. S. 214 [23: 563], the indictment was against two of the inspectors of a municipal election in Kentucky, under sections 3 and 4 of the Act of May 31, 1870, chap. 114, 16 Stat. at L. 140, which provided in general terms for the punishment of inspectors who should wrongfully refuse to receive the vote of a citizen when presented under certain circumstances, and for the punishment of those who by unlawful means hindered or delayed any citizen from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote, or from voting, at any election. There was nothing in either of the sections to limit their operation to a refusal or hindrance "on account of the race, color, or previous condition of servitude" of the voter, and it was held that they were unconstitutional because, on their face, they were broad enough to cover wrongful acts without as well as within the constitutional power of Congress. An attempt was made there as here to limit the statute by construction so as to make it operate only on that which Congress might rightfully prohibit and punish, but to this the court said, p. 221 [565]: "For this purpose we must take these sections of the statute as they are. We are not able to reject a part which is unconstitutional, and retain the remainder, because it is not possible to separate that which is unconstitutional, if there be any such, from that which is not. The proposed effect is not to be attained by striking out or disregarding words that are in the section, but by inserting those that are not now there Each of the sections must stand as a whole, or fall altogether. The language is plain. There is no room for construction, unless it be as to the effect of the Constitution. The question then to be determined is whether we can introduce words of limitation into a penal statute so as to make it specific, when, as expressed, it is general only." This was answered in the negative, the court remarking: "To limit this statute in the manner now asked for would be to make a new law, not to enforce an old one."

[687] Following this were the Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82 [25: 550], in which there were indictments under sections 4 and 5 of the Act of August 14, 1876, chap. 274, 19 Stat. at L. 141, "to punish the counterfeiting of trade-mark goods and the sale or dealing in of counterfeit trade-mark goods." Of this Act the court said, speaking through Mr. Justice Miller, p. 98 [553], that its broad purpose "was to establish a universal system of trade-mark registration, for the benefit of all who had already used a trade-mark, or who wished to adopt one in the future, without regard to the character of the trade to which it was to be applied or the residence of the owner, with the solitary exception that those who resided in foreign countries which extended no such privileges to us were excluded from them here." A statute so broad and sweeping was then held not to be within the constitutional grant of legislative power to Congress, but, p. 95 [552], "whether the trade-mark bears such a relation to commerce in general terms as to bring it within congressional control, when used or applied to the classes of commerce which fall within that control," was properly left undecided. The indictment, however, presented a case in which the defendant was charged with having in his possession counterfeits and colorable imitations of the trade-marks of foreign manufacturers, and it was suggested that if Congress had power to regulate trade-marks used in commerce with foreign Nations and among the several States, this statute might be held valid in that class of cases, if no further; but the court decided otherwise, and in so doing said, p. 98 [553]: "While it may be true that when one part of a statute is valid and constitutional, and another part is unconstitutional and void, the court may enforce the valid part, when they are distinctly separable, so that each can stand alone, it is not within the judicial province to give to the words used by Congress a narrower meaning than they are manifestly intended to bear, in order that crimes may be punished which are not described in language that brings them within the constitutional power of that body." And again, further on, after citing United States v. Reese, and quoting from the opinion in that case, it was said, p. 99 [553]: "If we should, in the case before us, undertake to make by judicial construction a law which Congress did not make, it is quite probable we should do what, if the matter were now before that body, it would be unwilling to do; namely, to make a trade-mark law which is only partial in its operation, and which would complicate the rights which parties would hold, in some instances under the Act of Congress, and in others under a state law." [688]

The same question was also considered and the former decisions approved in United States v. Harris, supra, and in the Virginia Coupon Cases, 114 U. S. 305 [29: 197], it was said that "To hold otherwise would be to substitute for the law intended by the Legislature one they may never have been willing by itself to enact."

It is suggested, however, that Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 80 [24: 377] and Presser v. Illinois, 116 U. S. 252 [29: 615] are inconsistent with United States v. Reese and the Trade-Mark Cases, but we do not so understand them. In Packet Co. v. Keokuk the question arose upon an ordinance of the City of Keokuk establishing a wharf on the Mississippi River and the rates of wharfage to be paid for its use. In its general scope the ordinance was broad enough to include a part of the shore of the river declared to be a wharf, which was in its natural condition and unimproved. The city had, however, actually built, paved and improved a wharf at a large expense within the limits of the ordinance, and the charges then in question were for the use of the facilities thus provided for receiving and discharging cargoes. An objection was made to the validity of the ordinance because it provided for charges to be paid for the use of the unimproved bank as well as for the improved wharves, but the court said, p. 89 [381]: "The ordinance of Keokuk has imposed no charge upon these plaintiffs which it was beyond the power of the city to impose. To the extent to which they are affected by it there is no valid objection to it. Statutes that are constitutional in part only will be upheld so far as they are not in conflict with the Constitution, provided the allowed and prohibited parts are severable. We think a severance is possible in this case It may be conceded that the ordinance is too broad, and that some of its provisions are unwarranted. When those provisions are attempted to be enforced, a different question may be presented." That was not a penal statute, but only a city ordinance regulating wharfage, and the suit was civil in its nature. The only question was whether the packet company was bound to pay for the use of improved wharves when the ordinance, taken in its breadth, fixed the charges and required payment for the use of that part of the established wharf which was unimproved as well as that which was improved. The precise point to be determined was whether, under those circumstances, the vessel owners were [689] excused from paying for the use of that which was improved.

In Presser v. Illinois, the indictment was for a violation of the provisions of one of the sections of the Military Code of Illinois, and it was claimed that the whole Code was invalid, because in its general scope and effect it was in conflict with title XVI of the Revised Statutes of the United States upon the subject of "The Militia." But the court held that, even if the first two sections of the Code, on which the objection rested, were invalid, they were easily separable from the rest which could be maintained. The objectionable sections related to the enrolment of the militia in the State generally, and the rest to the organization of eight thousand men as a "volunteer active militia." This evidently brought that case within the rule which controls the determination of this class of questions, that the constitutional part of a statute may be enforced and the unconstitutional part rejected, "where the parts are so distinctly separable that each can stand alone, and where the court is able to see and to declare that the intention of the Legislature was that the part pronounced valid should be enforcible, even though the other part should fail." Virginia Coupon Cases, [supra]. As was said in Allen v. Louisiana, 103 U. S. 84 [26: 319], "The point to be determined in all such cases is whether the unconstitutional provisions are so connected with the general scope of the law as to make it impossible, if these were stricken out, to give effect to what appears to have been the intent of the Legislature."

Applying this rule to the present case, it is clear that section 5519 cannot be sustained in whole or in part in its operation within a State, unless United States v. Harris is overruled, and [690] this we see no occasion for doing. That case was carefully considered at the time, and subsequent reflection has not changed our opinion as then expressed. For this reason we answer the second branch of the fourth question which has been certified in the negative. This disposes of all the other points included in the first six questions, and no further answer to them is necessary.

We come now to the questions certified which arise under section 5508. That this section is constitutional was decided in Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S. 651 [28: 274], and United States v. Waddell, 112 U. S. 76 [28: 673]. The real question to be determined, therefore, is whether what is charged to have been done by Baldwin constitutes an offense within the meaning of its provisions.

The section is found in title LXX, chapter 7, of the Revised Statutes embracing "Crimes against the Elective Franchise and Civil Rights of Citizens;" and it provides for the punishment of those "who conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having exercised the same;" and of those who go in companies of two or more "in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured." The person on whom the wrong to be punishable must be inflicted is described as a citizen. In the Constitution and laws of the United States the word "citizen" is generally, if not always, used in a political sense to designate one who has the rights and privileges of a citizen of a State or of the United States. It is so used in section 1 of article XIV of the Amendments of the Constitution, which provides that "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside;" and that "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." But it is also sometimes used in popular language to indicate the same thing as resident, inhabitant, or person. That it is not so used in section 5508 in the Revised Statutes is quite clear, if we revert to the original statute from which this section was taken. [691] That statute was the Act of May 31, 1870, chap. 114, 16 Stat. at L. 140, "To enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of this Union, and for other purposes." It is the statute which was under consideration as to some of its sections in United States v. Reese, supra, and from its title, as well as its text, it is apparent that the great purpose of Congress in its enactment was to enforce the political rights of citizens of the United States in the several States. Under these circumstances there cannot be a doubt that originally the word citizen was used in its political sense, and as the Revised Statutes are but a revision and consolidation of the statutes in force December 1, 1873, the presumption is that the word has the same meaning there that it had originally.

This particular section is a substantial reenactment of section 6 of the original Act, which is found among the sections that deal exclusively with the political rights of citizens, especially their right to vote, and were evidently intended to prevent discriminations in this particular against voters on account "of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." Sometimes, as in sections 3 and 4, the language is broader than this, and, therefore, as decided in United States v. Reese, those sections are inoperative; but still it is everywhere apparent that Congress had it in mind to legislate for citizens, as citizens, and not as mere persons, residents, or inhabitants.

This section is highly penal in its character, much more so than any others, for it not only provides as a punishment for the offense a fine of not more than $5,000 and an imprisonment of not more than ten years, but it declares that any person convicted shall "be thereafter ineligible to any office, or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States." It is therefore to be construed strictly; not so strictly as to defeat the legislative will, but doubtful words are not to be extended beyond their natural meaning in the connection in which they are used. Here the doubtful word is "citizen," and it is used in connection with the rights and privileges pertaining to a man as a citizen, and not as a [692] person only or an inhabitant. And, besides, the crime has been classified in the revision among those which relate to the elective franchise and the civil rights of citizens. For these reasons we are satisfied that the word citizen, as used in this statute, must be given the same meaning it has in the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution, and that to constitute the offense which is there provided for, the wrong must be done to one who is a citizen in that sense.

It is true that the word "citizen" only occurs in the first clause of the section, but in the second clause there is nothing to indicate that any other than a citizen was meant, and the section of the original statute from which this was taken has nothing from which any different inference can be drawn. That clearly deals with citizens alone, and the revision differs from it only in a re-arrangement of the original sentences and the exclusion of some superfluous words. Sections 5506 and 5507, which immediately precede this in the revision, clearly refer to political rights only, for they both relate to the privilege of voting, section 5506 being for the protection of citizens in terms, and section 5507 being for the protection of those to whom the right of suffrage is guaranteed by the Fifteenth Amendment of the Constitution. It may be that by this construction of the statute some are excluded from the protection it affords who are as much entitled to it as those who are included; but that is a defect, if it exists, which can be cured by Congress, but not by the courts.

We, therefore, answer the first subdivision of the seventh question certified in the negative. The second subdivision need not be answered otherwise than it has been elsewhere in this opinion.

It remains only to consider that part of the questions certified which relates to section 5336. That section provides for the punishment of those who conspire: 1, "to overthrow, put down, or destroy by force the Government of the United States, or to levy war against them, or to oppose by force the authority thereof;" or 2, "by force to prevent, hinder or delay the execution of any law of the United States;" or 3, "by force to seize, take, or possess any property of the United States contrary to the authority thereof." This is a re-enactment of similar provisions in the Act of July 31, 1861, chap. 33, 12 Stat. at L. 284, "To define and punish certain conspiracies," and in that of [693] April 20, 1871, chap. 22, § 2, 17 Stat. at L. 13, "To enforce the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes."

It cannot be claimed that Baldwin has been charged with a conspiracy to overthrow the government, or to levy war within the meaning of this section. Nor is he charged with any attempt to seize the property of the United States. All, therefore, depends on that part of the section which provides a punishment for "opposing" by force the authority of the United States, or for preventing, hindering, or delaying the "execution" of any law of the United States.

This evidently implies force against the government as a government. To constitute an offense under the first clause, the authority of the government must be opposed; that is to say, force must be brought to resist some positive assertion of authority by the government. A mere violation of law is not enough; there must be an attempt to prevent the actual exercise of authority. That is not pretended in this case. The force was exerted in opposition to a class of persons who had the right to look to the government for protection against such wrongs, not in opposition to the government while actually engaged in an attempt to afford that protection.

So, too, as to the second clause; the offense consists in preventing, hindering, or delaying the Government of the United States in the execution of its laws. This, as well as the other, means something more than setting the laws themselves at defiance. There must be a forcible resistance of the authority of the United States while endeavoring to carry the laws into execution. The United States are bound by their Treaty with China to exert their power to devise measures to secure the subjects of that government lawfully residing within the territory of the United States against ill treatment; and if in their efforts to carry the treaty into effect they had been forcibly opposed by persons who had conspired for that purpose, a state of things contemplated by the statute would have arisen. But that is not what Bald- [694] win has done. His conspiracy is for the ill treatment itself, and not for hindering or delaying the United States in the execution of their measures to prevent it. His force was exerted against the Chinese people, and not against the government in its effort to protect them. We are compelled, therefore, to answer the third subdivision of the seventh question in the negative, and that covers the fourth subdivision.

This disposes of the whole case, and, without answering the questions certified more in detail, we reverse the judgment of the Circuit Court, and remand the case for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

James H. McKenney, Clerk, Sup. Court, U. S.

Mr. Justice Field dissenting:

I agree with the majority of the court in its construction of the different sections of the Revised Statutes which have been under consideration in this case, except the third clause of section 5336, and the last clause of section 5508.

The third clause of section 5336 declares that if two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire "by force to prevent, hinder or delay the execution of any law of the United States," each of them shall be punished by a [702] fine of not less than $500 or more than $5,000, or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for a period of not less than six months or more than six years; or by both such fine and imprisonment.

By the Treaty with China, of 1868, the United States recognize the right of Chinese to emigrate to this country, and declare that in the United States the subjects of that empire shall enjoy the same privileges and immunities in respect to residence which are enjoyed by citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.

The complaint against the plaintiff in error is that he conspired with others to expel by force from the town of Nicolaus, and the County of Sutter, in the State of California, the subjects of the Emperor of China, who were residing and doing business there, and in furtherance of the conspiracy entered the homes of certain persons of that class, seized them, and forcibly placed them upon a barge on Feather River, on the bank of which the Town of Nicolaus is situated, and drove them from the county, and thus deprived them of privileges and immunities conferred by the treaty.

For this alleged offense the plaintiff in error, with others, was arrested. On application for a habeas corpus for his discharge, the judges of the circuit court were divided in opinion. This court holds that a conspiracy thus violently to expel the Chinese from the county and town where they resided and did business, and thus defeat the provisions of the Treaty, was not a conspiracy to prevent or hinder by force the execution of a law of the United States, although a treaty is declared by the Constitution to be the supreme law of the land.

Under the Constitution, a treaty between the United States and a foreign Nation is to be considered in two aspects—as a compact between the two Nations, and as a law of our country. As a compact, it depends for its enforcement on the good faith of the contracting parties, and to carry into effect some of its provisions may require legislation. For any infraction of its stipulations importing a contract, the courts can afford no redress except as provided by such legislation. The matter is one to be settled by negotiation between the [703] executive departments of the two governments, each government being at liberty to take such measures for redress as it may deem advisable. Foster v. Neilson, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 253, 314 [7: 415, 435]; Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580, 598 [28: 798, 803]; Taylor v. Morton, 2 Curtis (C. C.) 454, 459; Re Ah Lung, 9 Sawy. 306.

But in many instances a treaty operates by its own force, that is, without the aid of any legislative enactment; and such is generally the case when it declares the rights and privileges which the citizens or subjects of each Nation may enjoy in the country of the other. This was so with the clause in some of our early treaties with European Nations, declaring that their subjects might dispose of lands held by them in the United States, and that their heirs might inherit such property, or the proceeds thereof, notwithstanding their alienage. Thus the Treaty with Great Britain of 1794 provided that British subjects then holding lands in the United States, and American citizens holding lands in the dominions of Great Britain, should continue to hold them according to the nature and tenure of their respective estates and titles therein, and might grant, sell, or devise the same to whom they pleased, in like manner as if they were natives, and that neither they nor their heirs nor assigns should, as far as might respect the said lands, and the legal remedies incident thereto, be regarded as aliens. Art. 14. A clause to the same purport, and embracing also movable property, was in the Treaty with France in 1778, article 9, and also in that of 1800, article 7. It required no legislation to give force to this provision. It was the law of the land by virtue of the Constitution, and congressional legislation could not add to its efficacy. Whenever invoked by the alien heirs, the rights it conferred were enforced by the federal courts. Chirac v. Chirac, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 259 [4: 234]; Carneal v. Banks, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 181 [6: 297]; Hughes v. Edwards, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 489, 496 [6: 142, 144]. See also the Treaty with the Swiss Confederation of 1850, art. 5; Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483 [25: 628].

This is so also with clauses found in some treaties with foreign Nations, stipulating that the subjects or citizens of those Nations may trade with the United States, and for that purpose freely enter our ports with their ships and cargoes, and reside and do business here. [704] Thus the Treaty of Commerce with Italy, of February 26, 1871, provides that "Italian citizens in the United States, and citizens of the United States in Italy, shall mutually have liberty to enter, with their ships and cargoes, all the ports of the United States and of Italy respectively, which may be open to foreign commerce. They shall also have liberty to sojourn and reside in all parts whatever of said territories." Article 1. These stipulations operate by their own force; that is, they require no legislative action for their enforcement. Treaty of Commerce with Great Britain of 1815, art. 1; renewed and continued for ten years by art. 4 of the Treaty of 1818, and continued indefinitely by art. 1 of the Treaty of 1827; Treaty with Bolivia of May 13, 1858, art. 8; Treaty with Costa Rica of July 10, 1851, art. 2; Treaty with Greece of December, 1837, art. 1; Treaty with Sweden and Norway of July 4, 1827, art. 1.

The right or privilege being conferred by the treaty, parties seeking to enjoy it take whatever steps are necessary to carry the provisions into effect. Those who wish to engage in commerce enter our ports with their ships and cargoes; those who wish to reside here select their places of residence, no congressional legislation being required to provide that they shall enjoy the rights and privileges stipulated. All that they can ask, and all that is needed, is such legislation as may be necessary to protect them in such enjoyment. That they have, I think, to some extent, in the clause punishing any conspiracy to prevent or hinder by force the execution of a law of the United States. The section in which this clause appears is a re-enactment in part of the Act of July 31, 1861, and declares, among other things, a conspiracy of two or more persons to overthrow by force the Government of the United States, or to oppose by force its authority, or "by force to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States," or by force to seize and possess any of their property against their authority, to be a high crime, and prescribes for it severe punishment. As thus seen, the section is not in- [705] tended as a protection against isolated or occasional acts of individual personal violence. For such offenses the laws of the States make ample provision. It is intended to reach conspiracies against the supremacy and authority of the Government of the United States, and against the enforcement of its laws. It is directed not only against those who conspire to overthrow the government, but those also who conspire to defeat the execution of its laws, including under the latter treaties as well as statutes, and thus permanently deprive others of the rights, benefits and protection intended to be conferred by such laws. In the case before us, the purpose of the alleged conspirators was to permanently deprive the Chinese residing in Nicolaus—not any particular Chinese, but all of that class of persons—of the right of residence conferred by the Treaty. That right is not limited to any particular place; it may be exercised wherever it is lawful for anyone to reside without encroachment upon the equal right of others. The conspirators well knew, as everyone in California knows, the provision of the Treaty and its meaning; and their purpose was to nullify and defeat it.

A treaty, in conferring a right of residence, requires no congressional legislation for the enforcement of that right; the treaty in that particular is executed by the intended beneficiaries. They select their residence. They are not required, as said above, to reside in any particular place, or do business there. A conspiracy to prevent by force a residence in the town or county selected by them appears to me, therefore, to be a conspiracy to prevent the operation—that is, the execution—of a law of the United States, and to be within the letter and spirit of the third clause of section 5336. If the conspirators can expel the Chinese from their residence in the town and county of their selection without being amenable to any law of the United States, they can, with like exemption from legal liability, expel the Chinese from the entire State, and thus utterly defeat the stipulations of the Treaty.

So, also, a conspiracy to prevent by force ships belonging to subjects of a foreign Nation —not any particular ship, but ships generally belonging to them—from entering our ports with their cargoes would, in my judgment, be [706] a conspiracy to prevent by force the operation of the Treaty with that Nation, which stipulates that its subjects shall have that privilege. And in all other cases where a clause of a treaty conferring rights or privileges operates by its own terms and does not require congressional legislation to give it effect, a conspiracy to prevent by force their enjoyment is a conspiracy to prevent by force the execution of a law of the United States; that is, to prevent its having, with respect to the rights and privileges stipulated, any effectual operation. I do not see how Congress could improve the matter, or do more than it has already done, by declaring that those who thus conspire by force to deprive parties of the rights or privileges conferred by a treaty should be punished. Its declaration to that effect would be no more than what the present law provides.

The last clause of section 5508 declares that "If two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured [by the Constitution or laws of the United States], they shall be fined not more than five thousand dollars, and imprisoned not more than ten years; and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office or place of honor, profit or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States."

I do not agree with the majority of the court that this clause is limited in its application only to offenses against citizens. The first clause of the section is thus limited, but, in my judgment, the last is more extensive, and reaches an invasion of the premises of anyone, whether citizen or alien, by two or more persons for the unlawful purposes mentioned. But I am not clear that the qualification of going "in disguise" on the highway does not also extend to the going on the premises of another—and thus render the clause inapplicable to the case before the court; though there is much force in the view of Mr. Justice Harlan, that the clause should be read as though its words were: "If two or more persons go on the highway in disguise, or on the premises of another, with the intent," etc., thus making the words "in disguise" apply only to the offense on the highway. If his view be correct, the last provision of the clause would describe the exact offense charged against the plaintiff in error and [707] his co-conspirators—that they went on the premises of the Chinese with the intent to deprive them of rights and privileges conferred by the Treaty—the law of the land—an intent which they carried out by forcibly expelling the Chinese from the town and county of their residence and business. But without adopting or rejecting his view, I prefer to place my dissent upon what I deem the erroneous construction by the court of the third clause of section 5336, in holding that it does not cover this case, but applies only to cases where there has been a forcible resistance to measures adopted by Congress for the execution of a law, or a treaty of the United States.

The result of the decision is that there is no national law which can be invoked for the protection of the subjects of China, in their right to reside and do business in this country, notwithstanding the language of the Treaty with that Empire. And the same result must follow with reference to similar rights and privileges of the subjects or citizens resident in this country of any other Nation with which we have a treaty with like stipulations. Their only protection against any forcible resistance to the execution of these stipulations in their favor is to be found in the laws of the different States. Such a result is one to be deplored.

Mr. Justice Harlan, dissenting:

By the Treaty of 1880-1 with China, the Government of the United States agreed to exert all its power to devise measures for the protection, against ill treatment at the hands of other persons, of Chinese laborers or Chinese of any other class, permanently or temporarily residing, at that time, in this country, and to secure to them the same rights, privileges, immunities and exemptions to which the citizens or subjects of the most favored Nation are entitled, by treaty, to enjoy here. It would seem from the decision in this case, that if Chinamen, having a right, under the Treaty, to remain in our country, are forcibly driven from their places of business, the Government of the United States is without power in its own courts to protect them against such violence, or to punish those who, in this way subject them to ill treatment. If this be so, as to Chinamen lawfully in the United States, it must be equally true as to the citizens or subjects of every other foreign Nation, residing or doing business here under the sanction of treaties with their respective governments.

I do not think that such is the present state of the law, and must dissent from the opinion and judgment of the court.

It is conceded in the opinion of the court to be within the constitutional power of Congress [695] to provide—as by section 5508 of the Revised Statutes it has done—that "If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same; or if two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured, they shall be fined," etc. It is also conceded that, in the meaning of that section, a treaty between this Government and a foreign Nation is a "law" of the United States; and that the wrongs done by Baldwin and others to the subjects of the Emperor of China, named in the warrant, prevented the free exercise and enjoyment of rights and privileges secured to those aliens by the Treaty between the United States and China. I concur in these views, but am unable to assent to the proposition that the offense charged is not embraced by the foregoing section or by any other valid enactment of Congress.

My brethren hold that section 5508 describes only wrongs done to a "citizen;" in other words, that Congress did not intend, by that section, to protect the free exercise or enjoyment of rights secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States, except where citizens are concerned. This, it seems to me, is an interpretation of the statute which its language neither demands nor justifies. Observe that the subject with which Congress was dealing was the protection of "any right or privilege" secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States. There is, perhaps, plausible ground for holding that the first clause of section 5508 embraces only a conspiracy directed against a "citizen." But the succeeding clause describes two other and distinct offenses; namely, the going of two or more persons "in disguise on the highway," and the going of two or more persons "on the premises of another"—that is, upon the premises of another person—with intent, in either case, to prevent or hinder the free exercise or enjoyment by such person of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States. The use of the word "another," instead of "citizen," in the [696] latter clause, shows that, in respect of rights and privileges so secured, Congress had in mind the protection of persons, whether citizens or not. In this view, the statute is not unlike the Fourteenth Amendment, the first section of which recognizes as well rights appertaining to citizenship as rights belonging to persons. Baldwin, and others, according to the statements in the warrant, certainly did go "on the premises of another," with the intent to interfere with rights which the court concede are secured by treaty, and, therefore, by the supreme law of the land. Chew Heong v. U. S. 112 U. S. 540 [28: 771]; Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580 [28: 798]. In my judgment the case is within both the letter and spirit of the statute. It is, however, excepted by the court from its operation, by imputing to Congress the purpose of withholding national protection from those who do not happen to enjoy the privileges of American citizenship,—a purpose inconsistent with the obligations which the Nation has assumed by treaties with other countries. I cannot think it possible that Congress, while providing for the punishment of two or more persons, who go on the premises of a citizen, with intent to prevent his free exercise or enjoyment of rights secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States, purposely refrained from providing for the punishment of the same persons going on the premises of one, not a citizen, with intent to prevent the enjoyment by the latter of rights secured by the same Constitution and laws.

The rule of interpretation which the court lays down, if applied in other cases, will lead to strange results. We have statutes which give "to every person who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and is a citizen of the United States, or who has filed his declaration of intention to become such, as required by the naturalization laws," etc. (§§ 2289, 2290, 2291), the right, for purposes of a homestead, and under certain conditions, to enter unappropriated public lands. The party making the entry, or, if he be dead, his widow, etc., will be entitled ultimately to receive a patent, provided he resides upon and cultivates the land for a certain length of time, and provided, in the case of the [697] foreigner, he shall have become a citizen of the United States prior to his application for a patent. Now, suppose that an entry is made under the homestead statute, by a citizen, and a similar entry is made at the same time, in the same locality, by one who has only filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen. During the period of residence upon and cultivation of the lands both of the parties so making entries are, we will suppose, forcibly driven from the land by a lawless band of persons, with the intent to prevent them from perfecting their respective rights to a patent. In the case of the citizen thus wronged, we held in United States v. Waddell, 112 U. S. 76 [28: 673], that he may invoke the protection given by section 5508, and in that way have the wrong doers punished in a court of the United States as therein prescribed. But in the case of the person who has only declared his intention to become a citizen, the wrong doers cannot be reached by indictment in a court of the United States, because, under the decision in this case, that section only furnishes protection to citizens.

It is said—though I believe no such suggestion is made by the court—that the words "if two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another," apply only when the offenders are "in disguise." I cannot suppose that Congress intended to make a distinction between wrong doers going in disguise "on the premises of another," for the purpose of interfering with rights secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States, and wrong doers who openly and without masks enter upon the same premises with a like unlawful purpose. It intended, rather, to guard the homes of all persons against invasion by combinations of lawless men, who seek, by entering those homes, to prevent the free exercise of rights secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States. If the clause had read, "if two or more persons go on the highway in disguise, or on the premises of another," it would never occur to anyone that the words "on the premises of another" were qualified by the words "in disguise." The free exercise of personal rights secured by the United States should not be made to depend upon the trifling circumstance that the words "in disguise" precede, [698] rather than follow, the words "on the highway."

In my judgment the going of two or more persons, whether openly or in disguise, on the premises of another, whether the latter be a citizen or not, with intent to prevent his free exercise or enjoyment of a right secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States, was made by section 5508 an offense against the United States.

I feel obliged also to express my nonconcurrence in so much of the opinion of the court as holds that Congress is without power under the Constitution to make it—as by section 5519 of the Revised Statutes it is made—an offense against the United States for two or more persons, in any State, "to conspire, or go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, for the purpose of depriving, directly or indirectly, any person or class of persons of the equal protection of the laws, or of equal privileges or immunities under the laws; or for the purpose of preventing or hindering the constituted authorities of any State * * * from giving or securing to all persons within such State * * * the equal protection of the laws."

It is not necessary in this case to inquire what is the full scope of that clause of the Fourteenth Article of Amendment, which provides that "No State shall * * * deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." It is sufficient to say, that that provision does something more than describe the duty and limit the power of the States. Taken in connection with the fifth section, conferring upon Congress power to enforce the Amendment by appropriate legislation, that provision is equivalent to a declaration, in affirmative language, that every person within the jurisdiction of a State has a right to the equal protection of the laws; just as the prohibition in the Thirteenth Amendment, against the existence of slavery, operated not only to annul state laws upholding that institution, but to establish "universal civil and political freedom throughout the United States," and to invest every individual person within their jurisdiction with the right of freedom; Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 20 [27: 842]; and just as the prohibition in the Fifteenth Amendment, [699] against the denial or abridgment of the right of citizens of the United States to vote, on account of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude, operated to invest such citizens with "a new constitutional right," which "comes from the United States;" namely, "exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542 [23: 588]; U. S. v. Reese, 92 U. S. 214, [23: 563].

In the Civil Rights Cases, p. 23 [843] it was held that Congress, under its express power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of the Thirteenth Amendment, could, so far as necessary or proper, enact legislation, "direct and primary, operating upon the acts of individuals, whether sanctioned by state legislation or not," for the purpose of eradicating "all forms and incidents of slavery and involuntary servitude." And since, in the matter of voting, the exemption of citizens from discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude is a right which "comes from the United States," and is "granted or secured by the United States" (U. S. v. Cruikshank), can it be doubted that Congress, under its express power to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment, by appropriate legislation, could make it an offense against the United States for two or more persons to conspire to deny or abridge the citizen's right to vote, on account of his race or color? Is there any recognized exception to the general rule that Congress may, by appropriate legislation, secure and protect rights derived from or guaranteed by the Constitution or laws of the United States? Believing that these questions must be answered in the negative, I am unable to perceive any constitutional objection to section 5519; certainly, none of such a serious character as to justify this court in holding that Congress by enacting it, has transcended its powers. If the United States is powerless to secure the equal protection of the laws to persons within the jurisdiction of a State, until the State, by hostile legislation or by the action of her judicial authorities, shall have denied such protection, and can even then interfere only through the courts of the Union in suits involving either the validity of such state legislation, or the action of the [700] state authorities, it is difficult to understand why Congress was invested with power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment; for, without such power of legislation, the courts of the Union are competent to annul any state laws or reverse any action of state judicial officers which deny the equal protection of the laws to any particular person or class of persons. Indeed, since the organization of the government, there has existed a remedy in the courts of the Union for any denial in a state court of rights, privileges, or immunities derived from the United States. It seems to me that the main purpose of giving Congress power to enforce, by legislation, the provisions of the Amendment was, that the rights therein granted or guaranteed might be guarded and protected against lawless combinations of individuals, acting without the direct sanction of the State. The denial by the State of the equal protection of the laws to persons within its jurisdiction may arise as well from the failure or inability of the state authorities to give that protection, as from unfriendly enactments. If Congress, upon looking over the whole ground, determined that an effectual and appropriate mode to secure such protection was to proceed directly against combinations of individuals, who sought, by conspiracy or by violent means, to defeat the enjoyment of the right given by the Constitution, I do not see upon what ground the courts can question the validity of legislation to that end.

There is another view of this question which seems to be important. In United States v. Wad- dell [supra], and again in this case, the court has sustained the power of Congress to enact section 5508, which, among other things, makes it an offense against the United States for two or more persons to "go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another," with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States. Now, it is difficult to understand why, if Congress can do this, it may not make it an offense for the same persons (§ 5519) to "go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, 701] for the purpose of depriving, directly or indirectly, any person or class of persons of the equal protection of the laws." The only possible answer to this suggestion is to say that "the equal protection of the laws" is not a right or privilege secured by the Constitution of the United States. But that, it seems to me, cannot be said without doing violence to the language of that instrument, and defeating the intention with which the people adopted it.

It was long since announced by this court that "Congress must possess the choice of means, and must be empowered to use any means which are in fact conductive to the exercise of a power granted by the Constitution." U. S. v. Fisher, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 358 [2: 304]. And in McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 421 [4: 605], Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the court, said: "The sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people." In view of these settled doctrines of constitutional law, I am unwilling to say that it is not appropriate legislation for the enforcement of the right, given by the Constitution, to the equal protection of the laws, for Congress to make it an offense against the United States, punishable by fine and imprisonment for two or more persons in any State to conspire, or go in disguise on the highway, or go on the premises of another, for the purpose of depriving him of the equal protection of the laws.

v.
J. FRIEDLANDER, ET. AL., Exrs. of SAMUEL FRIEDLANDER, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 707-737.)

Landlord and tenant—nature of relation between, under Civil Code of Louisiana—distinction between civil and common law—annulment of lease—injuries by overflow through the opening of a crevasse in levee of Mississippi River—"fortuitous or unforeseen event"—review of authorities.

1. The general purpose and common rule of the civil law, as expressed in the Civil Code of Louisiana, are that the lessor shall secure to the lessee the possession, use and enjoyment of the thing leased, against everything but the fault of the lessee; and that any loss of the thing, or deprivation of its use and enjoyment, by accidents or fortuitous events, shall be borne by the lessor and not by the lessee.

2 The opening of a crevasse in the Louisiana levees by the waters of the Mississippi River, causing a plantation to be overflowed, must be considered as a "fortuitous or unforeseen event," within the meaning and scope of articles 2697 (2667) and 2699 (2669) of the Code, entitling the lessee, if thereby the plantation is wholly or partly destroyed, or is rendered unfit for the purpose for which it was leased, to have the lease annulled.

3. In the case presented, this court is of opinion that the lease being of a sugar plantation to be used to cultivate sugar cane, the injuries proved to the plantation, and to its capacity for producing cane and sugar, amounted to a partial destruction of the plantation, or, what is the same thing in legal effect, to making it cease to be fit for the purpose for which it was leased; that those injuries were caused by a fortuitous or unforeseen event; and that under articles 2697 (2667) and 2699 (2669) of the Civil Code, construed in the light of other articles, and of the principles of the civil law, as established in Louisiana, the plaintiff is entitled to have the lease annulled.

4. The ordinary rules of interpretation of statutes are applicable to the Louisiana Code.

5. In construing those parts of the Code which reenact provisions originally enacted in both the English and French languages, both texts may be taken into consideration; but if the two cannot be reconciled, the English must prevail.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Opinion below, 24 Fed. Rep. 320. Reversed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Gray: [708]

This was a petition, filed October 2, 1884, by a citizen of France against a citizen of Louisiana, to annul a lease of a sugar plantation from the defendant to the petitioner for five years; and alleging that by an extraordinary rise of the Mississippi River, which could not have been foreseen, and without any fault of the lessee, a crevasse was made in the levees of a neighboring plantation, the leased plantation overflowed, all the cane destroyed, and the plantation rendered wholly unfit for the purpose for which it had been leased; and that the petitioner requested the defendant, as soon as the water from the crevasse should have withdrawn, to put back the plantation in the same condition as when leased, and to replace the plant cane and stubble, and the defendant refused to do so. By direction of the circuit court, the case was transferred to the chancery side, and the petitioner filed a bill in equity, containing similar allegations, and praying for like relief.

The lease in question was dated October 27, 1883, and was of "a sugar plantation, situated [709] in the parish of St. Charles in this State, known as Friedlander's plantation," and "all the buildings, outhouses, fences, sugar houses, and other appurtenances thereof" (particularly described), from September 27, 1883, to December 15, 1888, at an annual rent of $5,000, which the lessee agreed to pay; and contained the following provisions:

"And the said lessor further declared that he does hereby give unto said lessee all of the growing cane crop of 1883 now standing in the field, which the said lessee expressly binds himself to plant as seed cane on said plantation; and to reimburse said lessor for said cane crop, said lessee binds himself to leave on said plantation for the sole use and benefit of said lessor, at the termination of this lease, December 15, 1888, eighty-five acres of full-standed seed cane (such as is usually called first year's stubble) which has been thoroughly cultivated, cut at the proper time for saving seed, and carefully windrowed, especially for seed; and in addition thereto, said lessee shall also leave on said plantation for said lessor not less than two hundred acres of stubble from what is called plant cane, which shall be properly protected in the ground."

"And said lessee binds himself to deliver said plantation at the expiration of this lease, with the ditches in a good draining condition, sufficiently so for the proper cultivation of as much land as may have been under cultivation by said lessee during his fourth year's occupancy of said plantation; and the foregoing clause means that said lessee shall not neglect nor allow the filling up of said ditches during the last year of this lease, any more than ditches usually fill up in one year on a well managed sugar plantation in good cultivation."

"And the said lessor further declared that he leaves with said lessee, to be used in the culture of sugar cane on said plantation, thirty-four mules," valued at $3,700, and implements of husbandry and sugar culture (particularly enumerated), valued at $500; all of which the lessee agrees to return in kind or value at the expiration of the lease.

The answer admitted the execution of the lease; and that in March, 1884, when the waters of the Mississippi River were at their [710] usual spring rise or flood, the levees along its banks near the leased property gave way, and inundated the country to some extent; and the demand and refusal to restore the plantation to its original condition and to replace the cane; but denied the other allegations of the bill.

After the filing of a general replication, the case was referred to a master, who reported the facts as follows:

"The lessee on entering upon the lease, according to the evidence, found the ditches in a bad condition, and no canal into which to drain the fields, except one on the lower side of the plantation In order to prepare the ground for cultivation of sugar cane, he decided that a more perfect system of drainage was necessary, and he caused a canal to be dug through the center of the plantation from the front to the swamp, and enlarged and deepened the ditches, securing thereby a better system of drainage."

"In March, 1884, a crevasse occurred upon what is known as the Davis plantation, the back waters from which crevasse overflowed a large portion of the Friedlander plantation, especially that portion used for cultivation, and it was under water for several months.

"The damage caused by this overflow I find from the evidence to be as follows: The lessee lost, by reason of said overflow, the entire crop of sugar cane of 1884; that is, the 200 acres of stubble cane and the 85 acres of plant cane were destroyed; the ditches were partially, and in some places entirely, filled; the canals, especially the one dug by the lessee, were partially filled, and the bridges generally swept away; the water remained over the land until July, 1884; a deposit was left over the land of from three inches to six inches. To cultivate the land as a sugar plantation the following year (1885) it would require ditches to be redug, the canals to be opened or cleaned out, the bridges replaced, and seed cane to be obtained and planted, all at considerable expense, to put the plantation in the condition it was at date of the crevasse."

The plaintiff admits the plantation would grow a crop of cane. But it would require a considerable sum of money and labor to put it in good condition for the growing of cane; that is, it would require seed cane, the canals and [711] ditches to be dug out, and bridges rebuilt. This work is an incident to the growing of a crop of sugar cane annually. Some years it may require more seed cane, more labor to put the canals and ditches in order than in others. The land therefore has not ceased to be fit for the purposes for which it was leased; on the contrary, some of the witnesses suggest that the deposit has enriched and greatly benefited the land.

The master, after discussing at length the law of the case, concluded and reported that the property leased was not destroyed, and had not ceased to be fit for the purpose for which it was leased; that the loss of the growing crop, the partial filling of the canals and ditches, and the washing away of the bridges, were not caused by an "unforeseen event;" that equity could give no relief to the plaintiff, and that his bill should be dismissed.

Exceptions taken by the plaintiff to the master's report, in regard both to his findings of fact and to his conclusions of law, were overruled by the circuit court, and a decree entered for the defendant, dismissing the bill. 24 Fed. Rep. 320.

The plaintiff appealed to this court, and filed the following assignment of errors:

"1. That when property leased has been rendered unfit for the purpose for which it was leased, by the act of God, the lease is dissolved.

"2. That the facts show that the plantation leased as a sugar plantation has been destroyed, and the lease is at an end.

"3. That sugar cane, which is in the form of plant and rattoon or stubbles, is a part and portion of the land, and when destroyed the destruction annuls the lease.

"4. That the draining ditches and canals, dug by the lessee in fulfillment of his obligation under his lease, become the property of the lessor, and when destroyed by a crevasse it becomes the duty of the lessor to put them back in the condition they were before the crevasse.

"5. That when a lessor is duly put in default to fulfill a part of his obligations as landlord, and refuses, the lease is dissolved."

Mr. Justice Gray, after stating the case as above reported, delivered the opinion of the court:

In considering this case, it is important to keep in mind that the view of the common law of England and of most of the United States, as to the nature of a lease for years, is not that which is taken by the civil law of Rome, Spain and France, upon which the Civil Code of Louisiana is based.

The common law and the civil law concur in holding that in the case of an executed sale a subsequent destruction of the property by any cause is the loss of the buyer. Res perit domino. They also concur in holding that performance of an executory obligation to convey a specific thing is excused by the accidental destruction of the thing, without the fault of the obligor, before the conveyance is made. Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826; Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514; Pothier, Obligations, nos. 657, 668; Contrat de Louage, no. 65; Civ. Code La. art. 2219 (2216).

But as to the nature and effect of a lease for years, at a certain rent which the lessee agrees to pay, and containing no express covenant on the part of the lessor, the two systems differ materially. The common law regards such a lease as the grant of an estate for years, which the lessee takes a title in, and is bound to pay the stipulated rent for, notwithstanding any injury by flood, fire or external violence, at least unless the injury is such a destruction of the land as to amount to an eviction; and by that law the lessor is under no implied covenant to repair, or even that the premises shall be fit for the purpose for which they are leased. Fowler v. Bott, 6 Mass. 63; 3 Kent, Com. 465, 466; Broom, Legal Maxims, 3d ed. 213, 214; Doupe v. Genin, 45 N. Y. 119; Kingsbury v. Westfall, 61 N.Y. 356. Naumberg v. Young, 15 Vroom, 331; Bowe v. Hunking, 135 Mass. 380; Manchester Warehouse Co. v. Carr, L. R. 5 C. P. D. 507.

[713] The civil law, on the other hand, regards a lease for years as a mere transfer of the use and enjoyment of the property; and holds the landlord bound, without any express covenant, to keep it in repair and otherwise fit for use and enjoyment for the purpose for which it is leased, even when the need of repair or the unfitness is caused by an inevitable accident; and if he does not do so, the tenant may have the lease annulled, or the rent abated. Dig. 19, 2, 9, 2; 19, 2, 15, 1, 2; 19, 2, 25, 2; 19, 2, 39; 2 Gomez, Variae Resolutiones, c. 3, §§ 1–3, 18, 19; Gregorio Lopez, in 5 Partidas, tit. 8, ll. 8, 22; Domat, Droit Civil, pt. 1, lib. 1, tit. 4, sec. 1, no. 1; sec. 3, nos. 1, 3, 6; Pothier, Contrat de Louage, nos. 3, 6, 11, 22, 53, 103, 106, 139–155.

It is accordingly laid down in the Pandects, on the authority of Julian, "If anyone has let an estate, that, even if anything happens by vis major, he must make it good, he must stand by his contract," si quis fundum locaverit, ut, etiamsi quid vi majore accidisset, hoc ei praestaretur, pacto standum esse; Dig. 19, 2, 9, 2; and on the authority of Ulpian, that "A lease does not change the ownership," non solet locatio dominium mutare; Dig. 19, 2, 39; and that the lessee has a right of action, if he cannot enjoy the thing which he has hired, si re quam conduxit frui non liceat, whether because his possession, either of the whole or of part of the field, is not made good, or a house, or stable or sheepfold, is not repaired; and the landlord ought to warrant the tenant, dominum colono praestare debere, against every irresistible force, omnim vim cui resisti non potest, such as floods, flocks of birds, or any like cause, or invasion of enemies; and if the whole crop should be destroyed by a heavy rainfall, or the olives should be spoiled by blight, or by extraordinary heat of the sun, solis fervore non assueto, it would be the loss of the landlord, damnum domini futurum; and so if the field falls in by an earthquake, for there must be made good to the tenant a field that he can enjoy, oportere enim agrum praestari conductori, ut frui possit; but if any loss arises from defects in the thing itself, si qua tamen vitia ex ipsa re oriantur, as if wine turns sour, [714] or standing corn is spoiled by worms or weeds, or if nothing extraordinary happens, si vero nihil extra consuetudinem acciderit, it is the loss of the tenant, damnum coloni esse. Dig. 19, 2; 15, 1, 2.

So Domat says: "If the tenant is expelled by the act of the sovereign, by vis major, or by some other accident, or if the property is destroyed by an inundation, by an earthquake, or other event, the lessor, who was bound to give the property, cannot demand the rent, and will be bound to restore so much of it as he has received, but without any other damages; for no one ought to answer for accidents." Droit Civil, pt. 1, lib. 1, tit. 4, sec. 3, no. 3.[1]

Pothier brings out the same principles more fully, as applicable to cases resembling the case at bar, saying: "When the thing leased, which the lessor offers to deliver to the lessee, is found not to be entire, the lessor having lost a part of it since the contract, or when it is not in the same condition in which it was at the time of the contract; when what is wanting in the thing, or when the change that has happened in the thing, is such that the lessee would not have been willing to hire this thing, if it had been such as it has since become; in that case, the lessee has the right to refuse to receive the thing, and to demand the annulment of the contract. This takes place, even if it is by a vis major occurring since the contract, that the thing is no longer entire, or is destroyed; as, for example, if, since the contract, lightning has burned a considerable part of the house that you have leased to me, and the rest is not sufficient for me to dwell in with my family; or, if a field, that you have leased to me, has been inundated by an overflow of a river, which has left a hurtful deposit that has spoiled the grass; but in this case I can only demand the annulment of the bargain, without being able to claim any damages for its nonexecution."[2] Contrat de Louage, no. 74.

Again; after laying down the general princi- [715] ples that "the tenant, lessee or farmer ought to have an abatement of the whole rent, when the lessor has not been able to procure him the enjoyment or the use of the thing leased;" and that "when the tenant has not been absolutely deprived of the enjoyment of the thing, but by an unforeseen accident his enjoyment has suffered a change and a very considerable diminu-

tion, he can demand a proportionate diminution in the rent, during the time that his enjoyment has suffered that diminution;" he says that, according to these principles, "when by vis major a farmer has been deprived of the power of gathering the fruits of one of the years of his lease; as if an enemy has ravaged all the standing corn on the land leased, or all the fruits yet ungathered have been destroyed by an overflow of a river, or by a swarm of locusts, or by any like accident: in all these cases, the farmer ought to have an abatement of the year's rent;" but that "the accident, which has caused a considerable loss of the fruits, must be an extraordinary accident, and not one of those ordinary and frequent accidents which a farmer ought to expect. For example, the tenant of a vineyard cannot demand an abatement of his rent for the loss caused by frost, blight or hail, unless it was an extraordinary frost or hail storm that caused the total loss of the fruits."[1] [716] Contrat de Louage, nos. 139–163. See also nos. 309, 477; Introduction aux Coutumes d'Orléans, tit. 19, nos. 17–22.

The Civil Code of Louisiana affirms the same general principles. A lease is defined to be a contract by which "one party gives to the other the enjoyment of a thing" at a fixed price. Art. 2669 (2689). "He who grants a lease is called the owner or lessor. He to whom the lease is made is called the lessee or tenant." Art. 2677 (2647). "The lessor is bound, from the very nature of the contract, and without any clause to that effect: 1. To deliver the thing leased to the lessee. 2. To maintain the thing in a condition such as to serve for the use for which it is hired. 3. To cause the lessee to be in peaceable possession of the thing during the continuance of the lease." Art. 2692 (2662). "The lessor is bound to deliver the thing in good condition and free from any repairs. He ought to make, during the continuance of the lease, all the repairs which may accidentally become necessary, except those which the tenant is bound to make, as hereafter directed." Art. 2693 (2663). "The lessor guarantees the lessee against all the vices and defects of the thing, which may prevent its being used," even if unknown to the lessor at the time of making the lease, or arising since, if they do not arise from the fault of the lessee; and to indemnify him for any loss resulting from them. Art. 2695 (2665). "The lessee is [717] bound: 1. To enjoy the thing leased as a good administrator, according to the use for which it was intended by the lease. 2. To pay the rent at the terms agreed on." Art. 2710 (2680). The repairs which the tenant is bound to make are mere petty repairs inside a house, and repairs of windows, including "replacing window glass, when broken accidentally, but not when broken, either in whole or in their greatest part, by a hail storm or by any other inevitable accident." Art. 2716 (2686). "The expenses of the repairs which unforeseen events or decay may render necessary must be supported by the lessor, though such repairs be of the nature of those which are usually done by the lessee." Art. 2717 (2687). "The lessee is only liable for the injuries and losses sustained through his own fault." Art. 2721 (2691). And the lease "is dissolved by the loss of the thing leased." Art. 2728 (2699).

The above articles of the Codes of 1825 and 1870, with only verbal differences, and in the same order, are all to be found in the Louisiana Code of 1808,[1] and all of them (except that which designates the parties, and the two last above quoted, which are but repetitions or corollaries of the others), in the Code Napoleon;[2] and the books, titles and chapters, under which the various matters are arranged in the Code of 1808, correspond for the most part to those of the Code Napoleon of 1807, or Code Civil des Français of 1804, and still more closely to those of the projet or commissioners' report of that Code, which had been published in 1801. 2 Discussions du Code Civil, 536, note. Chief Justice Martin states that in 1807, when the first Civil Code of Louisiana was reported to the territorial Legislature by Moreau Lislet and Brown, no copy of the French Code had as yet reached New Orleans; "and the gentlemen availed themselves of the project of that work, the arrangement of which they adopted, and mutatis mutandis literally transcribed a considerable portion of it." 2 Martin, Hist. La. 291. The provisions of the laws of Spain, as they formerly existed in Louisiana, upon the subject before us, were quite different in their details. [718]
Asso and Manuel's Institutes, lib. 2, tit. 14; 1 White, Land Laws, 201–204; 5 Partidas, tit. 8, ll. 1, 4–7, 18–24; Schmidt, Law of Spain and Mexico, 163–170. It is manifest, therefore, that the language of these provisions of the trouvée telle qu'elle est devenue depuis; en ce cas, le conducteur est bien fondé à refuser de recevoir la chose, et à demander la résolution du contrat. Cela a lieu, quand même ce serait par une force majeure survenue depuis le contrat, que la chose ne se trouverait plus entière, ou se trouverait détruite; comme, par exemple, si, depuis le contrat, le feu du ciel avait brûlé une partie considérable de la maison que vous m'aviez louée, et que ce qui en reste ne fût pas suffisant pour m'y loger avec ma famille; ou si une prairie, que vous m'aviez louée, avait été inondée par un débordement de rivière, lequel y a laissé un mauvais limon qui en a gâté l'herbe; mais, dans ce cas, je ne pourrais demander que la résolution du marché sans pouvoir prétendre aucuns dommages et intérêts pour son inexécution."

[1] "PREMIER PRINCIPE. Le conducteur, locataire ou fermier, doit avoir la remise du loyer pour le tout, lorsque le locateur n'a pu lui procurer la jouissance ou l'usage de la chose louée."

"SIXIEME PRINCIPE. Lorsque le conducteur n'a pas été privé absolument de la jouissance de la chose, mais que, par un accident imprévu, sa jouissance a souffert une altération et une diminution très considérable, il peut demander une diminution proportionnée dans le loyer, depuis le temps que sa jouissance a souffert cette diminution."

"153. Suivant les principes proposés au paragraphe premier, lorsqu'un fermier a été, par une force majeure, privé de pouvoir recueillir les fruits de quelqu'une des années de son bail; puta, si un parti ennemi a fourragé tout les blés encore en herbe de la terre qu'il tient à ferme, ou si tous les fruits, que étaient encore sur pied, ont péri par une inondation de rivière, par un essaim de sauterelles, ou par quelque accident semblable; en tous ces cas, le fermier doit avoir remise de l'année de ferme."

"163. Il faut que l'accident, qui a causé une perte considérable des fruits, soit un accident extraordinaire, et non pas de ces accidents ordinaires et fréquens auxquels un fermier doit s'attendre. Par exemple, le fermier d'une vigne ne doit pas demander une remise de sa ferme pour la perte qu'a causée la gelée, la coulure ou la grêle, à moins que ce ne fût une gelée ou une grêle extraordinaire qui eût causé la perte totale des fruits."

[2] Code Napoleon. arts. 1709, 1719–1721, 1728, 1754, 1755.

Louisiana Code was taken from the French Code.

The Codes of 1825 and 1870 also contain the following article:

"Art. 2697 (2667). If, during the lease, the thing be totally destroyed by an unforeseen event, or if it be taken for a purpose of public utility, the lease is at an end. If it be only destroyed in part, the lessee may either demand a diminution of the price, or a revocation of the lease. In neither case has he any claim for damages."[1]

This article was in a more condensed form in the Code of 1808, lib. 3, tit. 8, art. 20, namely: "If by any accident, the thing leased should be either totally or partly destroyed, the lessee may, according to the nature of the case, either claim a diminution of the rent or the cancelling of the lease, but he cannot claim to be indemnified."[2]

As it now stands, it has been restored to the very words of the corresponding article 1722 of the Code Napoleon, except in omitting the words "according to circumstances," suivant les circonstances, as affecting the claim of the lessee in the case of partial destruction, which were in that article, as well as in the Code of 1808; and in inserting the words "or if it be taken for a purpose of public utility," which were not expressed in the Code Napoleon, but would doubtless be implied, for a taking of property for the public use was always deemed a species of destruction by vis major. Pothier, [719] Contrat de Louage, no. 65; 3 Duvergier, Droit Civil, no. 332.

The following article, not to be found in so many words in the Code Napoleon, or in the Louisiana Code of 1808, first appears in the Code of 1825:

"Art. 2699 (2669). If, without any fault of the lessor, the thing cease to be fit for the purpose for which it was leased, or if the use be much impeded, as if a neighbor, by raising his walls, shall intercept the light of a house leased, the lessee may, according to circumstances, obtain the annulment of the lease, but has no claim for indemnity."[3]

But this article, too, only affirms a reasonable, if not necessary, construction of article 2697 (2667); for the lessor being held to warrant that the lessee shall enjoy the property for the use for which it was leased, any cause which makes his enjoyment impossible has the same effect as if it destroyed the property. This is clearly shown by Ulpian and by Pothier, in the various passages above referred to. So Troplong says that if the vis major lets the thing exist in whole and in all its parts, but prevents the lessee from taking or keeping the enjoyment, this case does not come exactly within the letter of article 1722 of the Code Napoleon; but the spirit should give life to the text, mais l'esprit doit venir vivifier le texte; and it is certain that this case of vis major would give an opening for an annulment of the lease or an abatement of the rent. Troplong, Droit Civil, no. 225. See also 6 Marcadé, 450; Bowditch v. Heation, 22 La. Ann. 356. From the earliest times, also, the building up by a neighbor so as to darken the lights of a house leased was held to entitle the tenant to relief. Dig. 19, 2, 25, 2; Domat, pt. 1, lib. 1. tit. 4, sec. 3, no. 6; Pothier, Contrat de Louage, no. 325.

Under articles 2697 (2667) and 2699 (2669) of the Louisana Code, as under article 1722 of the Code Napoleon, it is not, of course, every destruction of part of the thing leased, or injury to its fitness for the use for which it was [720] leased by an unforeseen event or cas fortuit, that entitles the lessee to have the lease annulled; and it is for the court to decide whether the destruction or the injury is grave enough. But if by such an event an important part of the property is destroyed, or the property is made unfit for its destined use, the lessee has the right to elect the annulment of the lease and is not obliged to be satisfied with an abatement of the rent. Troplong, nos. 202, 218; 30 Dalloz, Louage, nos. 200-202; 6 Marcadé, 448; 25 Laurent, Droit Civil, arts. 402-404.

The learned counsel for the defendant much relied on some dicta of Louisiana judges to the effect that the law of the State does not favor the abrogation of a lease when the loss or inconvenience is not caused by the fault of the lessor. Dusenau v. Generis, 6 La. Ann. 279; Denman v. Lopez, 12 La. Ann. 823; Foucher v. Choppin, 17 La. Ann. 321; Penn v. Kearny, 21 La. Ann. 21, 23. But such dicta cannot be understood as laying down a general rule, in opposition to the express words of articles 2697 (2667) and 2699 (2669) of the Civil Code. The circumstances of each of the cases in which they were uttered were quite different from those before us; in two of them the injury or inconvenience was comparatively unimportant; and in the other two the tenant had not surrendered the lease, but remained in possession. In a later case than any of these, which was one of partial destruction by fire of a building in a city, the court held that under article 2697 (2667) the lessee, although he might, if he pleased, have the rent abated, had a perfect right to elect to have the whole lease annulled. Higgins v. Wilner, 26 La. Ann. 544.

All the articles, already cited, except perhaps those regarding tenant's repairs, clearly apply to farms and plantations as well as to houses; for one of the first articles of the Louisiana Code on the subject of leases declares, "The letting out of things is of two kinds; to wit, 1. The letting out houses and movables. 2. The letting out predial or country estates." Art. 2676 (2646); Code of 1808, lib 3, tit. 8, art 4. And the corresponding articles in the Code Napoleon, excepting the introductory definitions, [721] are placed under the heading "Of the rules common to leases of houses and of rural property;"

[1] Also in French, in the Code of 1825: "Si, pendant la durée du bail, la chose louée est détruite en totalité par cas fortuit, ou est prise pour un objet d'utilité publique, le bail est résilié de plein droit. Si elle n'est détruite qu'en partie, le preneur a le choix de demander une diminution de prix, ou la résiliation du bail. Dans l'un et l'autre cas, il n'y a lieu à aucun dédommagement."

[2] And in French: "Si, pendant la durée du bail, la chose louée est détruite, en tout ou en partie, par cas fortuit, le preneur peut, suivant les circonstances, demander, ou une diminution du prix, ou la résiliation du bail; mais sans aucun autre dédommagement."

[3] And in French, in the Code of 1825: "Si la chose cesse, sans le fait du bailleur, d'être propre à l'usage pour lequel elle était louée, ou si l'usage en est devenu très incommode, comme si un voisin, en élevant ses murs, intercepte les jours de la maison louée, le preneur peut, suivant le cas, obtenir la résiliation du bail; mais il ne lui est dû aucune indemnité."

those as to tenant's repairs being placed under the heading "Of the rules peculiar to leases for hire," that is to say, of houses and furniture.

The Louisiana Code of 1808, lib. 3, tit. 8, art. 54, as well as each of the subsequent Codes, contains the following article relating to rural or predial estates only:

"Art. 2743 (2714). The tenant of a predial estate cannot claim an abatement of the rent under the plea that, during the lease, either the whole or a part of his crop has been destroyed by accidents unless those accidents be of such an extraordinary nature that they could not have been foreseen by either of the parties at the time the contract was made, such as the ravages of war extending over a country then at peace, and where no person entertained any apprehension of being exposed to invasion, or the like.

"But even in these cases, the loss suffered must have been equal to the value of one half of the crop at least, to entitle the tenant to an abatement of the rent.

"The tenant has no right to an abatement, if it is stipulated in the contract that the tenant shall run all the chances of all foreseen and unforeseen accidents."[1]

To this the following article was added in the Code of 1825:

"Art. 2744 (2715). The tenant cannot obtain an abatement, when the loss of the fruit takes place after its separation from the earth, unless the lease give to the proprietor a portion of the [722] crop in kind; in which case the proprietor ought to bear his share of the loss; provided the tenant has committed no unreasonable delay in delivering his portion of the crop."[2]

These articles take the place of several articles contained in the Code Napoleon, under the heading "Of the rules peculiar to leases of rural property," of which the following is a translation:[3]

"1769. If the lease is made for several years, and if, during the continuance of the lease, the whole or at least the half of the crop is destroyed by accidents, the tenant may demand an abatement of the rent, unless he is indemnified by the preceding harvests. If he is not indemnified, the estimate of the abatement can only take place at the end of the lease, at which time an account is taken of all the years of enjoyment; and nevertheless the judge may provisionally relieve the tenant from paying a part of the rent, by reason of the loss suffered.

"1770. If the lease is only for one year, and the loss is of the whole of the fruits, or at least [723] of the half, the tenant shall be discharged from a proportional part of the rent. He cannot claim any abatement, if the loss is less than half.

"1771. The tenant cannot obtain an abatement, when the loss of the fruits takes place after they are severed from the land, unless the lease gives to the landlord a portion of the crop in kind; in which case the landlord ought to bear his part of the loss, provided the tenant has not been guilty of unreasonable delay in delivering to him his portion of crop. Likewise, the tenant cannot demand an abatement, when the cause of the damage was in existence and known at the time when the lease was made.

"1772. The tenant may be charged with accidents by an express stipulation.

"1773. That stipulation is understood of ordinary accidents only, such as hail, lightning, frost or blight. It is not understood of extraordinary accidents, such as the ravages of war, or an inundation, to which the country is not ordinarily subject, unless the lessee has been charged with all accidents, foreseen or not foreseen."

The last clause of article 2743 (2714) of the Louisiana Code was evidently taken from articles 1772 and 1773 of the Code Napoleon. The rest of the article was apparently derived from the view expressed by Pothier in his Contrat de Louage, no. 163, above quoted, which, as has been pointed out by the commentators on the Code Napoleon, was rejected by the framers of the Code. Troplong, no. 710; 4 Duvergier, no. 183; 9 Duranton, 261. And article 2744 (2715) is copied word for word from so much of article 1771 of the Code Napoleon.

The decision of the present case mainly depends upon the true construction of articles
[724] 2697 (2667) and 2699 (2669) taken in connection

[1] And in French, in the Codes of 1808 and 1825:
"Le fermier d'un bien rural ou de campagne ne peut obtenir aucune remise sur le prix du bail sous prétexte que, pendant la durée de son bail, la totalité, ou partie de sa récolte, lui aurait été enlevée par des cas fortuits, si ce n'est que ces cas fortuits fussent d'une nature extraordinaire, et dont l'événement n'a pu raisonablement être prévu, ou supposé par les parties, lors du contrat, tels que les ravages de la guerre au milieu d'un pays qui était en paix, et où l'on devait se croire naturellement à la bri de tout invasion, et autres cas semblables.
"Encore, pour obtenir cette remise, faut il que la perte éprouvé soit au moins de la moitié de la récolte, et que le preneur ne soit pas chargé par le bail de tous les cas prévus ou imprévus."

[2] And in French: "Le fermier ne peut obtenir de remise, lorsque la perte des fruits arrive après qu'ils sont séparés de la terre, à moins que le bail ne donne au propriétaire une quotité de la récolte en nature; auquel cas le propriétaire doit supporter sa part de la perte, pourvu que le preneur ne fût pas en demeure de lui délivrer sa portion de récolte."

[3] The original text is as follows:
"1769. Si le bail est fait pour plusieurs années, et que, pendant la durée du bail, la totalité ou la moitié d'une récolte au moins soit enlevée par des cas fortuits, le fermier peut demander une remise du prix de sa location, à moins qu'il ne soit indemnisé par les récoltes précédentes. S'il n'est pas indemnisé, l'estimation de la remise ne peut avoir lieu qu'à la fin du bail, auquel tempe il se fait une compensation de toutes les années de jouissance; et cependant le juge peut provisoirement dispenser le preneur de payer une partie du prix, en raison de la perte soufferte.
"1770. Si le bail n'est que d'une année, et que la perte soit de la totalité des fruits, ou au moins de la moitié, le preneur sera déchargé d'une partie proportionnelle du prix de la location. Il ne pourra prétendre aucune remise, si la perte est moindre de moitié.
"1771. La fermier ne peut obtenir de remise, lorsque la perte des fruits arrive aprés qu'ils sont séparés de la terre, à moins que le bail ne donne au propriétaire une quotité de la récolte en nature; auquel cas le propriétaire doit supporter sa part de la perte, pourvu que le preneur ne fût pas en demeure de lui délivrer sa portion de récolte. Le fermier ne peut également demander une remise, lorsque la cause du dommage était existante et connue à l'époque où le bail a été passé.
"1772. Le preneur peut être chargé des cas fortuits par une stipulation expresse.
"1773. Cette stipulation ne s'entend que des cas fortuits ordinaries, tels que grêle, feu du ciel, gelée ou coulure. Elle ne s'entend pas des cas fortuits extraordinaires, tels que les ravages de la guerre, ou une inondation, auxquels le pays n'est pas ordinairement sujet, à moins que le preneur n'ait été chargé de tous les cas fortuits, prévus ou imprévus."

with article 2743 (2714) of the Civil Code of Louisiana. But before proceeding to the particular examination of these articles, some other general considerations should be adverted to.

The ordinary rules of interpretation of statutes are applicable to the Louisiana Code.

The Code itself lays down as rules for "the application and construction of laws," that "Where the words of a law are dubious, their meaning may be sought by examining the context, with which the ambiguous words, phrases and sentences may be compared, in order to ascertain their true meaning;" that "laws in pari materia, or upon the same subject matter, must be construed with a reference to each other; what is clear in one statute may be called in aid to explain what is doubtful in another;" and that "the most universal and effectual way of discovering the true meaning of a law, when its expressions are dubious, is by considering the reason and spirit of it, or the cause which induced the Legislature to enact it." Arts. 16–18 (16–18); Code of 1808, prel. tit. arts. 16–18.

In the same spirit Chief Justice Eustis said: "A statute must be construed with reference to its object, to the legislation and system of which it forms a part, in order to ascertain its true meaning and intent; and if its purpose and well ascertained object are inconsistent with the precise words of a part, the latter must yield to the paramount and controlling influence of the will of the Legislature resulting from the whole." Commercial Bank v. Foster, 5 La. Ann. 516, 517. And in Childers v. Johnson, 6 La. Ann. 634, 638, the court said: "It is a sound rule of interpretation, in construing an article of the Code with reference to a subject matter, to take into view the general system of legislation upon the subject matter contained in the same work; and where a provision of the Code is invoked in derogation of the common rule regulating the subject matter, the intention so to derogate should be clear and beyond reasonable doubt. If an interpretation can be given to the particular article, which, without doing violence to its terms, will make it harmonize with the general rules and the other provisions of the Code regulating the subject matter, such interpretation should be adopted."

[725] It is to be remembered that the Louisiana Code, as it was originally enacted in 1808, and as it was again promulgated in 1825, and remained in force until 1870, was in French as well as in English. The Code of 1808, enacted before the admission of the State of Louisiana into the Union, was entitled "A Digest of the Civil Laws now in force in the Territory of Orleans, with alterations and amendments adapted to its present system of government;" and the Act of March 31, 1808, chap. 29, declaring and proclaiming it to be in force in that territory, was published in both languages, and provided that "If, in any of the dispositions contained in the said digest, there should be found any obscurity or ambiguity, fault or omission, both the English and French texts shall be consulted, and shall mutually serve to the interpretation of [the] one and the other."[1] 2 Mart. Dig. 98, 99.

The Constitution of the State of Louisiana, ever since its admission into the Union, has provided that all laws should be promulgated in the language in which the Constitution of the United States is written. Constitutions of 1812, art. 6, § 15; 1845, art. 108; 1852, art. 100; 1864, art. 103; 1868, art. 103. The Constitutions of 1845 and 1852 also contained provisions that "The secretary of the senate and clerk of the House of Representatives shall be conversant with the French and English languages, and members may address either House in the French or English language;" that "The Constitution and laws of this State shall be promulgated in the English and French languages;" and that any amendment of the Constitution, proposed by the Legislature, should be published in French and English, before being submitted to the vote of the people. Const. 1845, arts. 104, 132, 140; 1852, arts. 101, 129, 141. These provisions were omitted in the Constitutions of 1864 and 1868; and the Code of 1870 was promulgated in English only.

But it is a familiar canon of interpretation, that all former statutes on the same subject, [726] whether repealed or unrepealed, may be considered in construing the provisions that remain in force. Bank for Savings v. Collector, 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 495 [18: 207]; Ex parte Crow Dog, 109 U. S. 556, 561 [27: 1030, 1032]. The reasons are no less strong for referring to former statutes, embodied in a code of laws, to aid in the interpretation of that Code. Bank of La. v. Farrar, 1 La. Ann. 49, 54; U. S. v. Bowen, 100 U. S. 508, 513 [25: 631, 632]; Myer v. Car Co. 102 U. S. 1, 11 [26: 59, 60]; Northern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642 [29: 755]; Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U. S. 678 [ante, 766]. And the Supreme Court of Louisiana has always held that in construing those parts of the Code which re-enact provisions originally enacted in both languages, both texts may be taken into consideration to aid in ascertaining their meaning as parts of one law; and obscurities or ambiguities in the English text have often been cleared up by referring to the greater precision of the French text; although, if the two texts cannot be reconciled, the English must prevail. Hudson v. Grieve, 1 Mart. (La.), 143; State v. Dupuy, 2 Mart. (La.) 177; Breedlove v. Turner, 9 Mart. (La.) 353; Chretien v. Theard, 2 Mart. N. S. 582; Borel v. Borel, 3 La. 30; Durnford v. Clark, 3 La. 199, 202; State v. Moore, 8 Rob. (La.) 518; State v. Mix, 8 Rob. (La.) 549; State v. Ellis, 12 La. Ann. 390; State v. Judge of Eighth District Court, 22 La. Ann. 581; Lafourche v. Terrebonne, 34 La. Ann. 1230, 1233.

This accords with the judgment of this court in a case arising under the Treaty of 1819, by which Spain ceded Florida to the United States, which was drawn up in Spanish as well as in English; the English part declaring that grants of lands previously made by the King of Spain "shall be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession;" and the corresponding clause of the Spanish part declaring that such grants "shall remain ratified and confirmed" to the persons in possession. 8 Stat. at L. 258, 259. Chief Justice Marshall said: "The Treaty was drawn up in the Spanish as well as in the English language. Both are originals, and were unquestionably intended by the parties to be identical." "If the English and the Spanish parts can, without violence, be made to agree, that construction which establishes this conformity ought to prevail. If, as we [727] think must be admitted, the security of private property was intended by the parties; if this security would have been complete without the article, the United States could have no motive for insisting on the interposition of the government in order to give validity to the titles which, according to the usages of the civilized world, were already valid. No violence is done to the language of the Treaty by a construction which conforms the English and Spanish to each other. Although the words 'shall be ratified and confirmed' are properly the words of contract, stipulating for some future legislative Act, they are not necessarily so. They may import that they 'shall be ratified and confirmed' by the force of the instrument itself. When we observe that in the counterpart of the same treaty, executed at the same time by the same parties, they are used in this sense, we think the construction proper, if not unavoidable." U. S. v. Percheman, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 51, 88, 89 [8: 604, 618].

Upon a comparison of the English text with the French, of so much of the Louisiana Code as bears upon this case, the greater uniformity and precision of the French text, and its striking resemblance to the Code Napoleon, make it quite clear that the French is the original and the English the translation. Moreover, in the concluding article 3556 (3522) of verbal definitions, the French words in the Code of 1825 are arranged alphabetically, with the English equivalent opposite each one, regardless of its own alphabetical order. In the French column, "Cas fortuits" are defined as "Événemens occasionés par une force à laquelle on ne peut pas résister," or events caused by a force that one cannot resist; opposite to which in the English column is, "Fortuitous event is that which happens by a cause which we cannot resist." But on turning back to the other articles, we find the French "cas fortuit" rendered in English in various ways; as "unforeseen event,"[1] as "unforeseen accident,"[2] as "fortuitous event,"[3] as "fortuitous accident,"[4] as "accident,"[5] and as "chance."[6] In one place, "cas fortuit ou force majeure" is rendered "fortuitous event or irresistible force,"[7] and [728] in another, "accidental and uncontrollable events;"[8] thus treating the two alternative expressions as synonymous. In the concluding article, also, "Force" is defined, both in French and in English, as "the effect of a power which cannot be resisted;" and "Force majeure," vis major, as "un fait un accident que la prudence humaine ne peut ni prévoir ni empêcher," or a fact or accident which human prudence can neither foresee nor prevent—with a corresponding definition of the English equivalent, "Superior force." "Force majeure" is also rendered in different places "unforeseen events,"[9] "overpowering force,"[10] and "force,"[11] only; "événement de force majeure" as "accident;"[12] and "accidens de force majeure" as "inevitable accident."[13] It cannot be doubted, therefore, that the words "unforeseen event" and "accident," as used in the articles now under consideration, have the meaning of "fortuitous event" or "irresistible force."

The Louisiana Code, following the French law and the Code Napoleon, recognizes two kinds or degrees of what, under various but equivalent names, has been called vis major, cas fortuit, irresistible force, inevitable accident, or unforeseen event; the one, ordinary, which might have been foreseen by any man of common prudence as not unlikely to happen at some time; the other, extraordinary, which could not have been foreseen, or expected to occur at any time. The distinction is clearly stated by Domat, and more fully brought out by the commentators on the Code Napoleon; and, as those commentators have clearly shown, the words, "prévus ou imprévus," as used in speaking of express stipulations by the tenant, literally, "foreseen or unforeseen," respectively mean in this connection those which could have been foreseen as likely to happen, and those which could not have been so foreseen. Domat, pt. 1, lib. 1, tit. 4, sec. 4, no. 6; Troplong, nos. 204, 211, 756; 4 Duvergier, no. 182; 6 Marcadé, 508. The concurrent opinions of the French jurists upon the meaning of the French Code are of the greatest weight in the interpretation of similar provisions in the Code of Louisiana. [729] Johnson v. Bloodworth, 12 La. Ann. 699, 701.

The general purpose and the common rule of the civil law, as expressed in the Code of Louisiana, are that the lessor shall secure to the lessee the possession, use and enjoyment of the thing leased, against everything but the fault of the latter; and that any loss of the thing, or deprivation of its use or enjoyment, by accidents or fortuitous events, shall be borne by the lessor and not by the lessee. This appears from the general provisions in the articles above quoted, by which the lessor is bound, from the very nature of the contract of lease, and without any clause to that effect, not only to deliver the thing leased to the lessee, but also to maintain it in such a condition as to serve the purpose for which it is leased, to cause the lessee to be in peaceable possession of the thing during the continuance of the lease, to make, during its continuance, all repairs, except some petty internal ones, and to make even those when rendered necessary by unforeseen events; as well as by articles 2697 (2667) and 2699 (2669), which apply both to country estates and to town houses, and entitle the lessee, whenever by a fortuitous event, and without his fault, the thing is either destroyed, or ceases to be fit for the purpose for which it has been leased, or its use is much impeded, to demand the annulment of the lease, and if it is only destroyed in part, to demand either a revocation of the lease or a diminution of the rent.

Article 2743 (2714) is in derogation of this general purpose and common rule, and is therefore to be strictly construed.

A comparison of the language of articles 2697 (2667) and 2699 (2669) with that of article 2743 (2714) discloses substantial differences between the former and the latter, in the cause of injury, in the thing injured, and in the form of relief, of which they speak. It will be convenient to consider these three points of difference in the inverse order.

[2] Art. (2756).
[3] Arts. (2290) (2445) (2511).
[4] Art. (2216).
[5] Arts. (2714) (563).
[6] Arts. (871) (2870) (2871) (2872).
[7] Art. (1927).
[8] Art. (2725).
[9] Art. (2667).
[10] Art. (2910).
[11] Art. (2917).
[13] Art. (2666).

First. As to the form of relief: Articles 2697 (2667) and 2699 (2669) deal wholly with the ending, revocation or annulment of the lease, except that in the case of a partial destruction of the thing leased the alternative of a [730] diminution of rent is permitted. But article 2743 (2714) relates to the abatement of rent only, and does not affect the right of the lessee to have the lease annulled.

The case of a tenant demanding an abatement of rent, while retaining his lease, and thereby reserving the opportunity of reaping profits during the rest of the term, stands on quite different ground from the case of a tenant seeking to annul the lease, and thus to give up all prospective benefits at the same time that he is relieved from all burdens.

Second. The injuries spoken of in articles 2697 (2667) and 2699 (2669) are the total or partial destruction of the thing leased, or its ceasing to be fit for the purpose for which it was leased. But article 2743 (2714) is limited to a destruction of the crop only.

There is no doubt that by the civil law, as by the common law, crops so long as they are standing and ungathered are part of the land to which they are attached. Louisiana Code, art. 465 (456); Code of 1808, lib. 2, tit. 1, art. 17; Code Napoleon, art. 520; Pothier, de la Commanauté, no. 45. In strictness of principle, the title of the standing crops, as of the land on which they stand, would be in the landlord, and a destruction of the crops might have been considered as a partial destruction of the land itself, within article 2697 (2667) of the Louisiana Code, and article 1722 of the Code Napoleon, if no special provision as to the crops had been added; and such was the opinion of Troplong. Troplong, nos. 695-697. On the other hand, it might be considered that as the lessor only warranted to the tenant the enjoyment of the thing leased, that is to say, the possibility of enjoying it, and did not warrant to him the fruits of the enjoyment, a destruction of the crops only, not injuring the capacity of the land to produce other crops, ought not to be considered as a destruction or injury of the thing leased. 25 Laurent, no. 455. The framers of either Code have solved the difficulty by making special provisions with relation to the loss of a crop by fortuitous events, without otherwise modifying the previous articles which establish the rules applicable to a destruction, by such events, of the property itself, or of its capacity for the use [731] for which it was leased. One of the principal commentators on the Code Napoleon, after stating the well established construction, above mentioned, that a general stipulation by the tenant against accidents is to be understood of ordinary, and not of extraordinary accidents, says that for the same reason the tenant assumes the risk, either of ordinary accidents, or of all accidents whatsoever even if extraordinary, he must be understood (unless a different intention is clearly manifested) to stipulate against accidents causing a loss of the crops only, and not against those which deprive him of the use and enjoyment of the property itself. 6 Marcadé, 508.

Third. The contingencies guarded against in articles 2697 (2667) and 2699 (2669) include any unforeseen event (meaning thereby, as we have seen, any fortuitous event or irresistible force), whether ordinary or extraordinary, one that might have been foreseen, as well as one that could not have been foreseen. But in article 2743 (2714) the only accidents relieved against are those "of such an extraordinary nature that they could not have been foreseen by either of the parties at the time the contract was made."

Under this article, the Supreme Court of Louisiana in 1861 refused to allow to the tenant of a predial estate an abatement of the stipulated rent, on account of the destruction of his crop by an overflow of the Mississippi River, and gave the following reasons for the decision: "The overflow of the Mississippi River is of such frequent occurrence that it cannot be regarded as belonging to that class of extraordinary and unforeseen accidents which entitle the tenant of a predial estate to an abatement of rent. Indeed, the overflows of this river are so frequent that a system of levees has been constructed under the authority of the State, for the purpose of preventing, we may say, the annual inundation of its banks; and so frequently have the waters of this river made breaches in the levees, that even a crevasse itself cannot be considered as an extraordinary accident in the sense of article 2714 of the Code, and as such entitle the tenant of a predial estate to a reduction of the stipulated rent, although such crevasse should be the means of overflowing the land leased by the tenant, and thereby destroying a part or the whole of his crop. The periodical overflow of the waters of a river is not an extraordinary accident; and if a party seeks to give to an inundation that character, he must show that it was unusual, unforeseen, and one to which the country was not ordinarily subjected. See Troplong, du Louage, nos. 207, 211. The frequency of overflows and crevasses on the Mississippi River is not disputed in this case, but is, on the other hand, sufficiently established by the evidence." Vinson v. Graves, 16 La. Ann. 162. That decision has since been followed, without further discussion. Masson v. Murray, 21 La. Ann. 535; Jackson v. Michie, 33 La. Ann. 728. [732]

But the utmost extent of those decisions is that neither an overflow of the Mississippi River, nor even a crevasse, is an "extraordinary and unforeseen accident," for a destruction of a crop caused by which the tenant can have an abatement of rent under article 2743 (2714). That the court did not intend to imply that such an overflow or crevasse was not an unforeseen accident at all clearly appears by the carefully guarded language of the opinion in Vinson v. Graves, as well as by the reference in that opinion to the passages of Troplong in which the violence of a river leaving its bed is classed, with earthquakes and extraordinary snows or rains, as a cas fortuit, and is distinguished from the usual rains and snows, and risings of rivers, which necessarily occur in the order of the seasons; and the view of earlier jurists is approved, which divides accidents into accustomed and unaccustomed, ordinary and extraordinary. Troplong, nos. 206, 207, 211. The civilians generally class an inundation under vis major or cas fortuit. Ulpian and Domat, ubi supra; 5 Partidas, tit. 8, l. 22; 4 Duvergier, no. 183; 9 Duranton, 261. And Pothier, in a passage already quoted, states the case of the overflow of a field by a river, leaving a deposit that spoils the grass, as one of those in which the tenant is entitled to have the lease annulled. Contrat de Louage, no. 74.

The annual rise and overflow of a river may doubtless in some countries and places be considered as one of the things that necessarily occur in the order of the seasons. But the [733] bursting of a river through its natural banks or through artificial dikes must generally be regarded as an accident or cas fortuit, ordinary or extraordinary, according to the frequency or infrequency with which it takes place in the tract of country in question. In France, "an inundation, to which the country is not ordinarily subject," is expressly ranged, in article 1778 of the Code Napoleon, before quoted, with the ravages of war, under extraordinary accidents, cas fortuits extraordinaires. In Louisiana, the breaking of the Mississippi through the levées occurs so often that it is held not to be an extraordinary accident; but that does not take it out of the general class of accidents or unforeseen events, cas fortuits.

The breaking of a crevasse in the Louisiana levees by the waters of the Mississippi River, causing a plantation to be overflowed, must therefore be considered as a cas fortuit, a fortuitous or unforeseen event, within the meaning and scope of articles 2697 (2667) and 2699 (2669), entitling the lessee, if thereby the plantation is wholly or partly destroyed, or is rendered unfit for the purpose for which it was leased, to have the lease annulled; although it is not a cas fortuit extraordinaire, an extraordinary as well as an unforeseen accident, within the meaning of article 2743 (2714), so as to justify an abatement of rent if the crop only is destroyed.

In the case at bar, the thing leased is a sugar plantation, with the buildings, mules and implements necessary for the cultivation and making of sugar, and the growing crop of sugar cane. This crop is not sold to the lessee absolutely, with the right to use and consume it as he pleases; but it is leased to him as part of the plantation, and to be replanted on the plantation as seed cane; and he expressly binds himself to do this, as well as, by way of reimbursing the lessor for this cane, to leave a certain amount of growing cane on the plantation at the end of the lease. These stipulations as to the growing cane leased with the plantation, and the growing cane to be left on the plantation at the end of the lease, do not constitute a separate contract of exchange of one thing for another, under article 2660 (2630) of the Louisiana Code; or a letting of movables, or of things which cannot be used without be-[734] ing destroyed by the use, within the meaning of article 2678 (2648); or a payment of rent in a portion of the crop, under article 2671 (2641). But they are parts and incidents of the principal contract of lease into which the parties have entered; and that contract is the lease of one entire thing, a sugar plantation, with growing cane upon it, and otherwise fit for the cultivation of sugar, to be used and enjoyed as such by the lessee until the end of the lease, and then to be returned by him to the lessor in like condition, barring such accidents as may excuse the lessee from the performance of the contract on his part.

The material facts regarding the cultivation of sugar cane, as appearing by the evidence returned with the master's report, are these: Sugar cane is propagated by cutting standing cane and planting it as seed cane. The cane so cut from one acre will plant not more than three acres. The plants that spring up from the seed cane are called plant cane; the roots from which cane has been cut are called stubble; and the shoots which spring up in the following years from those roots are called ratoons (rejetons), and are cut for sugar in the two years succeeding the first cutting, after which it is usual to plant the ground anew.

It also appears that the plaintiff at once performed the obligation, expressly assumed by him in the lease, of cutting the standing cane leased to him with the plantation, and planting it as seed cane; and that, when this cane was a little above the ground, the inundation took place, the facts concerning which, as stated in the master's report, were as follows:

The lessee, upon entering into possession under the lease, in the autumn of 1883, found the plantation in bad condition for want of proper drainage, and, in order to prepare the ground for the cultivation of sugar, dug a new canal and enlarged and deepened the ditches. Early in the spring of 1884, the Mississippi River made a crevasse in the levees opposite a neighboring plantation, and the waters coming through the crevasse overflowed the plantation leased. By reason of the overflow, the lessee lost the entire crop of sugar cane of 1884, the 200 acres of stubble cane and 85 acres of plant cane were destroyed, the canals and ditches were partially, and in some places wholly, filled up, [735] and the bridges generally swept away. The whole plantation remained under water for three months; and when the waters went down they left a deposit of from three to six inches in depth. To put the plantation in the condition in which it was at the time of the crevasse, and to fit it for cultivation as a sugar plantation in 1885, would require the canals to be opened or cleaned out, ditches to be redug, the bridges replaced, and seed cane to be obtained, all at considerable expense.

Upon comparing the master's report with the evidence taken in the case, the above appears to be a fair statement of the material facts, except that the master would seem to have overstated the number of acres of stubble cane, and understated the number of acres of plant cane; but that is immaterial, since there is no question of the whole amount of cane destroyed, or of its having been all the cane on the plantation.

But we cannot concur in the conclusions of the master and of the circuit court, that the property was neither destroyed, nor rendered unfit for the purpose for which it was leased; that the loss of the growing crop and the injuries to the plantation were not caused by an "unforeseen event;" and that the plaintiff was not entitled to relief. As the case is on the equity side of the court, it is not important to consider how far those conclusions involved inferences of fact, and how far they consisted of matter of law.

The object of this suit is not to obtain an abatement of rent, under article 2748 (2714) of the Civil Code of Louisiana, on account of the destruction of the crop, but it is to have the lease annulled, under articles 2697 (2667) and 2699 (2669), because the plantation has been destroyed or rendered unfit for the purpose for which it was leased.

That the breaking in and overflow of the waters of the Mississippi River was a fortuitous and unforeseen event, within the meaning of these articles, necessarily results from the reasons already stated, which need not be recapitulated. The remaining question is whether that event destroyed the thing leased, or rendered it unfit for the purpose for which it was leased. This question lies in smaller compass.

[736] The plaintiff had hardly put the plantation in a condition suitable for the cultivation of sugar cane, which was the sole purpose of the lease, and planted one crop, when the inundation came, putting the plantation under water for three months, filling up the canals and ditches necessary for its drainage, sweeping away the bridges, and leaving a deposit from three to six inches deep over the whole land, and making it necessary, in order to cultivate the thing leased as a sugar plantation the following year, to spend large sums of money to open and dig out canals and ditches and replace bridges; and also destroying all the stubble cane as well as all the plant cane, and leaving the plantation without any cane upon it, either to make sugar of, or to cut seed cane from for planting in succeeding years.

In short, the inundation left the thing leased in such a condition, that it was unfit for the purpose of a sugar plantation, for which it had been leased, and could not be made fit for that purpose without spending large sums of money to restore it to a condition fit for the cultivation of sugar cane, and to obtain seed cane elsewhere to start it afresh. It not only destroyed the whole crop for the year 1884, but it destroyed the plants which would otherwise have produced, both in that year and afterwards, cane for making sugar, as well as what was needed for seed cane, and destroyed the entire capacity of the plantation to grow cane and make sugar, until it should be restored to a condition fit for cultivation and planted anew. This was not a mere destruction of a crop for one year, like the destruction of a crop of wheat, or of grapes, or of apples; but it was more like the destruction of the vines, or of the apple trees, from which present and future crops are to be gathered.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the lease being of a sugar plantation for the purpose of being used to cultivate sugar cane, the injuries proved to the plantation, and to its capacity for producing cane and sugar, amounted to a partial destruction of the plantation, or, what is the same thing in legal effect, to making it cease to be fit for the purpose for which it was leased; that those injuries were [737] caused by a fortuitous or unforeseen event; and that under articles 2697 (2667) and 2699 (2669) of the Civil Code, construed in the light of the other articles that we have cited, and of the principles of the civil law, as established in Louisiana, the plaintiff was entitled to have the lease annulled. The decree of the court below dismissing the bill must therefore be reversed; and any equities of the parties which should affect the form of the decree may more conveniently be dealt with in that court.

Decree reversed, and case remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to take such further proceedings therein as may be in conformity with law, and not inconsistent with the opinion of this court.

TOWN OF BRIMFIELD.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 759–765.)

Municipal bonds — ratification by retroactive statute — federal courts — how far bound by construction of state statutes, by state courts.

1. Where the liability of a municipal corporation on negotiable securities depends upon a local statute, the rights of the parties are to be determined according to the law as declared by the state courts at the time such securities were issued.

2. It is the settled doctrine of this court that rights accruing under one construction will not be lost merely by a change of opinion in the local court.

3. Where such rights have accrued before the state court has announced its construction, this court will not surrender its independent judgment in deference to subsequent decisions of the state court.

4. In the absence of any constitutional restriction, the Legislature of a State may, by retroactive statutes, legalize the unauthorized acts and proceedings of subordinate municipal agencies where it might have previously authorized such acts and proceedings.

5. The Illinois Act of March 31, 1869, legalizing a prior unauthorized vote for the issue of railroad bonds by the Town of Brimfield, Peoria County, was valid.

6. The subsequent ratification by the Legislature of what had been done by a majority of the voters of the Municipality cannot be regarded as imposing a debt upon it, for local corporate purposes, against the will of its corporate authorities.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George A. Sanders and Thomas S. McClelland, for plaintiffs in error:

It lies in the power of the Legislature to pass curative Acts validating bonds issued by a vote of the people of a municipality, notwithstanding at the time the vote was taken there was no legislative authority for such vote.

Messrs. Henry B. Hopkins and William W. Hammond, for defendant in error:

The bonds in question were voted and issued, not only without legislative authority, but contrary to both legislative and constitutional prohibition.

The limit of the grant in the Act of March 5, 1867, to the amount of $35,000, is a direct legislative prohibition against subscribing more than that amount.

In Anderson v. Santa Anna, 116 U. S. 356, 364 [29: 633,635], we had occasion to consider the validity of so much of the Act of the Legislature of Illinois of February 28, 1867, in reference to municipal subscriptions to the stock of the Danville, Urbana, Bloomington and Pekin Railroad Company, as declared that where elections had been held, and a majority of the legal voters of any township or incorporated town declared in favor of a subscription to the stock of that company, "then and in that case no other election need be held, and the amount so voted for shall be subscribed" as in that Act provided; further, "that such elections are hereby declared to be legal and valid," as though that Act had been in force at the time thereof, and all its provisions had been complied with. An election was held in the Township of Santa Anna July 21, 1866, but there was no authority of law for its being held. It was, however, conducted in the customary mode, and the proposition for a subscription was sustained by a majority of the legal voters of the township. The subscription was made October 1, 1867, in pursuance of that vote, and of the curative Act of February 28, 1867. The validity of bonds issued in payment of the subscription was disputed upon the ground that the last named Act was in violation of the Constitution of Illinois. We held, in accordance with numerous decisions of this court cited in the opinion, that subsequent legislative ratification of the acts of a municipal corporation, which might lawfully have been performed under legislative sanction in the first instance, was equivalent to original authority. We referred, in that case, to U. S. Mortgage Co. v. Gross, 93 Ill. 483, 494, where [761] the Supreme Court of Illinois said that, "Unless there be a constitutional inhibition, a Legislature has power, when it interferes with no vested right, to enact retrospective statutes to validate invalid contracts or to ratify and confirm any act it might lawfully have authorized in the first instance."

As a municipal corporation, organized for public purposes, has, as a general rule and as between it and the State, no privileges or powers which are not subject at all times, under the Constitution, to legislative control, and as the Legislature might legally have authorized a subscription by the Township of Santa Anna, with the assent of a majority of its legal voters, we adjudged the Act of February 28, 1867, to be within the constitutional power of the Legislature to pass.

Does the present case come within these principles?

By the sixth section of an Act of the General Assembly of Illinois, approved March 5, 1867, incorporating the Dixon, Peoria and Hannibal Railroad Company, it is provided that "The several counties in which any part of said road may hereafter be located, and the several townships in said counties which have adopted or may hereafter adopt township organizations, and the cities and incorporated towns in said counties, are hereby authorized to subscribe and take stock in said Dixon, Peoria and Hannibal Railroad Company." Private Laws, Ill. 1867, p. 604. The Act restricted a subscription by a county to $100,000, and a subscription by a township, city, or town to $35,000.

It is admitted that at an election duly notified and held, on the 3d day of August, 1868, the Town of Brimfield, by a vote of one hundred and fifty as against fifty-six, lawfully voted to subscribe $35,000 to the stock of the railroad company, and to issue its bonds therefor. At the same time and place, but without authority of law, an election was held to take the sense of the voters of the Town as to an additional subscription by it of $15,000 to the stock of the same company, for which coupon bonds should be issued, payable in ten, fifteen, and twenty years. This last proposition was sustained by a vote of one hundred and fifty-three as against fifty-five.

[762] On the 31st of March, 1869, the General Assembly of Illinois passed an Act declaring "that a certain election, held in the Township of Brimfield, in Peoria County, on the 3d day of August, 1868, at which a majority of the legal voters in said Township, at special town meeting, voted to subscribe for and take $15,000 of the capital stock of the Dixon, Peoria and Hannibal Railroad Company over and above the amount authorized to be taken by the charter of said company, is hereby legalized and confirmed, and is declared to be binding upon said Township in the same manner as if said subscription had been made under the provisions of said charter." Private Laws, Ill. Vol. 3, p. 372.

Subsequently, May 5, 1869, the Township, by its proper officers, issued to the company its coupon bonds for $35,000, in pursuance of the vote at the first-named election, and also its coupon bonds for $15,000, pursuant to the above vote at the same time and place, payable in ten, fifteen and twenty years as aforesaid.

The present suit is upon bonds and coupons of the latter issue. A demurrer to a special plea setting forth these facts was overruled, and, the plaintiff electing to stand by the demurrer, the action was dismissed.

From this statement of the case it is apparent that the judgment below is inconsistent with the decision in Anderson v. Santa Anna. It is not disputed that the bonds in suit would be valid obligations of the Town of Brimfield if the election of August 3, 1868, at which they were voted, had been previously authorized by statute. In other words, according to the settled doctrines of the Supreme Court of Illinois, it would have been competent for the legal voters of the Town, under legislative authority for that purpose previously given—such voters being its "corporate authorities" in the meaning of the State Constitution as interpreted by the highest court of Illinois—to have required the subscription to be made, and the bonds to be issued which were in fact made and issued pursuant to the unauthorized election of August 3, 1868. The question then is, could the [763] Legislature, by subsequent ratification, make that legal which was originally without legal sanction, but which it might, in the first instance, have authorized? A negative answer to this question would be in conflict with numerous decisions of this court upon the general question as to the power of a Legislature to enact curative statutes, when not restrained by constitutional provisions—the last of those decisions being Anderson v. Santa Anna. We adhere to what has been heretofore said by this court upon that subject; and, in doing so, we do not infringe upon the rule that, in respect to rights arising under, and depending upon the interpretation of, the Constitution and laws of a State, this and other courts of the United States will accept as controlling the established doctrines of the highest court of the State, as announced before such rights accrued. Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 33 [27: 365]; Carroll County v. Smith, 111 U. S. 563 [28: 519]. Previous to the issuing of the bonds in suit, May 5, 1869, there had been no decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois to the effect that it was beyond the power of the Legislature to enact such a statute as that of March 31, 1869, or that the Legislature could not ratify and confirm such acts of a municipal corporation as would have been lawful if done under previous legislative authority. On the contrary, its decisions prior to that time, as we endeavored to show in Anderson v. Santa Anna, tended to sustain the validity, in such cases, of retroactive legislation. The first direct decision of the state court, so far as we are aware, adverse to the validity of such legislation, was Marshall v. Silliman, 61 Ill. 226, determined in 1871, after the bonds in the suit were issued. The cases of People v. Mayor of Chicago, 51 Ill. 17, People v. Salomon, Id. 37, People v. Chicago, Id. 58, Harward v. St. Clair, etc. Drainage Co. Id. 130, and other cases of that class cited by counsel, do not touch the question before us; for they decide, in effect, nothing more than that the power to levy taxes for local purposes could be conferred only upon the corporate authorities of the municipal body to be affected thereby—the object of the constitutional provision that "the corporate authorities of counties, townships, school districts, cities, towns, and villages may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes," being to define as well [764] the class of municipal officers upon whom the power of taxation for local purposes might be conferred, as the purposes for which such power could be constitutionally exercised. Town of Quincy v. Cooke, 107 U. S. 554 [27: 551].

So that substantially the same question is presented here that arose in Anderson v. Santa Anna. Having a clear conviction that the Legislature did not transcend its power in enacting the Statute of March 31, 1869, and there being, to say the least, at the time the bonds in suit were issued, no adjudication to the contrary in the Supreme Court of Illinois, we cannot surrender our judgment upon that question and overrule the settled doctrines of this court, in deference to decisions by the state court, made long after the rights of the plaintiff accrued. Burgess v. Seligman, Carroll County v. Smith, and Anderson v. Santa Anna. In holding that the Legislature did not violate the Constitution of the State in passing the Act of March 31, 1869, we do not disregard those decisions of the state court which hold that the Legislature cannot impose a debt, for local corporate purposes, upon a municipal body, against the will of its corporate authorities. For, as often held by the state court, the corporate authorities of a town like Brimfield are its legal voters, and they, at the election of August 3, 1868, gave their consent to the subscription and bonds in question. The same voters who approved the subscription of $35,000, at the same time, and by means of the same election machinery, approved an additional subscription for $15,000. There is no suggestion in the record that the votes cast for the latter subscription did not constitute a majority of all the legal voters of the Town. We must presume upon this record that the Legislature ascertained, as stated in the Act in question, that such a majority had, at the election of August 3, 1868, voted for the additional subscription of $15,000; and we do not see that the subsequent ratification by the Legislature of what had been done by the voters can be regarded as imposing a debt upon them against their will. The Legislature simply gave effect to the wishes of the people, as expressed in the customary mode for ascertaining the popular will. Grenada County Supervisors v. Brogden, 112 U. S. 262 [28: 704]; Anderson v. Santa Anna [supra].

The judgment must be reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. It is so ordered.

[575] BRADLEY G. SCHLEY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
PULLMAN'S PALACE CAR COMPANY.

Conveyance by feme covert—Illinois Statutes and decisions—joinder with husband—sufficiency of acknowledgment—counsel censured.

1. Under the Illinois Act of February 22, 1874, relating to the conveyance by nonresident married women of their lands in that State, and in accordance with the tendency of the decisions of its supreme court, it is held that the wife joins with her husband in the execution of a conveyance of her estate of inheritance where her name alone appears in the granting clause, the deed being signed and acknowledged by both and certified as required by law.

2. A statement in a certificate of acknowledgment to the effect that "personally came" the grantors, "known to me to be the persons who executed the foregoing instrument," is a substantial compliance with the Illinois Statute, which requires the certificate to show that the person making the acknowledgment was personally known to the officer.

3. In the case presented, an objection that the certificate does not state that the wife was not informed of the contents of the deed is held not to be well taken.

4. Counsel for the defendant in error censured for introducing into his printed argument facts not found in the record, and in violation of a stipulation between the parties.

Submitted Jan. 6, 1887. Motion submitted Jan. 18, 1887. Decided March 7, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Opinion below published, 25 Fed. Rep. 890. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. S. Corning Judd, Albert Ritchie, William Ritchie, Edward B. Esher and Edward S. Judd, for plaintiff in error:

The fact that William Lynn signed, sealed and acknowledged this deed is not sufficient to make him a party to it. He should have been named or otherwise expressly designated in the body of the deed as a party grantor.

Agricultural Bank v. Rice, 45 U. S. 4 How. 228 (11: 951); Batchelor v. Brereton, 112 U. S. 396 (28: 748); Lithgow v. Kavenagh, 9 Mass. 172; Lufkin v. Curtis, 13 Mass. 223; Melvin v. Proprietors, etc. 16 Pick. 139.

"A deed cannot bind a party sealing it, unless it contains words expressive of an intention to be bound."

Catlin v. Ware, 9 Mass. 218; Fowler v. Shearer, 7 Mass. 14.

This is just as true of William Lynn, though he was a person sui juris, as it would have been of his wife.

Peabody v. Hewett, 52 Me. 33, 50; Chapman v. Crooks, 41 Mich. 595; Harrison v. Simons, 55 Ala. 514. See also McFarland v. Febiger, 7 Ohio, 194; Purcell v. Goshorn, 17 Ohio, 105; Cincinnati v. Newell, 7 Ohio St. 41; Carter v. Goodin, 8 Ohio St. 78; Payne v. Parker, 10 Me. 178; Cox v. Wells, 7 Blackf. 410; Whiteley v. Stewart, 63 Mo. 360; Powell v. *Monson & B. The remaining objection to this deed is that the certificate of acknowledgment does not comply with the statutory requirements.

Tully v. Davis, 30 Ill. 103; Lindley v. Smith, 46 Ill. 523; Murphy v. Williamson, 85 Ill. 152; Lane v. Dolick, 6 McLean, 204.

Elliott v. Peirsol, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 328 (7: 164); Lindley v. Smith, 46 Ill. 523.

It is true that if Mrs. Lynn was "known" to the officer, as the certificate states, she must have been either "personally" known, or proven by credible witnesses, but this leaves it uncertain which, and it was the purpose of the statute not to leave this point uncertain.

Shephard v. Carriel, 19 Ill. 319.

Mr. Alfred Ennis, for defendant in error: [576]

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment, in which the plaintiff in error claims title to certain real estate in Cook County, Illinois, of which Pullman's Palace Car Company is in possession. A jury having been waived, the case was tried by the court, pursuant to a stipulation between the parties, that judgment should be entered for the defendant if the court was of opinion that a certain deed was valid and binding as a conveyance by husband and wife of the real estate therein described.

The deed and the certificate of acknowledgment annexed thereto, referred to in the stipulation, are as follows:

"This Indenture, made this twenty-sixth day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-six, witnesseth: That I, Christina Lynn, sister and heir at law of Henry Millspaugh, deceased, who was a recruit of Lieutenant T. W. Denton, of Thirteenth Regiment, United States Infantry, War of 1812, with Great Britain, of the County of St. Clair, and State of Michigan, party of the first part, in consideration of the sum of forty-three dollars in hand paid by Milton & Thomas [577] C. McEwen, of the County of Orange and State of New York, party of the second part, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, do hereby release, grant, bargain, and quitclaim unto the said party of the second part, their heirs and assigns, forever, all her right, title, claim and interest in that certain tract of land granted by the United States unto David Millspaugh and Christina Lynn, the brother and sister and only heirs at law of Henry Millspaugh, deceased, as follows, to wit: [Here follows a description of the land] * * *; to have and to hold the said premises, with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging or in anywise appertaining, to their only proper use, benefit and behoof of said parties of the second part, their heirs and assigns, forever.

"In witness whereof the said grantor- have hereunto set our hands and seals the day and year first above written.

"CHRISTINA LYNN. [SEAL.]
"WILLIAM LYNN. [SEAL.]

"Signed, sealed and acknowledged in the presence of—

"MARY A. LYNN,
"OBED SMITH.

"STATE OF MICHIGAN, } ss.
COUNTY OF ST. CLAIR, }

"On this twenty-seventh day of May, A. D. 1856, before me, a justice of the peace in and for said County of St. Clair, personally came Christina Lynn and William Lynn, her husband, known to me to be the persons who executed the foregoing instrument, and acknowledged the same to be their free act and deed; and the said Christina Lynn, having been by me privately examined separate and apart from the said husband, and fully understanding the contents of the foregoing instrument, acknowledged that she executed said deed freely and without any force or compulsion from her said husband or from any one.

"OBED SMITH,
Justice of the Peace."

The court being of opinion that the deed was valid to pass to the grantees all the right, title [578] and interest of Christina Lynn and William Lynn, her husband, in the real estate therein described, entered judgment for the defendant on its plea of not guilty.

Before entering upon the consideration of the case it is proper to notice the motion made in behalf of the plaintiff in error, to strike out certain parts of the printed argument filed by the counsel for the defendant in error. Notwithstanding the agreement that the case should be heard in the court below upon the single question referred to in the stipulation, the counsel for the defendant in error states many things, which he declares to be "incontrovertible facts," and within the knowledge of opposing counsel, but which are wholly unsustained by anything in the record. The motion to strike out relates to those matters. The excuse given for this breach of professional propriety is "the extreme brevity of the record." But it is the same record upon which counsel for the Company succeeded for his client, and which, by agreement, contained all that was to be submitted to the court. The excuse given furnishes no apology whatever for his violation of the terms of the stipulation; much less does it palliate his attempt to influence the decision here, by reference to matters not in the record, and which he must have known could not be taken into consideration. It is only necessary to say that the facts dehors the record, which have been improperly introduced into the brief of the counsel for the defendant in error, have not in any degree influenced our determination of the case.

The plaintiff insists that the deed was void under the laws of Illinois, upon two grounds: 1. That the husband is not a party to the deed; 2. That the acknowledgment is defective.

In Lane v. Soulard, 15 Ill. 123, it was held that the Revised Statutes of Illinois of 1845 repealed all former laws on the subject of conveyances of real estate, and authorized married women within that State to convey land by joining with their husbands and acknowledging the deeds in a specified way; but that no provision was made for the conveyance by non-resident married women of their lands in Illinois until the passage of the Act of February 22, 1847. See also Higgins v. Crosby, 40 Ill. 260; Rogers v. Higgins, 48 Ill. 211.

This case depends mainly upon the construc- [579] tion to be placed upon the second section of the latter Act, which was in force when the deed of May 26, 1856, was executed. That section is as follows:

"When any feme covert, not residing in this State, being above the age of eighteen years, shall join with her husband in the execution of any deed, mortgage, conveyance, or other writing of, or relating to, any lands or real estate, situate within this State, she should thereby be barred of and from all estate, right, title, interest, and claims of dower therein, in like manner as if she was sole and of full age. And any such feme covert joining with her husband in the execution of a power of attorney or other writing, authorizing the sale, conveyance, or other disposition of lands or real estate as aforesaid, shall be bound and concluded by the same, in respect to the right, title, claim or interest in such estate, as if she were sole and of full age as aforesaid; and the acknowledgment or proof of such deed, mortgage, conveyance, power of attorney, or other writing may be the same as if she were sole, and shall entitle such deed, mortgage, conveyance, power of attorney, or other writing to be recorded as is authorized by this Act; and the provisions of this section shall apply to deeds, mortgages, conveyances, powers of attorney, and other writings heretofore, as well as those which may hereafter be executed." Scates, Treat & Blackwell, Stat. Ill. Vol. 2, p. 965; 1 Gross, Stat. Ill. chap. 24, § 24; 1 Adams & Durham, Real Estate Stat. & Decisions of Ill. p. 175.

Did Christina Lynn, within the meaning of that statute, "join with her husband in the execution" of the deed of 1856? The plaintiff contends that she did not, because the name of the husband is not expressly designated in the body of the deed as a grantor. It is argued that as William Lynn, the husband, had during coverture a freehold interest, jointly with his wife, in her estate of inheritance, with absolute ownership of the rents and profits of the wife, the requirement in the Act of 1847, that she should join him in the execution of any deed for real estate, was a recognition of his supremacy and right of control, and necessarily implied that he, as grantor, so named in the granting or operating [580] clause, must pass whatever interest he had, and thereby, also, express his willingness that the wife should convey her title or estate. While this position is sustained by some adjudications, it is necessary to inquire as to the state of the local law; for the rights of the parties must be governed by the requirements of that law in respect to the mode in which real property situated within the limits of that State may be conveyed or transferred. U. S. v. Crosby, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 115 [3:287]; Clark v. Graham, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 579 [5:335]; McCormick v. Sullivant, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 202 [6:303]; Suydam v. Williamson, 65 U. S. 24 How. 433 [16: 745]; Brine v. Ins. Co. 96 U. S. 627 [24: 858].

In Johnson v. Montgomery, 51 Ill. 185, the question was whether dower was barred by a deed executed in 1853, in Ohio, conveying lands in Illinois belonging to the husband, the wife signing the deed and duly acknowledging it before a proper officer. But the wife was not named in the body of the deed, nor was her right of dower referred to therein in any way. It is true, as suggested by counsel for the plaintiff in error, that an inchoate right of dower is not a present estate in lands, and that the court in that case expressly waived any decision of the question whether the deed then before it would have been good under the Act of 1847, and placed its decision entirely upon the 21st section of the Statute of Conveyances of 1845. That section provides that it shall be lawful "for any married woman to release her right of dower of, in, and to any lands, tenements whereof her husband may be possessed or seised, by any legal or equitable title during her coverture, by joining such husband in the deed or conveyance for the conveying of such lands and tenements, and appearing and acknowledging the same, etc.,  which [certificate of privy examination] being recorded together with the deed, duly executed and acknowledged by the husband according to law, shall be sufficient to discharge and bar the claim of such woman to dower in the lands and tenements conveyed by such deed or conveyance." 1 Adams & Durham, 183; Rev. Stat. Ill. 1845, p. 107. The court, after observing that the deed merely extinguished the wife's contingent right of dower, [581] and did not pass any estate she had in the land. said: "This precise question has not hitherto been presented, but we entertain no doubt it has always been supposed by both the people and the profession in this State that a married woman, siguing her husband's deed and being properly examined before an officer and causing his certificate of that fact to be placed upon the deed, would bar her dower in the premises conveyed, although her name nowhere appeared in the body of the deed. By signing the deed she 'joins' in it, and having done this, her dower is barred if she takes the other steps pointed out by the statute." This decision bears somewhat on the question as to what the local statutes mean when they require the wife to join with the husband in a conveyance of real estate.

In Miller v. Shaw, 103 Ill. 290, one of the questions was whether a certain conveyance by a married woman, living in Illinois with her husband, passed the title to her separate real property situated in that State, the husband not joining with her in the granting clause of the deed. The statute in force when the deed was made prescribed the mode in which the husband and wife, residing in Illinois, could convey the real estate of the wife. Act of 1845, § 17, p. 106; 1 Adams & Durham, 127-8. It made it lawful for the husband and wife to "execute" any grant, lease, deed, or conveyance of such estate. The court said: "That which this statute requires to be done, to enable the wife to convey her separate property, is that she and her husband shall execute the deed, and after that she shall appear before a proper officer and acknowledge the same in the mode pointed out in the statute; and such deed being acknowledged or proved according to law by the husband, it will be as effectual to pass the title to the wife's separate property as the deed of an unmarried woman would be to convey her property. All this was done in this case. Both Mrs. Sheldon and her husband executed the deed to Ward, and afterwards she appeared before a proper officer and acknowledged it in conformity with the statute; and the acknowledgment of her husband to the deed being according to law, that seems to be all the law requires to be done to make the deed effectual to [582] pass the title to the wife's separate estate."

The latest case to which our attention has been called is Yocum v. Lovell, 111 Ill. 212. By a Statute of Illinois every householder is declared to be entitled "to an estate of homestead," to a specified amount, in the farm or lot of land, and buildings thereon, owned or rightly possessed by lease or otherwise, and acquired by him or her as a residence; such homestead and all right and title therein being exempted from attachment, judgment, levy, execution or sale for the payment of his debts or other purposes and from the laws of conveyance, descent and devise as provided in that statute. The exemption continues after the death of the householder for the benefit of the surviving husband or wife, so long as he or she occupies such homestead, and of the children until the youngest child become twenty-one years of age. The statute also provides that "No release, waiver or conveyance of the estate so exempted shall be valid, unless the same is in writing, subscribed by said householder and his or her wife or husband, if he or she have one, and acknowledged in the same manner as conveyances of real estate are required to be acknowledged, or possession is abandoned or given pursuant to the conveyance; or, if the exemption is continued to child or children, without the order of the court directing a release thereof." Rev. Stat. 1874, p. 497. In the case last cited, the question was whether a trust deed expressly relinquishing the homestead right was effectual for that purpose, the name of the wife not appearing in the granting clause of the deed, although it was signed and duly acknowledged by herself and husband in conformity with the statute. The court held the deed to be sufficient to pass the interest of both husband and wife in the estate of homestead,—observing that the statute did not require the name of the husband or wife to appear in the body of the deed. Referring to Miller v. Shaw, as presenting an analogous question, the court said: "In the case now being considered the wife joins with her husband in the release of the homestead in precisely the same manner as the husband did with the wife in the case cited."

While those cases do not cover the precise [583] question under consideration, we are of opinion that under the principles announced in them, the deed of May 26, 1856, must be upheld as a valid transfer under the law of Illinois of the interest of Christina Lynn and her husband. If, as adjudged by the Supreme Court of the State, the wife, whose name did not appear in the operative clause of the husband's conveyance of his lands, is to be held as having joined him therein and surrendered her right of dower, by simply signing the deed and acknowledging it in conformity with the statute, and upon privy examination duly certified; if, under a statute making it lawful for husband and wife "to execute" a conveyance of her real estate, they will both be held to have executed a conveyance of her separate property where her name appears, but that of the husband does not appear, in the granting clause of the deed, but they both sign and acknowledge it in the mode required by law; and if the wife's "estate of homestead" can be conveyed by a deed, signed and duly acknowleged by herself and husband, her name, however, not appearing in the body of the deed; it would seem to follow that, within the meaning of the Act of 1847, and according to the tendency of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the State, the wife joins with her husband in the execution of a conveyance of her estate of inheritance where her name alone appears in the granting clause, but the deed is signed by both herself and husband, is acknowledged by both, and is certified as required by law. Such conveyance, so signed, acknowledged, and certified, of the wife's land, seems to be as effectual, under the local law, to invest the grantee with the title and interest of both husband and wife as if his name had also appeared in the granting clause.

[584] If, as suggested, the purpose of the Act of 1847 in requiring the wife to join the husband in the execution of conveyances of her real estate was to protect her against strangers and secure his co-operation and counsel, that object was as fully accomplished by his signing and acknowledging the deed with her as it would have been by designating him in the body of the deed, as co-grantor with the wife.

It is proper to say that the question under consideration is not free from difficulty, and we should have been glad to be guided in our determination of it by an express decision of the highest court of the State. The conclusion reached by us is more in harmony with what that court has held in cases somewhat analogous than would be a decision adjudging the deed of 1856 to be void.

One other question remains to be considered. It is contended that the certificate of acknowledgment is fatally defective for two reasons: 1. It does not appear that Mrs. Lynn was personally known to the magistrate, or that she was proved by a credible witness to be the same person as the one who subscribed to the deed; 2. It does not appear that she was informed of the contents of the deed.

In support of these objections, the counsel for the plaintiff in error relies upon the 20th section of the chapter on "Conveyances" in the Revised Statutes of 1845, p. 107. That section provides: "No judge or other officer shall take the acknowledgment of any person to any deed or instrument of writing as aforesaid, unless the person offering to make such acknowledgment shall be personally known to him to be the real person who, and in whose name such acknowledgment is proposed to be made, or shall be proved to be such by a credible witness; and the judge or officer taking such acknowledgment shall, in his certificate thereof, state that such person was personally known to him to be the person whose name is subscribed to such deed or writing, or having executed the same, or that he was proved to be such by a credible witness (naming him)," etc. That chapter was amended by the Act of February 11, 1853, the first section of which provides, "That no deed, mortgage, or other instrument of writing, heretofore executed, or hereafter to be executed, by husband and wife, in good faith, for the purpose of conveying or incumbering the estate of the husband, or the estate of the wife, or the right of dower in any lands situate in this State, and acknowledged by them before any officer authorized by the laws of this State to take acknowledgments, shall be deemed, held, or adjudged invalid, or defective or insufficient in law, by reason of any informality or omission in setting forth the particulars of the acknowledgment, before such officer as aforesaid, in the certificate thereof: Provided, however, That it appears in substance, from such certificate, that the parties executing said [585] deed, mortgage, or other instrument of writing, executed the same freely and voluntarily; and that in case of married women executing the same, it appears, in substance, that they knew the contents of said deeds, mortgages or other instruments of writing, and that they were examined by the officer aforesaid, separate and apart from their husbands." 1 Adams & Durham, 185.

It was said in Lindley v. Smith, 46 Ill. 527, that the requirement that the certificate should show that the person acknowledging it was personally known to the officer to be the person whose name is subscribed to the deed, or was proved to be such, by a credible witness, was one of substance and salutary in its operation, and was not dispensed with by the Act of 1853; and that "It is the acknowledgment of the feme covert which is the operative act to pass her title." See also Murphy v. Williamson, 85 Ill. 152. Assuming this to have been the settled law of Illinois when the deed in question was executed, and that the case, on this point, is governed by the Revised Statutes of 1845, the result claimed by the plaintiff in error does not follow. The cases cited do not sustain the objection to the certificate of acknowledgment. In Lindley v. Smith—one of the cases relied upon by the plaintiff in error—there was no language in the certificate of the wife's acknowledgment from which it could be inferred that she was either personally known to him or was proved by a witness to be the person who had, as wife, signed the deed. To the same class belong the cases of Heinrich v. Simpson, 66 Ill. 57, and Coburn v. Herrington, 114 Ill. 107. The officer's certificate in this case states that "personally came Christina Lynn and William Lynn, her husband, known to me to be the persons who executed the foregoing instrument, and acknowledged the same to be their free act and deed." This is, in substance, a statement that they came before the officer and were personally known to him to be the real persons who in fact subscribed and acknowledged the deed.

The objection that the officer's certificate [586] does not state that she was informed of the contents of the deed—if it have any force whatever under the Act of 1847, permitting the non-resident feme covert to acknowledge her deeds as if she were unmarried—is not well taken. The certificate shows that she executed the deed freely and without force or compulsion from the husband or from anyone else, "fully understanding the contents" thereof. Besides, this defect, if it be one, is of the kind that was cured by the Act of 1853, which only required it to appear, in substance, as it does here, that the deed was executed freely and voluntarily, and, in the case of a married woman, that she knew its contents and was examined separately and apart from her husband. She must have known, if, as certified, she fully understood the contents of the deed.

The judgment below was right, and is affirmed.

LEPINE C. RICE, Assignee of ROBERT ERWIN ET AL., Trading as ERWIN & HARDEE, Appt.,

v.

UNITED STATES.

122 US 611

Captured and Abandoned Property Act—special Act for relief of Robert Erwin—action by assignee in bankruptcy—Statute of Limitations.

The judgment of the court below holding that an action brought February 17, 1886, under the provisions of the special Act of February 5, 1877, authorizing that court to take jurisdiction of the claims of Robert Erwin against the United States, is barred under the Statute of Limitations, is affirmed by a divided court.

Submitted Jan. 3, 1887. Affirmed March 7, 1887. Petition for rehearing denied March 21, 1887.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Reported below, 21 Ct. Cl. 418.

This action was brought February 17, 1886, by the assignee in bankruptcy of Robert Erwin, under the provisions of the special Act of February 5, 1877, authorizing the court below to take jurisdiction, under the provisions of the Captured and Abandoned Property Act of March 12, 1863, of his claims against the United States for property alleged to have been taken from him by persons duly authorized and acting in behalf of the United States.

At the hearing upon general demurrer, and of a motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, the questions whether the assignee can maintain an action on said claims, said special Act having been "for the benefit of Robert Erwin" and not for his creditors, and whether an assignee in bankruptcy can keep the estate open and bring an action nine years after his appointment, were raised but not decided. The court held, Mr. Justice Nott dissenting, that the cause of action arose on the passage of the Act of 1877, and that the action, having been commenced more than six years thereafter, is barred by section 1069, R. S. Claimant appeals to this court.

Messrs. Charles Marshall, Albert Small, Samuel Shellabarger, J. M. Wilson and Charles N. West, for appellant:

The action is under the special statute reviving pro hac vice the Captured and Abandoned Property Act, and extends to this claimant all the benefits of that Act.

The right of action under the original Act expired by its own limitation two years after the close of the war, August 20, 1868.

The effect of revival, such as this, as expressed by this court, is: "We are of opinion that by reviving an Act, the Legislature must be understood to give it, from the time of its revival, precisely that force and effect which it had at the moment when it expired."

The Aurora, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 382 (3: 378).

The form and effect of the Captured and Abandoned Property Act, in behalf of these claims, is therefore in nowise changed. The effect of the special statute is to extend to the claims the remedy provided by that Act, notwithstanding the limitation it prescribes.

Erwin v. U. S. 97 U. S. 394 (24: 1066); Ford v. U. S. 116 U. S. 216 (29: 609).

By the Captured and Abandoned Property Act Congress created an express trust, the Government being the trustee; the trust estate, the fund created by it in the Treasury; the cestuis que trust, all who could bring themselves within the terms of the Act; and for the right thus created, a remedy by suit in the court of claims. For reasons of public policy the jurisdiction of the court was limited as to its duration; no other limitation was imposed.

As the Act affects the question of jurisdiction here raised, it was very fully considered in Hayoraft v. U. S. 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 81 (22: 738).

That the fund in the Treasury created by the operation of the Act is a trust fund has been uniformly held by the court of claims and by this court, and is expressly declared in the following cases:

Anderson's, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 65 (19: 617); Padelford's, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 538 (19: 790); Klein's, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 128 (20: 519); Haycraft's, supra; The Elgee Cotton Cases, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 180 (22: 863); Hall's, 92 U. S. 28 (23: 598); Lamar v. Browne, 92 U. S. 195 (23: 653); Rose's, 92 U. S. 281 (23: 707); Intermingled Cotton Cases, 92 U. S. 651 (23: 756); Young's, 97 U. S. 61 (24: 997).

There is no doubt of the right of a Government to create a trust by legislation.

1 Perry, Tr. § 30; Alexander v. Duke of Wellington, 2 Russ. & M. 35; Stevens v. Bagwell, 15 Ves. 140.

The Act did not devest the title of the owner.

Klein's Case, supra; Pugh's, 99 U. S. 269 (25: 323); Winchester's, 99 U. S. 372 (25: 479).

The subject matter of the trust is fixed and certain; the beneficiaries are specifically determined; a jurisdiction is erected, and a remedy is provided for the enforcement of the rights created by the Act.

Hayoraft's Case, supra; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 964; 1 Spence, Eq. 499.

Limitations do not run against an express trust.

U. S. v. Taylor, 104 U. S. 216 (26: 721); U. S. v. Lawton, 110 U. S. 149 (28: 101); Philippi v. Philippe, 115 U. S. 156 (29: 338;) Fripp's Exr. v. U. S. 19 Ct. Cl. 667.

The intention of Congress to create an ex press trust, although, for the reasons assigned by this court at page 95 of Haycraft's Case, the time within which the remedy, under the Act, could be availed of was limited, is thus very forcibly stated by the court of claims in Ford v. U. S. 19 Ct. Cl. 519:

"Had that Act granted that privilege, without specifying a time within which a loyal man should prefer his claim here, there is no reason why he might not come here now, though more than twenty-one years had elapsed, as in the present case, since his property was captured and sold."

If the court of claims has jurisdiction, it is of the claims of Robert Erwin, which by operation of the Bankrupt Act passed to the appellant, as assignee, carrying with the title to the claims every right of action which the owner, Erwin, had.

Erwin v. U. S. 97 U. S. 397 (24: 1067); Phelps v. McDonald, 99 U. S. 304 (25: 475); Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 62 (23: 222); Clark v. Clark, 58 U. S. 17 How. 315 (15: 77); Milnor v. Metz, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 227 (10: 945); Minot v. Tappan, 127 Mass. 333; Berry v. Sawyer, 19 Fed. Rep. 286.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen. and Heber J. May, Assist. Atty. for appellee:

The claims in this case have no other foundation than a law of Congress which brought them within the general jurisdiction, and, consequently, within the general limitation statutes.

To hold because the special Act itself contains no limitation, no limitation whatever applies, would be to overrule a well established line of decisions.

Zellner's Case, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 244 (19:665); 7 Ct. Cl. 208; Erwin's Case, 97 U. S. 392 (24: 1065); 18 Ct. Cl. 49; Clark's Case, 99 U. S. 498 (25: 481); 11 Ct. Cl. 702.

It is disputed that Congress intended to put Erwin's claim on a better footing than other claims. Congress has not expressed any such intention in the Act in regard to the claim, and the same cannot be presumed or implied. The object of the Act was to legislate as to previous and not future limitation. It is a simple grant of jurisdiction to the court of claims to hear and determine Erwin's Case under the law, without other or further expressed privileges.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite announced an affirmance by a divided court.

[595] ELON A. MARSH ET AL., Appts.,
v.
NICHOLS, SHEPARD & COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 595-597.)

Practice—motion by one of several appellants to dismiss appeal.

This court will not dismiss an appeal on motion of one of several appellants against the opposition of the others.

Submitted March 7, 1887. Decided March 14, 1887.

ON motion by one appellant to dismiss an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan. Overruled.

This was a motion, upon an appearance entered for that purpose by James Scott, one of the appellants, who had not authorized the appeal nor an entry of his appearance, to dismiss the appeal, which was from a decree dismissing on the hearing a bill in equity for an accounting, and for a perpetual injunction to restrain the defendant from unlawfully infringing letters patent for a certain invention of which the complainants were the owners. The motion was founded upon the following affidavit, entry of appearance and transcript of the record in a suit commenced in the Circuit Court of Calhoun County by the appellee, against the appellants, to restrain them from asserting that the appellee has not the complete right to make, use, vend or put in practice or operation and use on any engine made, sold, used or operated by them, a certain device; that appellants may be ordered to specifically carry out a certain contract by which appellees were to be permitted to use said device; and praying that if a patent should hereafter be granted to appellants they should be restrained from interfering with complainant's use of said device; which relief was granted by a decree of the circuit court, and upon appeal to the Supreme Court of Michigan was affirmed after this pending appeal was taken.

There is also a copy of a writ of error to this court by appellants Marsh and Le Fever, taken on the ground that it appears in the record and proceedings that there was drawn in question before said supreme court an authority exercised by defendants under the Constitution and laws of the United States; and also it appears that such authority so exercised by defendants was denied in this:

1. That it appears therein that the exclusive jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, on the appeal by these defendants upon the same question, and between the same parties, was drawn in question, and was denied.

2. That full faith and credit, at the request of these defendants, was not given to the proceedings, record and appeal appearing in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan, concerning the same issues and between the same parties. [597]

3. That the right and authority under the Constitution and laws of the United States of the said defendants to prosecute their said appeal from the said Circuit Court of the United States was drawn in question and denied.

4. That the right and authority under the Constitution and laws of the United States, authorizing the issue of letters patent to inventors, and especially the right and authority exercised by said defendants under letters patent No. 236052, issued in pursuance of said laws, was drawn in question and denied.

The motion was as follows:

"And now comes James Scott, one of the parties named as appellant in the above-entitled case, by Edward J. Hill, his attorney, who appears herein for the purpose of his motion only, and shows unto this honorable court that the said appellants are all citizens of the State of Michigan, resident at the City of Battle Creek in the County of Calhoun, therein, and that the appellee is a private corporation organized and doing business at said city, by the name of 'Nichols, Shepard & Co.,' under the laws of said State of Michigan; and that the claim of said appellants against the said appellee in this cause is for an alleged infringement by the appellee of those certain letters patent numbered 236052, dated December 28, A. D. 1880, issued to said appellants Elon A. Marsh and his assignee, the said Minard LeFever, out of and under the seal of the patent office of the United States, for an invention therein described, of the said Elon Marsh; to wit, a new and useful improvement in steam engine valve gear; and that since the appeal herein was taken they, the said Elon A. Marsh, Minard LeFever and James Scott, have, by the orders and decrees of the Circuit Court of Calhoun County aforesaid, as affirmed, amended and approved, on appeal, by the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan, been perpetually enjoined and restrained from further making any claim against the said Corporation for the manufacture, sale and use of said invention; and the said appellants have been required to execute a release, among other things, of all the claims and demands which they have been prosecuting in this cause, to the said Corporation, as will more fully and at large appear in and by duly certified copies of the said orders and decrees, as the same are of record in the clerk's office of the said Circuit Court of Calhoun County, in that certain cause therein wherein the said Nichols, Shepard & Co. was the plaintiff and the said Elon A. Marsh, Minard LeFever and James Scott were the defendants, herewith filed herein; and further that he, the said James Scott, is informed by counsel learned in the law that, by virtue of the said orders and decrees of the Circuit Court of Calhoun County, the cause of action of the said appellants against the said Corporation appellee has been extinguished, so that the further prosecution of this appeal would not only be nugatory, but in direct violation of the orders and decrees of a court of equity of competent and exclusive jurisdiction over both the parties and the subject matter involved in said orders and decrees.

Wherefore, the said James Scott now produces and exhibits the said orders and decrees and the pleadings in the said cause in the said Circuit Court of Calhoun County, by duly certified copies thereof, together with the opinions of the circuit court judge who heard the same, and the Supreme Court of Michigan approving, affirming, modifying and amending the said orders and decrees, and asks that this appeal be dismissed, or for such other or further order or direction herein as the exigencies of the case may require, according to the custom and practice of this honorable court, and as to equity and good conscience may appertain. Dated February 28, A. D. 1887.

James Scott.

By Edward J. Hill, his attorney.

Edward J. Hill, of counsel."

The affidavit was in these words:

"State of Michigan, } ss.
Calhoun County. }

James Scott, being first duly sworn, doth on [596] oath depose and say: I am one of the appellants named in the above entitled case; that said appeal was taken without my knowledge and consent, and that I gave no authority to R. A. Parker, Esq., of Detroit, Michigan, to enter my appearance in this case in this court, but that I have authorized and directed Mr. Edward J. Hill, of Chicago, Illinois, one of the attorneys of this court, to appear for me and move to dismiss this appeal.

James Scott.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 10th day of February, A. D. 1887.

[Seal.] Frank W. Dunning,
Notary Public."

Mr. Edward J. Hill, for James Scott, appellant, in support of the motion:

The license and the injunction established by the decree of the state court end all controversy as to any infringement, and the further prosecution of any suits therefor covering the improved steam engine valve gear described in letters patent No. 236052, dated December 28, A. D. 1880.

Hartell v. Tilghman, 99 U. S. 547 (25: 357).

The release of all the claims and demands involved in this suit required by the amendment ordered by the Supreme Court of Michigan, on appeal, extinguishes the cause of action in this cause.

Dakota Co. v. Glidden, 113 U. S. 222 (28: 981), and cases there cited.

We insist that, instead of suing out a writ of error where, on the face of the decree, it is plain and palpable that no jurisdiction can possibly exist in this court to review the question of license, it was their duty to bow (as this appellant does here now) in deference to the decree of the Michigan Supreme Court, which is the final arbiter in such cases, and promptly cause this appeal to be dismissed.

Semple v. Hagar, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 431 (18: 402).

Besides, the writ of error is fatally defective, as it does not include one of the defendants; namely, James Scott aforesaid; it cannot therefore affect him.

Simpson v. Greeley, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 152 (22: 338); Feibelman v. Packard, 108 U. S. 14 (27: 634).

Messrs. R. A. Parker and Don M. Dickinson, for appellants Marsh and Le Fever:

The motion admits that the final decree of the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan conflicts with the prosecution of the appeal in this cause, and this is supported in the brief of Mr. Hill. It also appears from the motion that the action resulting in such decree forbidding the prosecution of the appeal was taken subsequently to the obtainment of the jurisdiction of the United States Circuit Court below and of this court; hence, this court is asked to dismiss an appeal because the state court has, in an action subsequently commenced, undertaken to restrain its prosecution. As a general principle this cannot be done, and the state court is without jurisdiction to do so.

Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 3 (27: 346); Freeman v. Howe, 65 U. S. 24 How. 450 (16: 749); Peck v. Jenness, 48 U. S. 7 How. 624 (12: 846).

In case it should attempt to do this, a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States would lie.

Freeman v. Howe and Embry v. Palmer, supra.

In reply to the position taken in the motion and brief, we say:

First. That the order and decrees of the state court have been superseded by a writ of error taken to this court, as will appear by certified copies filed herewith.

Second. That said writ of error has been taken because, among other things, of the conflict of jurisdiction between the state and federal courts; hence, we submit that appellants are not bound by the decrees of the state court pending the disposition of the same in this court, either to comply with those decrees or to bow thereto, or to refrain from prosecuting their appeal in this court.

But it is urged that such writ of error is fatally defective because Scott is not a party thereto.

The pleadings, orders and decrees filed with the motion show:

First. That while Scott was made a defendant with Marsh and Le Fever in the bill filed in the state court by the defendant herein, he answered severally from Marsh and Le Fever, and to the effect that he disclaimed all interest whatsoever in the letters patent in question, or the device or invention mentioned therein, or any interest as a partner, joint owner or otherwise with Marsh and Le Fever.

Second. That he acquiesced in the decision of the Circuit Court of Calhoun Co., from which Marsh and Le Fever alone appealed to the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan and were the only parties subject to its decree on appeal, whereby a proceeding equivalent to a severance was had, as Marsh and Le Fever, on the affirmance of the supreme court, were the only parties capable of taking a writ of error to this court, as such writ of error could only be taken from a final decision of a court of last resort; hence, the cases cited by Mr. Hill do not apply.

Mr. Edward J. Hill, in reply:

The gentlemen who oppose this motion are wrong as to the chancery practice of their own State. True, "Any complainant or defendant who may think himself aggrieved * * * by the decree or final order of a circuit court in chancery in any case may appeal therefrom to the supreme court."

Howell, Stat. § 6737.

But the appeal brings up the entire record as a whole, with all matters, as well those of discretion as otherwise, open for consideration and review in the appellate court, precisely as they were in the court below. The hearing will be the same as if the cause had never been heard before. The court will affirm, modify or reverse, as equity may require, or make such order or decree as should have been made by the court below.

Detroit F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Renz, 33 Mich. 298; Haines v. Haines, 35 Mich. 143; Howell, Stat. § 6741.

The gentlemen say "We have no objection, however, to James Scott being made a party by amendment to the writ of error, if this court should think it necessary." This may be done by consent.

See Deneale v. Stump, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 526, 528 (8: 1032, 1033).

The disclaimer did not shield Scott from the decree. He has a suit pending to rescind his contract of purchase, but he alone could not rescind. The decree is against him, and he is a party named in the record from the bill of complaint to the final decree. Is he then a stranger to this record? This record is final, unless this court has jurisdiction.

We do not understand that, even if the question of license had been raised and were pending as a defense to an infringement suit, the pendency of the infringement suit would preclude the jurisdiction of a court of equity in settling the terms, effect and scope of the license. Had a decree been rendered at Detroit finding Nichols, Shepard & Co. an infringer, then the prior adjudication might have precluded that corporation from avoiding the same by any subsequent action to establish a license. But the decree there was against the plaintiffs. The cause had been dismissed for the reasons stated in the published opinion of the learned district judge.

See Marsh v. Nichols, 24 Off. Gaz. 901, August Term 28 (1883).

The license was not set up and, if it had been set up as a defense, could not have been passed upon by the Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Michigan.

24 Off. Gaz. 901, August 28 (1883).

The injunction does not reach this court, nor this appeal in No. 641; it reaches the parties. And by means of this motion and the filing of the record here, the estoppel of record involved in the decision of the state courts and the release there ordered are made known to this court. This court, seeing that the cause of action no longer exists, it seems to us, must dismiss the appeal, even if Scott were a stranger.

Lord v. Veazie, 49 U. S. 8 How. 251 (12: 1067).

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This motion is denied. The sole ground of the application is that since the appeal the Supreme Court of Michigan has, in a suit between the same parties, enjoined these appellants from making any claim against the appellee for the use of the patented invention which is the subject matter of the suit, and has required them to release all the claims and demands which they have been prosecuting.

Marsh and Le Fever oppose this motion, and Scott has no right to dismiss for them.

v.
NICHOLS, SHEPARD & COMPANY

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 598–600.)

Practice—parties to writ of error.

A party defendant, against whom a decree was taken pro confesso, cannot make himself a party to a writ of error which was sued out by other defendants, so as to control the case in this court.

[No. 671.]

Submitted March 7, 1887. Decided March 14, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan. Motion denied.

On motion of James Scott for leave to file the transcript and docket cause, with which is united a motion to amend the writ by making himself a party plaintiff in error, and then to dismiss for want of jurisdiction.

This bill was filed in the Calhoun Circuit Court to compel defendants to convey to complainants, who are a Corporation engaged in engine building at Battle Creek, the right to use a certain improvement consisting of a reversing apparatus, for which defendants claim to own a patent, and for the principal part of which it is admitted they are entitled to have one.

The answer of James Scott disclaimed any interest whatever in the matter in controversy, and a decree pro confesso was taken against him. Defendants Marsh and LeFever answered, denying any arrangement under which complainants have a right to use the improvements, and they also rely on the fact that they, subsequent to the allowance of the patent, filed a bill against complainants in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan, charging an infringement, and complainants set up in defense the validity of the patent, and put the invention in issue, but did not set up license. This suit was defeated, on the ground that the patent had never been issued and signed and sealed by the proper officer. An appeal was taken by the defendants and also by complainants to the United States Supreme Court, where it is now pending. These appeals are Nos. 641, and 671, October Term, 1886. The present suit was begun before that case was appealed. The state court held that the present suit, not being brought to determine any question arising under the patent laws, but merely to enforce a contract to transfer an inventor's right, is not one in which the courts of the United States have particular jurisdiction, and that as all parties are citizens of Michigan there is nothing to prevent the maintenance of this suit, as complainants are not estopped by the litigation in the United States courts. As defendants had not then obtained a good patent, complainants were not called on to put in any defense which admitted one. And they cannot be deprived of the right to vindicate in another suit such rights as could not have been adequately enforced in that litigation. On the final hearing the state circuit court decreed that defendants should give complainants' written evidence of the right which they had bought and paid for. Scott did not appeal from this decree. Marsh and LeFever appealed. The supreme court affirmed the decree, modifying it so as to require the execution of a release instead of a license by the defendants. This writ of error to the Supreme Court of Michigan was taken by Marsh and LeFever. Scott's name was left out of the writ. Scott claims that the main object of this writ of error is to delay him in his suit with Marsh and LeFever over this question, which he claims to be forever settled by this decree. His position is plainly antagonistic to that of Marsh and LeFever. In his suit against Marsh and LeFever to rescind he desires the license, established according to the decree of the Supreme Court of Michigan, upheld. In this respect he occupies ground almost the same as Nichols, Shepard & Co The decrees are, however, against him; until properly rescinded by a court of competent jurisdiction his interest is subsisting; his election to rescind and his disclaimer therein did not annul his contract of purchase, so as to release him from a decree, but he insists it warrants him in severing himself from Marsh and LeFever in No. 641, and in coming in here to look after his interest, and to show these facts by an attorney of this court other than Mr. Parker, who has up to the time of Scott's election to rescind acted for Scott as well as for Marsh and LeFever. Since that election Mr. Parker could not, therefore, consistently represent Scott as his attorney, either in this litigation or in No. 641, in which Scott has submitted a motion to dismiss.

See opinion in preceding case.

The motion and affidavit are as follows:

And now comes James Scott, by Edward J. Hill, his attorney, and brings here a transcript of the record to which the said plaintiffs in error above named have caused the writ of error issued from this court herein to be directed, together with a copy of the writ; and thereby shows that he is a material and necessary party of record to this cause, and therefore asks that he have leave to file said transcript of record, and be made a party plaintiff in error herein; and that said cause be docketed, and that his appearance may be entered herein; and that the said writ of error be dismissed for want of jurisdiction apparent on the face of the record, or for such other or further order in the premises as may be just and proper.

Dated February 28, 1887.

James Scott,
By Edward J. Hill, his attorney.

Mr. Edward J. Hill, for James Scott:

The decrees of the Circuit Court of Calhoun County, as affirmed, amended, and approved by the Supreme Court of Michigan, are against three defendants; viz., Elon A. Marsh, Minard LeFever, and James Scott; all three, therefore, are necessary parties plaintiff in error.

Simpson v. Greeley, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 152 (22: 338).

The writ may be amended.

Pearson v. Yewdall, 95 U. S. 294 (24: 436); § 1005, R. S.

A glance at the decree of the Circuit Court of Calhoun County, Michigan, of date October 31, 1885, and to the subsequent orders and decrees in this record, is sufficient to show that no federal question was decided. The contract established by these proceedings made by Marsh with Nichols, Shepard & Co., was for an irrevocable license to make, use and vend his device—a right to place it upon all engines of their manufacture, without royalty. This contract was made before any patent was obtained, and is entirely outside the patent laws, therefore, all rights flowing from it, and all remedies relating to it are exclusively within the purview of the jurisdiction of the state tribunals, as the parties to it are citizens of the same State.

Bills to enforce contracts relating to patents have been sustained by the courts of Connecticut and Massachusetts.

Corbin v. Tracy, 34 Conn. 325; Somerby v. Buntin, 118 Mass. 279; Binney v. Annan, 107 Mass. 94; Ely v. McKay, 12 Allen, 328.

In Hartell v. Tilghman, Mr. Justice Miller says, in speaking of the parol license there: "If either party disregards it, it can be specifically enforced against him, or damages can be recovered for its violation."

To maintain such a writ it must appear that a federal question was in fact decided, or that its decision was necessarily involved in the judgment or decree rendered.

Bolling v. Lerner, 91 U. S. 594 (23: 366).

A motion to dismiss may be made in advance of the return of the writ in such a case as this.

Clark v. Hancock, 94 U. S. 493 (24: 146).

Therefore we ask to be made a party, etc., and that the writ of error herein returnable to the next term of this court be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, apparent on the face of the record.

Messrs. R. A. Parker and Don M. Dickinson, for plaintiffs in error:

As the writ of error could only be taken by those parties subject to the jurisdiction of the court of last resort of that State, we submit that it could only have been taken by Marsh and Le Fever, and that the proceedings in the Michigan Court amount to a severance. This must be so, because it appears on the record that Scott could not take out a writ of error from this court to the Supreme Court of Michigan. The case of Simpson v. Greeley, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 152 (22: 338) states that an equivalent to a formal severance is sufficient. We have no objection, however, to James Scott being made a party by an amendment to the writ of error, if this court should think it necessary.

There can be no question but that an action brought in the state court subsequent to an action in a federal court between the same parties, involving the same issue, and which undertakes to restrain the prosecution of the suit in the federal court, involves a federal question.

McKim v. Voorhies, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 279 (3: 342); Freeman v. Howe, 65 U. S. 24 How. 450 (16: 749).

The real point therefore is, will the federal court protect its prior jurisdiction over a litigant and subject matter from interference by the state court?

Clearly it will do so, even if, by the subsequent suit in the state court, a new defense is sought to be availed of when the party was not deprived of it in the federal court by fraud.

See Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 3 (27: 346).

In Dimock v. Revere Copper Co. 117 U. S. 559 (29: 994) it was held that one having in his hands a good defense, and not having presented it when, if ever, he intended to rely upon it as a defense, cannot afterwards set it up in another case.

Clearly in this case there was an attempt to set up and enforce a defense which defendant might have had, and which it did have in the federal court, but which for some reason it has not relied upon there, and therefore it has attempted to deprive this court of its jurisdiction over the matter.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This motion is denied. Although the suit was brought against Marsh, LeFever and Scott, Marsh and LeFever alone answered the bill, and the decree was taken pro confesso against Scott. Marsh and LeFever alone appealed from the Circuit Court of the County to the Supreme Court of the State, and from the decree in that court they alone obtained the allowance of a writ of error to this court. To such a writ Scott cannot make himself a party against the objection of Marsh and LeFever, so as to control the case in this court. [600]

CITY OF EAST ST. LOUIS, Plff. in Err., [600]

v.

UNITED STATES, ex rel. H. AMY & CO.

(See S. C. "East St. Louis v. Amy." Reporter's ed. 600-605.)

Municipal bonds—charter of East St. Louis—effect on, of Constitution of Illinois of 1870—limitation of power to tax, removed—mandamus to compel levy en masse to meet judgment.

1. The Constitution of Illinois of 1870 removed from the charter of the City of East St. Louis the limitation upon the power of the council to tax for the payment of any bonded indebtedness which might thereafter be incurred, and gave authority to levy and collect enough to meet the interest as it fell due, and the principal within twenty years.

2. The constitutional obligation to levy and collect the tax is one that can be enforced by mandamus after judgment caused by a neglect to meet its requirements; and where there is a large accumulation of debt, which should have been paid in installments, the court may order a single levy to meet the entire judgment.

Submitted Jan. 7, 1887. Decided March 14, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Charles W. Thomas, for plaintiff in error:

Mandamus is never awarded unless there is a clear and specific legal right to be enforced against one, burdened with a corresponding clear and specific legal duty.

Supervisors v. U. S. 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 71 (21: 771); Dill. Mun. Corp. § 665.

The most that can be claimed is that the council was required to levy an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest as it accrued, and to provide a sinking fund wherewith to pay the bonds within twenty years. This was a periodical duty, the time of the performance of which was an essential element of its character; and a failure to perform it as required does not create another duty; to wit, one to levy a tax en masse to meet the deficiencies of twenty years. This latter is not the clear and specific legal duty which it is claimed the Constitution imposes.

But the constitutional provision to provide for the collection of a direct annual tax at the time a debt is created is not a command to levy a tax; and ex necessitate rei can have no such construction. It cannot be held to be a then present levy for each of the succeeding twenty years, for this would pro tanto dislocate the whole revenue system of the State as created by the Constitution itself. Nor does it require an annual levy in each year as it arrives, because it is a present duty and not a future one that is imposed. It is consequently not a requirement to levy a tax, but refers to some other proceeding.

State Constitutions, whenever a question arises as to whether they limit or grant power, are universally construed to be limitations, and not grants.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 178.

A specific charter limitation placed upon taxation is not abrogated by any general enactment of the charter claimed for this constitutional provision.

Weber v. Traubel, 95 Ill. 427; State v. Mayor, 23 La. Ann. 358; Supervisors v. U. S. supra.

It having been held that the three mill tax permitted by the charter of East St. Louis is an express limitation upon its taxing power for the purpose of paying its bonded debt (East St. Louis v. Zebley, 110 U. S. 321 (28:162); Weber v. Traubel, 95 Ill. 427), the relators took their bonds with full notice that a special fund was provided for their payment, and they contracted to look to and be satisfied with that fund.

Mr. George A. Sanders, for defendant in error:

Mandamus is the only remedy to compel a municipal corporation to levy a tax to pay a judgment against it.

Louisiana v. Police Jury, 111 U. S. 716 (28: 574); U. S. v. New Orleans, 98 U. S. 381 (25: 225); U. S. v. Fort Scott, 99 U. S. 152 (25:348); Knox County v. Aspinwall, 65 U. S. 7 Wall. 318 (19:79); Wood, Mandamus, 23, 25.

The recitals of the section of the Constitution and the ordinance on the bonds became a part of the contract between the City and the holders of the coupons and bonds that entered into the judgment, and the plaintiff in error is bound by them in this proceeding.

Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S. 445 (24:763); Louisiana v. Police Jury, supra; Hurd, R. S. of Ill. p. 68, § 10; Const. 1870, art. 9; Law v. People, 87 Ill. 385; Pendleton Co. v. Amy, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 305 (20:580); Van Hostrup v. Madison City, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 291 (17:538).

The power to issue the bonds in controversy, and make provisions for the payment of the principal and interest thereon is found in section 12 of article 9 of the Constitution of 1870, and Ordinance No. 300, cited in and printed on the bonds; and the defendant in error cannot be limited in the collection of its judgment obtained on coupons from such bonds to any limiting sections of the city charter.

Corp. 75, and citations; People v. Morris, 13 Wend. 325; Louisiana v. Police Jury, supra; U. S. v. Howard Co. 2 Fed. Rep. 1.

The Constitution of 1870 abrogated and annulled all limitations of the taxing power of the city charter, inconsistent with its terms.

S. 629 (23:630); Commonwealth v. Allegheny Co. 37 Pa. 277.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opin- [601]
ion of the court:

This is a proceeding by mandamus to require the mayor and council of the City of East St. Louis to levy a tax to pay a judgment against the City for $36,495.28 rendered by the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois, in favor of H. Amy & Company, on the 22d of August, 1885. The facts are as follows:

By the charter of the City, which went into effect March 26, 1869, the city council was given authority to borrow money on the credit of the City to an amount not exceeding $100,000, and to issue bonds therefor, but the power of special taxation to pay interest and provide a sinking fund was limited to "three mills on the dollar, upon each annual assessment made for general purposes."

The Constitution of Illinois which took effect August 8, 1870, contains this provision:

Art. IX, section 12. "No county, city, township, school district, or other municipal corporation shall be allowed to become indebted in any manner or for any purpose to an amount, including existing indebtedness, in the aggregate exceeding 5 per centum on the value of the taxable property therein, to be ascertained by the last assessment for state and county taxes, previous to the incurring of such indebtedness. Any county, city, school district, or other municipal corporation, incurring any indebtedness as aforesaid, shall before, or at the time of doing so, provide for the collection of a direct annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on such a debt as it falls due, and also to pay and discharge the principal thereof within twenty years from the time of contracting the same. * * *"

With this in force the city council of East [602]
St. Louis passed three ordinances to borrow money and issue bonds therefor. In each ordinance provision was made for the levy and collection of a special annual tax sufficient to meet the interest and the principal as they respectively fell due. The judgment in favor of

Amy & Co. was for interest on these issues of bonds, and the principal of one bond which had become due. The controversy in this proceeding is as to the amount of tax the council is authorized to levy for the payment of this judgment. The three mills tax provided for in the charter has been regularly levied and collected, and the City claims this to be the extent of its corporate power in that behalf. The court, however, was of opinion that, for all bonded indebtedness incurred after the Constitution of 1870 went into effect, it was the duty of the City to levy and collect a direct annual tax sufficient to pay both the interest and the principal as it fell due; and as this had not been done, an order was made requiring the levy and collection of "a special tax upon all taxable property of said City for the year 1886 sufficient in amount to pay" the judgment in full. To reverse that order this writ of error was brought.

The points presented for decision are: 1, whether the Constitution of 1870 abrogated that part of the charter which limited the power of the City to tax for the payment of its bonded debt incurred after that Constitution went into effect; and 2, if it did, whether the court could "compel a levy en masse to pay the whole debt and interest, when the Constitution only required the council to provide for the collection of an annual tax to pay the interest as it falls due and the principal within twenty years."

In our opinion the Constitution removed from the charter the limitation upon the power of the council to tax for the payment of any bonded indebtedness which might thereafter be incurred, and gave authority to levy and collect enough to meet the interest as it fell due, and the principal within twenty years. It gave no new power to incur a debt. That had been given by the charter itself, to the extent of $100,000. There is here no question as to a limitation of this power by the provision that [603] the bonded debt shall not exceed in the aggregate 5 per centum on the value of the taxable property, for no excess of issue has been suggested.

The principle on which this decision rests is the same as that acted on in Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370 [26: 567], where this court held that the Fifteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, of itself, and without any action by the State, rendered inoperative a provision of the Constitution of Delaware, which limited the right of suffrage to the white race, and this accorded with the opinion of the Supreme Court of the State in the same case.

Undoubtedly a State Constitution is in a sense a limitation on the powers of the State Government. It is the act of the people establishing the fundamental law for their own government as members of a political community, known as a State of the United States, and it fixes the powers of that government. But this does not imply that the people cannot in such a fundamental law regulate as they please the powers of the political subdivisions or municipal corporations of the State. Such a regulation, if made, would operate as a limitation on the legislative power of the State Government over the subject, but it would form part of the fundamental law of the locality to which it applied.

In this case the Constitution limited the power of the Legislature of Illinois in respect to the grant of authority to municipal corporations to incur debts, but it declared in express terms that if a debt was incurred under such authority the corporation should provide for its payment by the levy and collection of a direct annual tax sufficient for that purpose. Under this provision of the Constitution, no municipal corporation could incur a debt without legislative authority, express or implied; but the grant of authority carried with it the constitutional obligation to levy and collect a sufficient annual tax to pay the interest as it matured and the principal within twenty years. This provision for the tax was written by the Constitution into every law passed thereafter by the Legislature allowing a debt to be incurred; and, in our opinion, it took the place in existing laws of all provisions for taxation to pay debts thereafter incurred under old authority which were inconsistent with its requirements. It [604] was made by the people a part of the fundamental law of the State that every debt incurred thereafter by a municipal corporation, under the authority of law, should carry with it the constitutional obligation of the municipality to levy and collect all the necessary taxes required for its payment.

It only remains to consider the objection that a tax cannot now be levied sufficient in amount to pay the entire judgment at once. The judgment is for interest in arrear and a small amount of principal. The law required a tax to be levied annually sufficient to pay all interest as it accrued and the principal when due. This was neglected, and consequently there is now a large accumulation of a debt which ought to have been paid in installments. Thus far the inhabitants have been allowed to escape taxation at the times it ought to have been laid, and to which they were under constitutional obligations to submit. The accumulation of the debt was caused by their own neglect as members of the political community which had incurred the obligation. Such being the case, we see no reason why it was not in the power of the court to order a single levy to meet the entire judgment which was all for past due obligations. Whether such a tax would be so oppressive as to make it proper not to have it all collected at one time was a question resting in the sound discretion of the court in ordering the collection. There is nothing here to show that there ought to have been a division.

The constitutional obligation of the City was not fully met by providing, when the debt was incurred, for the levy and collection of the necessary tax. It required as well the actual levy and collection when needed to pay the debt. This is an obligation that can be enforced by mandamus after judgment caused by a neglect to meet its requirements.

We see nothing in Weber v. Traubel, 95 Ill. 427, to the contrary of what is here decided. In that case there was no question of power to levy a tax beyond the one per cent allowed by the charter to pay debts incurred under the authority of law after the Constitution of 1870, and for the payment of which by means of taxation provision had been made as specially required by that Constitution. The precise [605] point there determined was that the three mills tax provided by the charter for the payment of the bonded debt, and the one mill tax for the "Library Fund," under the Act of 1874, were parts of the one per cent allowed by the charter, and not additions to it. Here, however, the tax is in accordance with the special provision made to pay a new debt lawfully incurred, and to meet the requirements of the Constitution in its regulation of the conduct of municipal corporations in such matters. This is a tax which the Corporation under the operation of the Constitution contracted with the bondholders to levy and collect to meet its liabilities on the bonds, and it is not necessarily limited to the three mills or the 1 per cent of the charter.

Neither does the claim of the City find support in the case of East St. Louis v. Zebley, 110 U. S. 321 [28: 162]. There the question was whether the court could compel the City to set apart any more than three out of the ten mills charter tax to pay the bonded debt, and we held that it could not. No point was made as to the power of the City to levy more than a ten mills tax, and it did not appear that the debt then in question was incurred after the Constitution of 1870.

Judgment affirmed.

EDWARD ROSS AND INTERNATIONAL & GREAT NORTHERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 605–630.)

*Mexican grants—action of trespass to try title to land—*testimonio extending title to Juan Gonzales, admissible in evidence—numerous objections considered and held insufficient—regularity of official acts, presumed—waiver of forfeiture.

In an action brought by plaintiffs in error to try the title to a large tract of land situate in Kinney County, Texas, it is held:

1. That the Act of the Congress of Coahuila and Texas, of April 28, 1832, under which the grant to plaintiffs' ancestor was made, although repealed and supplied by the Act of March 24, 1834, applied to the grant in question; the presumption being, under the circumstances disclosed, that the latter Act had not been promulgated at the Village of Dolores on April 18, 1834, when the testimonio extending title to said Gonzales was there executed.
2. That the commissioner of the Beales and Grant Colony, who executed said testimonio, was the one intended by the grant.
3. That the official acts of said commissioner, having been accepted and acquiesced in by the government, must be considered as valid, even if done by him only as commissioner de facto.
4. That in 1834 the State of Coahuila and the department of Monclova extended eastwardly as far as the River Nueces, at least, and included the premises in question.
5. That the mere date of the testimonio is not sufficient under the circumstances to make it invalid, on the ground that the period of eighteen months, limited by the Act of 1832 for reducing the grant to possession, had expired two days prior to said date, especially as the law makes the delivery of possession after the eighteen months only a ground of forfeiture which the government might waive by accepting and acquiescing in the commissioner's acts.
6. That the testimonio sufficiently connects itself with the original concession.
7. That no petition or order was necessary to have the grant extended in possession, power and authority being given to the commissioner to extend it by the grant itself.
8. That an objection to the testimonio because not written on stamped paper does not go to its validity, and that its execution was sufficiently proved.
9. That the testimonio was sufficient in form; that it contained all the requisites necessary to invest Gonzales with title in the land delivered to him; and that the description of the land was sufficient.
10. That objections based on the alleged nonfulfillment of the conditions of the grant, the absence of a protocol, or matrix, of the concession or testimonio from the archives of the land-office, and the failure to record the testimonio in the proper county within the proper time, can only be set up by way of defense, and not as objections to the admission of the plaintiffs' evidence.
11. That if a forfeiture for nonpayment, or other condition subsequent, can be availed of by a private person, it can only be after he has shown some right to the land in himself derived from the sovereignty of the soil.
12. That the laws of Texas, prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1876, did not require that a title should be registered in the county, or deposited among the archives of the land-office, to give it validity.
13. That it cannot be assumed either that the plaintiffs' muniments of title were not on file among the archives of the land-office, or that the taxes on the lands have not been paid, or that Gonzales and those claiming under him did not continue in possession of the land after possession was delivered to him by the commissioner in 1834.
14. That all favorable presumptions will be made against the forfeiture of the grant.
15. That the acts of a public officer in the discharge of a public duty are presumed regular.
16. That on the whole this court is of opinion that the commissioner had authority to extend the title in question, or, at least, that his official acts were acquiesced in by the government, and are to be considered as valid.

Submitted Nov. 2, 1886. Decided March 14, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas. Reversed.

The history, facts and case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. H. E. Barnard, for plaintiffs in error:

The testimonio of possession tendered was complete evidence of the final title; and when issued gave to the grantee, Juan Gonzales, the ancestor of plaintiffs, a perfect title; and it must be presumed that the officer extending the title acted within his authority, and that all acts done prior to his were regularly and legally done.

Hunnicutt v. Peyton, 102 U. S. 359 (26: 117); U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. 31 U. S. 729, 780 (8: 561); U. S. v. Peralta, 60 U. S. 19 How. 343 (15: 678), U. S. v. Clarke, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 436 (8: 1001); Hancock v. McKinney, 7 Tex. 442; Nicholson v. Horton, 23 Tex. 47; Jenkins v. Chambers, 9 Tex. 167; Hanrick v. Jackson, 55 Tex. 17.

Testimonios of public acts done under the former government are receivable as evidence in all respects as originals.

Herndon v. Casiano, 7 Tex. 322.

The petition and concession received in evidence upon the trial without objection, taken with the testimonio, showed a perfect legal title to the land and completely segregated the land described therein from the public domain.

Graham v. U. S. 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 261 (18: 333); Hunnicut v. Peyton, supra; Malarin v. U. S. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 289 (17: 595); Hancock v. McKinney, supra.

The juridicial possession, evidenced by the testimonio offered, when delivered to the grantee, Juan Gonzales, was an ascertainment of the boundaries of the land granted. It was executed by the proper officer of the government specially designated for that purpose, and had all the force and efficacy of a judicial determination or judgment.

U. S. v. Pico, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 536 (18: 695).

The ancestor having been put in actual possession, it is presumed that he remained in possession during his life, and that his heirs assumed and continued his possession until the contrary is shown. Constructive possession, which follows every formal legal title, is all that is necessary; and one's title to land in law draws to it the possession which remains with the owner of the fee, until some hostile act amounting in law to an act of ouster destroys the character of his and their possession.

Murphy v. Welder, 58 Tex. 236.

The reasons stated in the third objection are all matters of defense. The officer having acted, it will be presumed that he acted within his authority. This has been the presumption always indulged in, in Texas concerning the validity of the acts of the officers of the former government. Besides, the authority of Fortunato Soto was proven upon the trial.

Hanrick v. Jackson, 55 Tex. 17, 27; Hancock v. McKinney, 7 Tex. 384; Ruis v. Chambers, 15 Tex. 590; Hatch v. Dunn, 11 Tex. 717, 718; Holliman v. Peebles, 1 Tex. 709.

The constitutional article in objection fifteenth is prematurely invoked, from the fact that the law, at the stage of the trial when this testimonio was offered, presumed due and legal archiving of the title, and that the protocol or matrix was in the general land-office, and the testimonio was duly recorded. The defendants must refute this by proof before they can call to their aid the judicial sentence contained in the thirteenth article of the present Constitution of Texas. That article, were it timely to consider it, would be found in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, because it impairs the obligation of contracts.

Edwards v. Kearzey, 96 U. S. 595, 608 (24: 793, 797); White v. Hart, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 646, 651 (20: 685, 687); Curran v. Arkansas, 56 U. S. 15 How. 304 (14: 705); Boyce v. Tabb, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 548 (21: 757); Walker v. Whitehead, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 314 (21: 357); Cooley, Const. Lim. 289.

Messrs. C. W. Ogden and Bethel Coopwood, for defendants in error:

The instrument offered was therefore void for want of authority, and was properly rejected by the court.

Buyck v. U. S. 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 215 (10: 715); O'Hara v. U. S. Id. 275 (10: 787); U. S. v. Delespine, Id. 226 (10: 719); U. S. v. Wiggins, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 334 (10: 481); U. S. v. Kingsley, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 476 (9: 1163); Hancock v. McKinney, 7 Tex. 447–459; Paschal v. Perez, 7 Tex. 366; Edwards v. James, 7 Tex. 372; McMullen v. Hodge, 5 Tex. 79; Hosner v. De Young, 1 Tex. 769–770; Holliman v. Peebles, 1 Tex. 702.

This concession was the same character of grant as those in Louisiana and Florida, which have so often been passed upon by this court, and have been held to pass no interests, either legal or equitable, in the land, and to be "a naked authority or permission and nothing more.

Fremont v. U. S. 58 U. S. 17 How. 555 (15: 245); De Vilemont v. U. S. 54 U. S. 13 How. 266 (14: 139).

The presumption that officers have done their duty cannot supply proof of a substantive fact, and such presumptions are inadmissible, where the act of an officer appears to be in violation of the well ascertained law of the land.

U. S. v. Ross, 92 U. S. 281 (23: 707); Holliman v. Peebles, 1 Tex. 699; Stoddard v. Chambers, 43 U. S. 2 How. 318 [11: 288]; Polk's Lessee v. Wendal, 18 U. S. 9 Cranch, 87 (3: 665).

[607] Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass to try title, brought by the heirs of Juan Gonzales against the International and Great Northern Railroad Company and their tenant in possession (Ross), to recover eleven leagues of land situate in Kinney County, Texas, adjoining the Rio Grande. The defendants pleaded not guilty, and title from the sovereignty of the soil. At the trial a jury was waived, and the court found the facts specially (which are set out in a bill of exceptions), and rendered judgment for the defendants. The judgment is based upon the failure of the plaintiffs to make out their title; and their failure to make title arose from the court's overruling and rejecting the testimony offered by the plaintiffs as evidence of the extension of title to their ancestor, Juan Gonzales.

The court found and decided that the plaintiff had shown an application for, and concession of, eleven leagues of land in the name of Juan Gonzales, in the State of Coahuila and Texas, and gave the purport of the documents showing the same, being an exemplification of [608] the original in the archives of the Government of Coahuila, at Saltillo. These documents were in Spanish, accompanied by a verified translation. They were exemplified under date of August 20, 1874, and had been duly recorded in the clerk's office in the records of Kinney County on the 8th of February, 1878, as appeared by the clerk's certificate thereon.

The application of Gonzales, as translated, was as follows, to wit:

"To His Excel'cy: The citizen Juan Gonzales, before Your Excel'y, with greatest respect, states:

That in accordance with the provisions of the law of colonization of the State Your Excel'cy will please grant me the sale of eleven sitios of land of those vacant lands of the department of Monclova and places by me designated, promising to introduce in them the number of stock required by the same law and paying the value, delivering at once the fourth part of the same and binding myself to fulfill all requirements of the same law. Praying Your Excel'y will grant this petition as requested, will receive grace and justice.

"JUAN GONZALES."

The grant, bearing date Leona Vicario, October 16, 1832, was attached to the application, and was in the name of the Governor in the usual form, and, as translated, was as follows:

"In accordance to article 18 of the new law of colonization enacted by the honorable Congress of the State, April 28, 1832, I grant the sale to petitioner of the eleven sitios of land prayed for at the place designated by him, provided that they shall be all in one tract and not under any title belonging to any corporation or person whatsoever.

"The commissioner for the division of lands in the enterprise to which corresponds the one which petitioner solicits, and in his default, or in case there is none, or not being engaged in any other enterprise, the alcalde 1st, or the only one acting of the respective municipality or the nearest one, complying with order given in the [609] matter, will place him in possession of the said sitios, and will extend the corresponding title to the same, first classifying the quality of said lands, so as to be able to state the amount to be paid the State, which payment must first be paid by the interested party in the manner and terms specified in the last part of said article 13, making the payment at once as provided by this article, in the treasury of the State, receipt of which he will present to the secretary, so that the secretary, upon sight of it, will proceed to give interested party copy of his petition, with which he will go to the commissioner and have its requirements complied with.

ECA Y MUSQUIZ. (One rubric.)
SANTIAGO DEL VALLE, Secretary. (One rubric.)"

The court next found as follows:

"Second. That Fortunato Soto was duly appointed by the proper authority of the State of Coahuila and Texas, as commissioner to extend titles in the Colony contracted for by Juan Carlos Beales and Diego Grant. That his commission of authority was dated March 18, 1834, and was signed by Francisco Vidan'n'y Vallestefior, the then Governor of the State of Coahuila and Texas, and by J. Mijuel Falcon, the then Secretary of State of Coahuila and Texas.

"Third. The plaintiffs are the legal heirs of Juan Gonzales, the beneficiary and grantee of the concession referred to in decision number one, above set forth.

"Fourth. That defendants are in possession of the land described in plaintiff's petition.

"Fifth. That the boundaries of the colony contracted for by Juan Carlos Beales and Diego Grant are shown by the following * * * contract of colonization entered into with the citizen Diego Grant and D'n Juan Carlos Beales as empresarios to introduce 800 families in the vacant lands of the State."

The contract referred to between the Government of Coahuila and Texas and Juan Carlos Beales and Diego Grant, is then set out in full, the application bearing date October 5, 1832, and the concession October 9, 1832. It [610] included, first, a grant for the whole territory lying between the Rio Grande and Nueces Rivers, and bounded south by the State of Tamaulipas, and north by the 29th parallel of latitude; secondly, a grant of a tract formerly granted to Woodbury and Vehlein, and subject to their right to colonize 200 families, embracing a territory over 200 miles in length, bounded north by the 32d parallel of latitude, south by the old road leading from Rio Grande to Bexar, west by the 100th degree of west longitude, and east by other grants in the interior of Texas. The first tract adjoins the southwest corner of the second; and Kinney County, in which the lands in question are situated lies in the angle between the two tracts, but outside of both. The 9th article of the concession to Beales and Grant has the following provision: "This Colony shall be regulated and their lands divided by a commissioner of the government, who in proper time will be appointed, and will discharge his duties in accordance with the laws and instructions that for said officials have been approved by the honorable Congress."

The bill of exceptions then exhibits two maps given in evidence by the plaintiffs, certified by the Secretary of State of the United States, one being a copy taken from Disturnell's map of the United Mexican States, published in 1847, and deposited with the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, 1848; the other showing the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, as laid down in Melish's map published in 1818, and agreed to in the Treaty of January 12, 1828. These maps show that the Province of Texas did not then embrace any territory west of the river Nueces.

In view of this evidence and the findings of the court thereon, the plaintiffs then offered in evidence a paper purporting to be a testimonio, with formal and sufficient proof of its execution, by which testimonio it appeared that in April, 1834, the possessory title of the land in controversy was extended to Juan Gonzales, the ancestor of the plaintiffs, by Fortunato Soto, commissioner for the State in the Colony of Rio Grande. This paper was in the Spanish language, and, together with the authentications and translation thereof, had been recorded in the clerk's office of Kinney County on the 21st of June, 1878, as appears by the clerk's certificate thereon. The following is a copy [611] of the said document as translated, to wit:

"In the Village of Dolores, State of Coahuila, Texas, on the 18th day of the month of April, 1834, I, the citizen Fortunato Soto, as commissioner for the supr. government of the State in the Colony of the Rio Grande, and in compliance with the contract (celebrated) (entered into) between said government and the citizen Juan Gonzales, and in accordance with the requirements and stipulations which the law provides in this matter, I extend the present title, in the name of the government and in accordance with the provision in its superior decree of the 16th of October, 1832, contained in the aforesaid contract, to the citizen Juan Carlo Beales, as attorney of the said citizen Juan Gonzales, which power of attorney he presented, of the eleven sitios of land to which said contract has reference, which said lands in their actual state I have classed as pasture lands, and which said boundaries are: Commencing from the place where the boundary line of the property of Doña Dolores Soto de Beales forms an angle between south and west, a line will be drawn to the south prolonging in the same direction, which will there terminate the said section at a distance of thirteen thousand seven hundred and fifty varas; from whence another line will be drawn in a right angle, which, crossing the arroyo (creek) of Piedra Pinto, will have the length of twenty thousand varas; and from this point another line will be drawn towards the north parallel with the first and of the same length, and ends with another line to the east that, crossing the same arroyo (creek), will extend up to the place of beginning; so that in all form and right he, the said citizen Juan Gonzales, may at all times prove his rights to the said eleven sitios of land, I went with his attorney, citizen Juan Carlos Beales, which, after being surveyed by the surveyor, C. Guillo Egerton, I put him in possession, and, taking him by the right hand, and in the name of the supreme government of the State, walked him over the said eleven sitios of land, and caused him to perform all the other ceremonies, as provided by the laws in this case of real possession, being witnesses the citizens [612] Eduardo Little, Enrique Brown, and George Colwell, beside those of my assistance, all residents of the village, who for the validity of it, signed with me and the interested party, said day, month, and year, pledging himself to replace the proper paper with the seal that is required, not having at present any of the seal in this village nor its surroundings.

"The citizen, Fortunato Soto, Commissioner for the Supreme Government of the State of Coahuila and Texas in this Colony, certify that the preceding testimonio is a literal copy legally taken from its original, which is of record in the proper book of these archives, and in compliance with article 8 of the instructions of the 25th of April, 1830, I give the present to the interested party as title, which is given on common paper, not having any of the proper seal, and for the validity of the same I signed it with the assisting witnesses in said village the 18th of April, 1834.

To the introduction of this paper the defendants objected for the following reasons:

1. It has not been proved and recorded according to law, and its registration was not authorized by law when it pretends to have been recorded. No protocol or matrix of it has been shown ever to have been filed in the archives of the General Land-Office, and no such is or ever was an archive of such office; no possession of the land claimed by anyone holding under it has been shown; no payment of taxes thereon by plaintiffs, or anyone for them, has [613] been shown; no compliance with or fulfillment of the conditions of the law under which it purports to have been issued has been or attempted to be proved; and if it ever had any validity, it appears from the face thereof that it is such a claim as was never perfected, but wholly abandoned, and the land remitted to the public domain, and that it is a stale demand and void.

2. It does not contain and is not based upon any executive grant, concession, or primitive title; nor does it contain any petition or application of the pretended grantee for a concession or for a survey of the land or the execution of final title of possession, nor any order referring it to the empresario order of survey, surveyor's field notes, or other constituent element of an espediente of final title, nor apt words to express a grant of land from the State by way of sale as required by law at its date; but it purports to be a kind of grant unknown to and not authorized by such law, and it appears therefrom that the same issued without authority of and against law.

3. It purports to have been issued by one unknown to the law, claiming to exercise the powers and perform the functions of an office not then existing, but the existence, powers, and jurisdiction whereof had already been repealed, styling himself commissioner of a colony not shown to have existed, and which, it is well known, never did exist; and it is claimed to be title embracing and relating to land situated in Kinney County, as averred in the petition, which is well known to have been embraced within the Woodbury Colony district at the date it bears, for which Colony the person purporting to have issued it was not, and does not by the terms of the instrument pretend to have been, a commissioner or officer.

4. It appears therefrom that its matrix or protocol, if it is in fact a testimonio of such, contained no executive concession or petition for such; no petition or application for a survey of the land, nor for the execution of final title; no reference to the empresario order of survey nor surveyor's field notes, and no one of the requisite antecedent steps, papers, documents, or acts entering into and forming the espediente of a valid final title or grant under the law in force when and where it purports to have been issued; none of which can be established by parol.

5. It does not express any consideration paid, [614] or to be paid, or conditions to be performed or required by law.

6. It purports to have been executed pursuant to a contract stated to have been ratified with the executive, while the only one so to be ratified was that of an empresario.

7. It pretends to be an absolute grant in fee, which was not authorized or contemplated by the law.

8. If the contract it refers to was an executive concession by way of sale, this instrument shows it to have been forfeited under the law, and constituting no authority for the execution of this paper on the 18th of April, 1834.

9. It has vices before the law, and is defective in manner and form, using bad grammar, awkward construction, and a form and style diverse from the usual general practice, and contains unaccustomed clauses without any reason therefor.

10. It is not written upon sealed or stamped paper, as required by law, nor upon paper validated by the proper offices of the municipality or any other; and its execution has not been proved, and no attempt has been made to show that the persons purporting to have signed it did so when and where it bears date or in the capacity therein stated.

11. It was never registered as required by law, under the former Government of Coahuila and Texas, nor under the Republic or State of Texas; it was never presented nor any payment on it made to the collector of the former government, nor to any officer of the Republic or State of Texas; it was never presented to either of the commissions established by law to investigate titles to land in the section of the State where the demanded premises are situate, nor was it ever brought forward or set up as a claim to land till more than forty years after its date, and now only with the greatest want of verisimilitude in the matters it contains and expresses.

12. It attempts to conceal the fact that the land, if it relates to the demanded premises, was at its date embraced within a Colony for which the one purporting to have executed it did not by its terms pretend to be a commissioner or officer, and falsely claims to have been issued in and by the commissioner of a colony which never existed.

[615] 13. It has no receipt for any installment of the purchase money written out at the bottom of it, as required by law, nor has any attempt been made to prove such payment.

14. It is incompetent and irrelevant, and shows upon its face that it is not a subject of judicial cognizance, and it does not describe or identify the demanded premises, but is void for want of certainty.

15. It is prohibited from being used in evidence by the thirteenth article of the Constitution of Texas; and if it ever had any validity it is stale and forfeited, and the land to which it relates was reunited to the public domain by legislative equivalent for reunion by office found.

The bill of exceptions states that the court sustained the said objections, and refused to admit the said document in evidence, mainly on the ground that the same was issued without authority of law, the law and instructions under which the commissioner pretended to act having been repealed prior to the execution thereof; to which ruling rejecting said documents plaintiffs, by counsel, excepted.

The court thereupon rendered judgment for the defendants.

We will first consider the main reason assigned by the court below for rejecting the evidence offered; namely, that the law and instructions under which the commissioner pretended to act had been repealed prior to the execution thereof. The law under which the grant was made to Juan Gonzales, and under which the commissioner acted in extending the title, was that passed by the Congress of Coahuila and Texas, April 28, 1832. This law, it is true, was repealed and supplied by an Act of Congress passed at the City of Monclova, March 26, 1834, and the testimonio offered in evidence is dated at the Village of Dolores, April 18, 1834, some three weeks afterwards. But the laws of the Mexican States did not take effect in any part of the country until they were promulgated there; and as Dolores was situated in the present County of Kinney, about 200 miles from Monclova, and probably much more than that as the roads there ran, and as the means of communication in that region at that time were difficult and dilatory, it is not probable that the Act of March 26 was promulgated at Dolores prior to the 18th of April. Besides, the commissioner was a public officer, having a public [616] duty to perform, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption would be that he acted in accordance with the law as known at the time. This presumption is strengthened by the language of another Act passed in the same session of the Congress, on the 3d of May, 1834, which declared that certain favorable terms as to the price of lands, proffered by a Law of 1830, should "be understood only in respect to the price of lands acquired until (hasta) the publication of the decree of 26th of March of this year," implying, it would seem, that the law of the 26th of March had not yet been published. Looking at the matter in every point of view, we think the presumption is that this Act, which was the repealing Act referred to, had not been promulgated at Dolores, or in that vicinity, when the commissioner extended the title of possession to Gonzales.

In the case of Houston v. Robertson, 2 Tex. 1, 28, Chief Justice Hemphill, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The question then is as to the time at which the contract with Robertson ceased to exist. The annulling decree was enacted in May, 1835, and by its terms no date was fixed for its operative force and effect. The date of the publication of the law not being proven, the period of taking effect is a matter of presumption. * * * Under the former governments it was an undoubted principle that laws were of no binding obligation until after they were duly promulgated. L. 1, Tit. 2, Book 3, Recop. Novisima. The form of publishing decrees by the Executive, is prescribed in Decree 8, of the Constituent Congress of the State of Coahuila and Texas, p. 6. These decrees were transmitted to the inferior authorities, and by them published in their respective jurisdictions. * * * There was no specified period for the promulgation of the laws, nor for their going into operation, in proportion to the distance from the seat of government. The presumption would generally be in favor of the publication after a lapse of a reasonable time for its transmission from the capital; but from the peculiar circumstances of this case, we do not think that the decree ought to be enforced against the petitioner until the period of closing the land-office." In that case the decree [617] or Act referred to was passed 18th May, 1835, and the land-offices were not closed until the first of November—more than five months afterwards. It is true, the country was in an unsettled state at that time; and this may have been one reason why the court held that there was no presumption that the law had been promulgated. The principle enunciated, however, is applicable to the present case, and leaves little room for hesitation as to the nonpromulgation of the law under consideration at Dolores within three weeks or thereabouts after its passage.

Besides this, although the Act of 26th March, 1834, created a new system of disposing of the public lands, and repealed the Act of 1832, it did not abrogate the grants and sales which had been made under it; nor did it abolish the office and functions of commissioners, necessary for extending such grants.

But another objection raised to the authority of the commissioner was, that he was only constituted such for the Colony of Beales and Grant. This is true. But the grant for that Colony comprised a territory of 20,000 square miles, and embraced in its southwest angle (though it did not include) the present County of Kinney; and we know from cotemporary history that a large addition was made to it on the west, including portions of Kinney County, by means of large grants made to individuals and transferred to the Rio Grande and Texas Land Company, which became the proprietors of the entire Colony. Indeed, this very grant of Gonzales was published as one of their accessions. The fact that Juan Carlos Beales himself was the attorney who received the possession of the Gonzales tract is corroborative of this fact. But, be this as it may, it was a matter of public notoriety that Beales and Grant, or the association which they formed, made large additions to their original grant in the country lying immediately west of the Woodbury and Vehlein tract, so that it must have nearly encompassed the premises in question. In Yoakum's History of Texas, Vol. 1, p. 317, we find the following notice of the Colony: "During the latter part of [618] the year 1833 began the settlement of the Colony of Beales and Grant. They had obtained a concession for 800 families to be located between the Rio Grande and the Nueces. In the last days of December, about sixty colonists, under Mr. Beales, reached the new settlement, and laid off the Town of Dolores, on Las Moras, a small stream about ten feet wide and two feet deep. They remained there about a year, when they dispersed." The affidavits annexed to the original testimonio offered in evidence, state that the town was destroyed by fire in 1836. Now Dolores was situated in the southern part of the present County of Kinney, several miles west of the Woodbury and Vehlein grant, and north of the first tract described in the concession to Beales and Grant, thus showing that the Colony was extended beyond the limits of those grants prior to 1834. In the certificate of the United States Consul at Matamoras, dated October 16, 1835, and annexed to the original testimonio, it is called the Colony of Dolores. In cotemporary documents it was sometimes called the Colony of Rio Grande, and sometimes the Beales 'River grant.' It is called the Rio Grande grant in Beales' Diary, inserted in Kennedy's History of Texas, Vol. 2, page 47. It will be observed that the grant to Gonzales was made directly after that to Beales and Grant, the latter being dated the 9th and the former the 16th of October, 1832. It is also evident that Gonzales indicated to the Governor the region in which he intended to locate his grant; namely, in the immediate neighborhood of the territory ceded to Beales and Grant. His application says: "Your Excellency will please grant me the sale of eleven sitios of land of those vacant lands of the department of Monclova, and places by me designated." The words of the grant are: "I grant the sale to the petitioner of the eleven sitios of land prayed for at the place designated by him, provided that they shall be all in one tract and not under any title belonging to any corporation or person whatsoever." So that it was undoubtedly understood where, in general terms, the land was to be located. The grant then proceeds to designate the commissioner who should locate the land and extend the title, as follows: "The commissioner for the division of lands in the enterprise to which corre- [619] sponds the one which petitioner solicits, and in his default, or in case there is none, or not being engaged in any other enterprise, the alcalde 1st, [that is the first alcalde,] or the only one acting, of the respective municipality." Now, what commissioner was meant, or could be meant, but the commissioner of the Beales and Grant Colony?—probably the only Colony within a hundred miles. It is not said, "the commissioner for the enterprise in which the lands lie," but "the commissioner for the enterprise to which corresponds the one which petitioner solicits." From all the circumstances taken together, it is obvious to us that the commissioner of the Beales and Grant Colony was the very one intended. We have only the translation of the grant before us, which is somewhat awkwardly expressed; but, according to that (which is our only guide), we think it was not the commissioner of the enterprise in which the lands were to be located (for as understood by the parties, they were not to be located in any existing enterprise), but the commissioner of the neighboring enterprise, that was intended to be designated. There was no other enterprise in that region, at least as far as we know.

A strong circumstance in favor of this conclusion is the fact that Soto's official acts as commissioner, in this case, were never repudiated by the government; on the contrary his protocol was received and deposited in the public archives, where it still remains. His official acts, accepted and acquiesced in by the government, must be considered as valid, even if done by him only as a commissioner de facto.

The pretense that Soto designates himself in the testimonio as commissioner in the Colony of Rio Grande, and that no such Colony is known to have existed, is too frivolous to deserve serious attention. It is well known, as already stated, that the Colony was designated by various names, "Rio Grande," among the rest, and Soto was well and publicly known as the commissioner thereof. It was the first great Colony attempted to be established in Coahuila and Texas on the Rio Grande, and nothing was more natural than to call it by that name. Besides, it was situated in the old district of Rio [620]
Grande, which was afterwards annexed to the department of Monclova, as hereafter stated.

The criticism of the defendants in error, that it was not shown that the lands in question were in the department of Monclova, is not well founded. In the first place, it will be presumed that they were situated in that department if nothing is shown to the contrary. The public official who extended the lands must be presumed to have extended them in the proper department. But there cannot be any doubt that they were situated in the department of Monclova. Prior to the Constitution of March 11, 1827, the State of Coahuila and Texas was divided into five districts or departments, Saltillo, Parras, Monclova, Texas and Rio Grande; * but by that instrument (art. 7), it was declared that "For the better administration thereof, the territory of the State shall for the present be divided into three departments, as follows, viz.: "Bexar, embracing all the territory corresponding to what was called the Province of Texas, which shall form one sole district; Monclova, consisting of the district of the same name and that of Rio Grande; Saltillo, comprehending the district of the same name and that of Parras."† Power was given to the Congress to alter and modify this division. We find only the following laws of the Congress on the subject: First, a law passed January 31, 1831, setting off a new district from the eastern part of Bexar, to be called the District of Nacogdoches; ‡ Secondly, a law passed in April, 1833, declaring that the District of Saltillo should constitute a sole department by itself; and that the District of Parras should constitute another separate department; § Thirdly, a law passed 18th March, 1834, dividing the State into seven departments or districts, to wit: Bexar, Brazos, Guerrero, Monclova, Nacogdoches, Parras, and Saltillo. Article 2 declared that in the section denominated Coahuila the limits and capital towns of each shall be the same as heretofore. Article 3 created Brazos from the eastern part of Bexar. By article 4 the limits of the department of Nacogdoches were continued as before. The boundaries of [621] Guerrero are not given.‖ This shows that no alteration was made in the limits of the departments in Coahuila. Saltillo and Parras were in the southern part of Coahuila, and Monclova comprised the northern part, and joined the department of Bexar, which (as shown above) corresponded with the old Province of Texas. This makes it certain that the department of Monclova included the lands in question; for the old boundary between Coahuila and Texas was situated over 100 miles east of the Rio Grande; and the northern boundary of Tamaulipas, which joined Coahuila on the southeast, and also separated the Province of Texas from the Rio Grande, was some 70 or 80 miles southeast of the County of Kinney. Captain Pike, who traversed the country from Chihuahua to Texas in 1807, passing through Coahuila and the center of the first tract described in Beales and Grant's purchase, and who was very minute and particular in his observations, locates the exact boundary between Coahuila and Texas at that time. After describing his passage of the Rio Grande near Presidio, and four days' travel from thence northeastwardly, a distance, in all, of 186 miles, he gives the following account of his fifth day's journey: 7th June, Sunday.—Came on 15 miles to the River Mariano [now Medina], the line between Texas and Coqquilla [Coahuila]—a pretty little stream, Rancho. From thence in the afternoon to Saint Antonio."* Other authorities also state that the Medina was the old boundary between Coahuila and Texas. At a later date, perhaps in virtue of some law not published in the general collection of laws, Texas seems to have been extended to the River Nueces. It is so laid down on several maps;¶ and Hon. David G. Burnet, a resident of Texas long before its independence, and afterwards first President of the Republic, in a letter written in November, 1830, and published at the time, after stating that Texas in its most extensive acceptation was bounded by the Rio Grande, says: "This definition, however, is not in strict accordance with the political organization of the country, as the State of Tamaulipas and the department of Coahuila both cross the Rio Grande, making the Nueces strictly the western limit." (See also speech of Mr. Benton in [622] the U. S. Senate, May 16, 1844.) There can be no doubt, therefore, that in 1834 the State of Coahuila and the department of Monclova extended eastwardly as far as the River Nueces, at least, and consequently included the premises in question.

Another objection to the authority of the commissioner to extend the title in controversy was that the time limited by the Act of 1832 for reducing the grant to possession had expired. The 16th article of the law declares that purchasers shall enter into possession of the land acquired within eighteen months from the ratification of the contract, under penalty of forfeiture for the nonfulfillment thereof. In this case the concession was dated October 16, 1832, and the testimonio is dated April 18, 1834, two days more than eighteen months afterwards. This objection assumes that possession was given on the date of the testimonio. But that does not appear. The latter was executed at Dolores, ten or dozen miles from the premises in question. The document had to be prepared after the parties returned to the village. They may not have returned the same day. All favorable presumptions will be made against the forfeiture of a grant. As before said, it will be presumed, unless the contrary be shown, that a public officer acted in accordance with the law and his instructions. The government accepted Soto's acts, and it does not appear that any attempt was ever made to revoke or annul his proceedings, or to assert a forfeiture for the cause now insisted on. We think that the mere date of the testimonio is not sufficient under the circumstances to make it invalid. Besides, it will be observed that the law does not say that the delivery of possession after the eighteen months shall be void, but only that it shall be a ground of forfeiture of the grant. And, of course, the forfeiture, if incurred, might be waived by the government, and we think it was waived by accepting and acquiescing in the commissioner's acts.

On the whole we think it clear that Fortunato Soto had authority to extend the title in question, or, at least, that his official acts were acquiesced in by the government, and are to be considered as valid.

But objections were made to the instrument itself; namely, to the testimonio which was offerred in evidence for the purpose of proving and authenticating the commissioner's acts. One of these objections was that it does not connect itself with any grant, concession or primitive title, nor contain any petition for a concession, or for a survey of the land, or execution of final title of possession, nor any order referring it to an empresario's order of survey. It is a sufficient answer to the first part of this objection to refer to the testimonio itself, which does in terms refer to the original contract between the government and Juan Gonzales, giving its date, and purporting to be executed in accordance with its provisions. We do not see how it could connect itself any more closely with the original concession, unless it were tied to it by a string, or fastened to it by a wafer, as is often done. But we do not remember to have seen it decided that a string or a wafer is a constituent or necessary part of the title. The objection is wholly without foundation. Gonzales had a grant which authorized a commissioner to extend it in possession. The proper commissioner did so extend it, and this was shown by the testimonio—the proper documentary evidence for that purpose. In the recent case of Hanrick v. Jackson, 55 Tex. 17, 27, the Supreme Court of Texas says: "We know of no authority for saying that the title is void because [the officer] has not incorporated into it the evidence of the concession or sale. If there was in fact no concession, there could be no legal grant by the alcalde. But whether there was a concession, and whether there was proper evidence of it presented to him by the interested party, was a matter for his official inquiry and determination; whether he set forth in the title the evidence upon which he acted, or merely recited as a fact that a concession had been granted and authority given him by the government to extend the title, the presumption, which is always indulged in favor of the validity of acts of officers of a former government, warrants the conclusion that the officer acted in conformity with law and not in violation of it."

As to the remainder of the objection, it is sufficient to say that no petition or order was [624] necessary to have the grant extended in possession. The grant itself, as stated above, gave power and authority to the proper commissioner to extend it and no further order for that purpose was required.

It was also objected that the testimonio was not written upon properly stamped paper. But this did not affect its validity. With a proper stamp it would require no proof of its execution. Without a proper stamp its execution must be proved. Jones v. Montes, 15 Tex. 352; Chambers v. Fisk, 22 Tex. 504. The court finds that formal and sufficient proof of its execution was offered. We think that the testimonio was sufficient in point of form, and that it contained all the requisites necessary to invest Gonzales with title in the land delivered to him; and that the description of the land was sufficiently specific to identify it.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the court below should have admitted the testimonio in evidence, unless it was incompetent by reason of some matter or thing occurring after its execution and delivery to Gonzales.

Analyzing the various and somewhat confused and multifarious objections of the defendants, we find three such matters assigned as grounds for rejecting the evidence: First, the nonfulfillment of the conditions of the grant; Secondly, that no protocol or matrix of the concession or testimonio was amongst the archives of the land-office, nor on record in the proper county in proper time; Thirdly, that not being amongst the archives, and not being recorded in proper time, and never being followed by actual possession, the testimonio was an absolute nullity by force of the XIIIth article of the Constitution of 1876.

These matters may constitute very good and substantial grounds of defense, and we are not disposed to intimate anything to the contrary in this opinion. But we think they can only be effectual by way of defense.

As to the supposed forfeiture for nonfulfillment of conditions of the grant, the only condition named therein is the payment of the purchase money. This was required by the 13th article of the Law of 28th of April, 1832, which, on this subject, declares as follows: "The purchaser shall deliver one fourth of the value of the land granted to the state treasury, [625] or where the Executive designates, at the time of the sale; and the remaining three fourths shall be paid, the first on the second, the second on the third, and the last on the fourth year, under penalty of forfeiting the right acquired in the part wherein this provision is not fulfilled;" that is, as we understand it, the forfeiture was to be in proportion to the amount not paid. Now, it is clear that the first payment was made in advance; for the grantee could not have obtained possession of his document of concession without such payment; and that he did obtain it is manifest, for the testimonio shows that it was exhibited to the commissioner. The other payments were to be made afterwards, and after the lands were extended; and the condition of forfeiture for nonpayment was a condition subsequent. Whether these payments were made, or not made, was not shown by proof at the trial. If not made, then there was a forfeiture which the government could enforce, either by judicial proceedings, or, perhaps, by granting the land to other parties. This forfeiture accrued, at the Revolution, to the Republic of Texas, and to the State of Texas, when it became a State. By the Constitution of the State, adopted in 1845, art. XIII, it was declared that "All fines, penalties, forfeitures and escheats, which have accrued to the Republic of Texas under the Constitution and laws shall accrue to the State of Texas; and the Legislature shall by law provide a method for determining what lands may have been forfeited or escheated." No such law was ever passed prior to the trial of this cause. We held in Airhart v. Massieu, 98 U. S. 491, 498 [25: 213, 215], that, under this provision, the Legislature must first act before any proceedings can be taken to annul the title of an alien, or any other escheatable titles; and this proposition would seem to apply with equal force to forfeitures. At all events, if a forfeiture for nonpayment, or other condition subsequent, can be availed of by a private person, it can only be after he has shown some right to the land in himself, by virtue of a subsequent purchase or grant from the sovereignty of the soil: and, hence, it can only be set up by way of defense after such purchase or grant is shown, and not as [626] an objection to the admission of the plaintiff's evidence.

The importance of that evidence to the plaintiff's case is manifest. The extension of title by the commissioner, in these Mexican grants, completed the title without any patent or other act of the government, and notwithstanding the imposition of conditions subsequent. If the concession imposed conditions precedent, the case would be different. This subject is discussed in the case of Hancock v. McKinney, 7 Tex. 384, 451, where the court, after examining some decisions of this court, says: "The conditions, in the cases cited by counsel, were conditions precedent; and not until after their performance, as we have seen, was the title to be delivered. Titles issued to colonists and purchasers under the colonial laws of Coahuila and Texas were of an entirely different character. Under those laws the title of possession was the final title, vesting the fee absolutely in the grantee. Conditions were annexed, * * * but they were conditions subsequent, upon the nonperformance of which the titles were subject to forfeiture, but until which the fee or proprietorship was in the grantee. They conveyed all the estate and interest which the government had to convey as absolutely and to the same extent as did the delivery of the final title, or the final act of confirmation by the Spanish Government, after the performance of the conditions. No act of confirmation by the government was required, or was contemplated by the colonization laws; but when the title of possession issued, the government had done the final act on her part." The testimonio in that case was substantially the same as in the present, and was sustained as conferring title upon the party.

As to the matter of registration, the laws of Texas prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1876, so far as we can discover, did not require that a title should be registered in the county, or deposited amongst the archives of the land-office, in order to give it validity. It was only void as against third persons acquiring title from the sovereignty of the soil, not having notice of it. In this respect the laws of Texas were not dissimilar to those of most of [627] the States of the Union. Indeed, the original titles could not be deposited in the land-office when, as was often the case, they belonged to the archives of the foreign government at Saltillo, or other place where they were originally deposited. Copies of them, amounting to second originals, or testimonios of the final title, might be so deposited, or might be registered in the proper county: but even that was not necessary to their validity; although it might be necessary to protect the owners against titles subsequently acquired without notice of their existence. It is manifest, however, that titles thus subsequently acquired, if relied on by a defendant, must be proved as matter of defense, and cannot be urged against the competency of the plaintiff's evidence of his title.

This, as we understand it, was the condition of things (except with regard to certain extensive and fraudulent grants, which were specially abrogated by constitutional or legislative enactment) until the adoption of the Constitution of 1876. By the XIIIth article of that instrument it was decreed as follows:

"ARTICLE XIII.—SPANISH AND MEXICAN LAND TITLES.

"Section 1. All fines, penalties, forfeitures and escheats, which have heretofore accrued to the Republic and State of Texas, under their Constitutions and laws, shall accrue to the State under this Constitution; and the Legislature shall provide a method for determining what lands have been forfeited, and for giving effect to escheats; and all such right of forfeiture and escheat to the State shall, ipso facto, enure to the protection of the innocent holders of junior titles, as provided in sections 2, 3 and 4 of this article.

"Sec. 2. Any claim of title or right to land in Texas, issued prior to the 13th day of November, 1835, not duly recorded in the county where the land was situated, at the time of such record; or not duly archived in the General Land-Office; or not in the actual possession of the grantee thereof, or some person claiming under him, prior to the accruing of junior title thereto from the sovereignty of the soil, under circumstances reasonably calculated to give notice to said junior grantee, has never had, and shall not have, standing or effect against such [628] junior title, or color of title, acquired without such or actual notice of such prior claim of title or right; and no condition annexed to such grants, not archived, or recorded, or occupied as aforesaid, has been, or ever shall be released or waived, but actual performance of all such conditions shall be proved by the person or persons claiming under such title or claim of right in order to maintain action thereon, and the holder of such junior title, or color of title, shall have all the rights of the government which have heretofore existed, or now exist, arising from the nonperformance of all such conditions.

"Sec. 3. Nonpayment of taxes on any claim of title to land, dated prior to the 13th day of November, 1835, not recorded, or archived, as provided in section 2, by the person or persons so claiming, or those under whom he or they so claim, from that date up to the date of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be held to be a presumption that the right thereto has reverted to the State, and that said claim is a stale demand, which presumption shall only be rebutted by payment of all taxes on said lands, State, county and city or town, to be assessed on the fair value of such lands by the comptroller, and paid to him, without commutation or deduction for any part of the above period.

"Sec. 4. No claim of title or right to land, which issued prior to the 13th day of November, 1835, which has not been duly recorded in the county where the land was situated at the time of such record, or which has not been duly archived in the General Land-Office, shall ever hereafter be deposited in the General Land-Office, or recorded in this State, or delineated on the maps, or used as evidence in any of the courts of this State, and the same are stale claims; but this shall not affect such rights or presumptions as arise from actual possession. By the words 'duly recorded,' as used in sections 2 and 4 of this article, it is meant that such claim of title or right to land shall have been recorded in the proper office, and that mere errors in the certificate of registration, or informality, not affecting the fairness and good faith of the holder thereof, with which the record was made, shall not be held to vitiate such record."

We do not see that these sections alter the [629] character of the objections as matters of defense. A man whose title was good in 1876, when the Constitution was adopted, whether his muniments of title were on record or not, could not be deprived of it by a simple ipse dixit of the Constitution, any more than by a legislative Act. Some proof, at least, must be given in a judicial proceeding to show that his title was forfeited, if that be the fact; and that proof, in a private action, must be given by a party exhibiting a title acquired from the sovereignty of the soil, or in some other legitimate way. When the testimonio in the present case was offered in evidence no such proof had been given. So far as appeared up to that moment the defendants were mere trespassers; and surely trespassers cannot claim the benefit of the constitutional provisions. Besides, it cannot be assumed, as is assumed in the objection of the defendants, either that the plaintiffs' muniments of title were not on file amongst the archives of the land-office, or that the taxes on the lands had not been paid, or that Gonzales and those claiming under him did not continue in possession of the land after possession was delivered to him by the commissioner in 1834. By the rules of law, possession will be presumed to accompany ownership until the contrary is proved; and constructive possession consequent upon legal ownership is sufficient as against mere trespassers, that is, as against those who do not show some right of possession. So, with regard to the archive of title, it was held in Byrne v. Fagan, 16 Tex. 391, 398, that where there is a testimonio there is a presumption that the original is among the archives of the land-office, its proper place of deposit. At all events, it is for the defendants to show by proper proof that it was not there. As to the want of registration in the county where the lands lie, as before said, no registration was necessary to the validity of a title prior to the Constitution of 1876. It is unnecessary, at this time, to decide upon the effect of the provision contained in that Constitution prohibiting the future registration of titles, or the depositing of them in the land-office. If its effect is to make titles void which were before good, a grave constitutional question may arise, with regard to its validity, which we would [630] prefer not to pass upon until it has received the consideration of a local court, state or federal. In our judgment, all the matters of objection to the plaintiffs' title, arising under the Constitution, are matters of defense, and could not properly be urged to prevent the title of the plaintiffs from being received in evidence.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded, with directions to award a new trial.

JOSEPH BENEDICT.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 630-648.)

Sales—breach of warranty—set-off to avoid circuity of action—general rules—review of authorities—Pennsylvania Act of 1705—applies only to defenses sounding in contract—warranty—what amounts to.

1. Under the Pennsylvania Statute giving the defendant a right of set-off in matters of contract, with the additional right to recover an affirmative judgment against the plaintiff, where the defendant, in an action to recover the price of goods sold, sets up an alleged breach of warranty he can avail himself only of a claim sounding in contract, in the nature of an action of assumpsit on the supposed warranty. If he fails to prove a warranty, express or implied, the statute has no application, as it extends to no claim sounding in tort only.

2. In an action brought in Pennsylvania to recover the price of rags sold, the defendants pleaded "payment with leave etc.," and set up in defense that the sale was upon a warranty or a fraudulent representation that the rags were clean and free from infection; and that they were infected with smallpox, which caused the disease to break out in the defendants' mill, with consequent injuries to their workmen and their business. Held, that the evidence offered by the defendants tending to show that the contract was for clean rags, while the rags delivered were infected with disease, and that the plaintiff knew them to be so infected, and fraudulently represented them to be clean and free from infection, was competent and was sufficient to be submitted to the jury.

3. The court below properly declined to permit one of the defendants to testify in general terms what he estimated the amount of their damages to be, and to permit workmen, not shown to be experts, to testify that the infected rags were the cause of smallpox, which they and their children had taken.

4. A warranty, express or implied, that rags sold are fit to be manufactured into paper, is broken, if they cannot be made into paper without killing or sickening those employed in the manufacture.

Argued Dec. 14, 15, 1886. Decided Mar. 14, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Wm. Macrum and A. H. Clarke, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Wm. F. Mattingly and Simon Wolf, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of assumpsit by a rag dealer against paper makers to recover $813.03 for rags sold and delivered by him to them. The plea was in the peculiar form used in Pennsylvania, with a counterclaim. The plaintiff had a verdict and judgment, and the case comes before us on a writ of error sued out by the de- [636] fendants.

The plaintiff's motion to dismiss the writ of error, for want of a sufficient amount in dispute to give this court jurisdiction, cannot be sustained, since the record shows that the defendants sought to recover the sum of $7,000 in excess of the plaintiff's claim, and this sum was therefore in dispute. Ryan v. Bindley, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 66 [17: 559]; Act of Feb. 16, 1875, chap. 77, § 3, 18 Stat. at L. 316. Whether the defendants could lawfully recover it against the plaintiff in this case was a matter affecting the merits, and not the jurisdiction.

Before proceeding to consider the rulings and instructions at the trial, as applied to the facts of the case, it will be convenient to refer to the general rules of law, and to the statute and decisions in Pennsylvania, which bear upon the subject.

When a dealer contracts to sell goods which he deals in, to be applied to a particular purpose, and the buyer has no opportunity to inspect them before delivery, there is an implied warranty that they shall be reasonably fit for that purpose. Jones v. Just, L. R. 3 Q. B. 197, 203; S. C. 9 B. & S. 141, 150; Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, 110 U. S. 108 [28: 86]. In such a case, in Pennsylvania, as at common law, the action upon the warranty may be either in contract or in tort. Vanleer v. Earle, 26 Pa. 277; Schuchardt v. Allens, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 359, 368 [17: 642, 645]. If the seller falsely represents to the buyer that the goods are of a certain quality, or fit for a certain purpose, he is liable to an action for the fraudulent representations, although they are not in a form to constitute a warranty; and in such a case the action must be in tort in the nature of an action of deceit, and must be supported by proof that he knew the representations to be false when he made them. Kimmel v. Lichty, 3 Yeates, 262; McFarland v. Newman, 9 Watts, 55; King v. Eagle Mills, 10 Allen, 548.

The damages recoverable for a breach of warranty, or for a false representation, include all damages which, in the contemplation of the parties, or according to the natural or usual [637] course of things, may result from the wrongful act. For instance, if a man sells hay or grain, for the purpose of being fed to cattle, or such as is ordinarily used to feed cattle, and it contains a substance which poisons the buyer's cattle, the seller is responsible for the injury. French v. Vining, 102 Mass. 132; Wilson v. Dunville, 4 L. R. Ir. 249, and 6 L. R. Ir. 210. So, if one sells an animal, warranting or representing it to be sound, which is in fact infected with disease, he is responsible for the damages resulting from a communication of the disease to the buyer's other animals; either in an action of tort for the false representation (Mullett v. Mason, L. R. 1 C. P. 559; Jeffrey v. *Bigelow, 13 Wend. 518; Faris v. Lewis, 2 B. Mon. 375; Sherrod v. Langdon, 21 Iowa, 518; Marsh v. Webber, 16 Minn. 418); or in an action on the warranty, either in tort (Packard v. Slack, 32 Vt. 9; Smith v. Green, 1 C. P. D. 92), or even in contract (Black v. Elliott, 1 Fost. & Fin. 595. See also Randall v. Newson, 2 Q. B. D. 102).

In an action for the price of goods sold, or of work done, the defendant may set up a breach of warranty or a false representation as to the goods, or a defective performance of the work, by way of recoupment of the sum that the plaintiff may recover. In England, this is only allowed so far as it affects the value of the goods sold, or of the work done. Davis v. Hedges, L. R. 6 Q. B. 687, and cases there cited. But in this country the courts, in order to avoid circuity of action, have gone further, and have allowed the defendant to recoup damages suffered by him from any fraud, breach of warranty, or negligence, of the plaintiff, growing out of and relating to the transaction in question. It will be enough to cite a few cases in which the extent and the reason of the doctrine have been clearly brought out.

In a leading Massachusetts case, in which fraudulent representations as to the soundness of a horse sold were allowed to be set up in defense of an action on a promissory note given for the price, although the horse had not been returned to the seller, Mr. Justice Dewey, after [638] reviewing the previous decisions in England and in New York, said: "The strong argument for the admission of such evidence in reduction of damages in cases like the present is that it will avoid circuity of action. It is always desirable to prevent a cross action where full and complete justice can be done to the parties in a single suit; and it is upon this ground that the courts have of late been disposed to extend to the greatest length, compatible with the legal rights of the parties, the principle allowing evidence in defense or in reduction of damages to be introduced, rather than to compel the defendant to resort to his cross action." Harrington v. Stratton, 22 Pick. 510, 517. And in a later case in that State, Chief Justice Bigelow observed that the essential elements on which the application of the principle of recoupment depended were two only: "The first is that the damages which the defendant seeks to set off shall have arisen from the same subject matter, or sprung out of the same contract or transaction, as that on which the plaintiff relies to maintain his action. The other is that the claim for damages shall be against the plaintiff, so that their allowance by way of set-off or defense to the contract declared on shall operate to avoid circuity of action, and as a substitute for a distinct action against the plaintiff to recover the same damages as those relied on to defeat the action." Sawyer v. Wiswell, 9 Allen, 39, 42.

In Bradley v. Rea, 14 Allen, 20, in an action to recover the price of a number of pigs sold in one lot, it was held that the defendant might set up in defense that the pigs sold were warranted or fraudulently represented by the plaintiff to be sound and free from infectious or contagious diseases, and prove the existence of such a disease in some of the pigs at the time of the sale, which afterwards spread to the others, and of which they died. Mr. Justice Hoar, delivering judgment, after referring to Mullett v. Mason, L. R. 1 C. P. 559, above cited, in which it was held that in an action for fraudulently misrepresenting that a cow sold was free from infectious disease, the buyer, if he placed the cow with others which thereby caught the disease and died, could recover as damages the value of all the cows, said: "The nature of the subject matter of the warranty or deceit is [639] such that when animals are sold in one lot together the warranty or representation as to the whole being single, we can have no doubt that the same principle should apply to the extent of a recoupment; and that the right to recoup in damages should not be confined to the diminished value of those which are proved to have the disease at the time of the sale." 14 Allen, 23. A similar decision was made in Ross v. Wallace, 11 Ind. 112.

The later decisions of this court, modifying the earlier decision in Thornton v. Wynn, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 183 [6: 595], affirm the same doctrine. Withers v. Greene, 50 U. S. 9 How. 213 [13: 109]; Van Buren v. Digges, 52 U. S. 11 How. 461 [13: 771]; Winder v. Caldwell, 55 U. S. 14 How. 434 [14: 487]; Lyon v. Bertram, 61 U. S. 20 How. 149, 154 [15: 847, 849]; R. R. Co. v. Smith, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 255 [22: 513]; Marsh v. McPherson, 105 U. S. 709, 717 [26: 1139, 1142].

In Winder v. Caldwell, Mr. Justice Grier, who was equally familiar with the common law and with the Pennsylvania practice, said: "Although it is true, as a general rule, that unliquidated damages cannot be the subject of set-off, yet it is well settled that a total or partial failure of consideration, acts of nonfeasance or misfeasance, immediately connected with the cause of action, or any equitable defense arising out of the same transaction, may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages, or recouped; not strictly by way of defalcation or set-off, but for the purpose of defeating the plaintiff's action in whole or in part, and to avoid circuity of action." 14 How. 448 [supra, 491].

In Railroad Co. v. Smith, which was an action against a railroad corporation by a contractor to recover the price of a drawbridge, it was held that the defendant might show that the construction of the bridge was so defective as to make it unfit for its purpose, and the draw worked so imperfectly as to hinder and delay the running of the cars over it; and might prove the number of hands required to work the bridge as it was built, and the number that would be necessary if it had been properly constructed. Mr. Justice Field, delivering judgment, said: "All damages directly arising from the imperfect character of the structure, which would have been avoided had the structure been made pursuant to the contract, and for which the defendant might have instituted a [640] separate action against the contractors, were provable against their demand in the present action. The law does not require a party to pay for imperfect and defective work the price stipulated for a perfect structure; and when the price is demanded, will allow him to deduct the difference between that price and the value of the inferior work, and also the amount of any direct damages flowing from existing defects, not exceeding the demand of the plaintiffs. This is a rule of strict justice, and the deduction is allowed in a suit upon the contract to prevent circuity of action." 21 Wall. 261, [514].

The courts of Pennsylvania, having originally had no jurisdiction in equity, have always allowed equitable defenses in actions at law, under what is there known as a "plea of payment with leave," that is to say, with leave to prove any special matter. Swift v. Hawkins (1768), 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 17 [1: 18]; Lewis v. Morgan (1824), 11 Serg. & R. 234; Light v. Stoever (1825), 12 Serg. & R. 431, 433; Mackey v. Brownfield (1825), 13 Serg. & R. 239; Hawk v. Geddis (1827), 16 Serg. & R. 23; M'Connel v. Hall (1831), 3 Penr. & W. 53; Uhler v. Sanderson (1861), 38 Pa. 128. And the practice was long ago recognized and acted on by Mr. Justice Washington in the circuit court. Latapee v. Pecholier, 2 Wash. C. C. 180, 184; Webster v. Warren, 2 Wash. C. C. 456, 458.

In matters of contract, the defendant's right of set-off, with the additional right to recover judgment against the plaintiff for any sum proved in excess of his claim, is given and regulated by a statute which has been in force in Pennsylvania since 1705, and is there commonly known as the Defalcation Act, by which "If two or more dealing together be indebted to each other upon bonds, bills, bargains, promises, accounts, or the like, and one of them commence an action in any court of this Province, if the defendant cannot gainsay the deed, bargain or assumption upon which he is sued, it shall be lawful for such defendant to plead payment of all or part of the debt or sum demanded, and give any bond, bill, receipt, account or bargain in evidence; and if it shall appear that the defendant hath fully paid or satisfied the debt or sum demanded, the jury shall find for the defendant, and judgment shall be entered that the plaintiff shall take nothing by [641] his writ, and shall pay the costs. And if it shall appear that any part of the sum demanded be paid, then so much as is found to be paid shall be defalked, and the plaintiff shall have judgment for the residue only, with costs of suit. But if it appear to the jury that the plaintiff is overpaid, then they shall give in their verdict for the defendant, and withal certify to the court how much they find the plaintiff to be indebted or in arrear to the defendant, more than will answer the debt or sum demanded;" and the sum so certified shall be recorded with the verdict, and be deemed a debt of record, and may be recovered by scire facias, or, under an Act of 1848, by judgment and execution therefor. 1 Dall. Laws of Pa. p. 65; 1 Purd. Dig. 11th ed. 603, 604.

This statute, in its very terms, embraces all matters of contract, and no matter of tort; and so it has always been construed. A breach of warranty is a breach of a contract, and may be sued on as such; and for that reason, and that only, has been allowed to be given in evidence by the defendant, under the statute, not only in an action on the same contract (in which it might be admissible by way of recoupment only, without the aid of the statute), but even in an action upon a distinct contract. Steigleman v. Jeffries, 1 Serg. & R. 477; Nickle v. Baldwin, 4 Watts & S. 290; Phillips v. Lawrence, 6 Watts & S. 150; Carman v. Franklin Ins. Co. 6 Watts & S. 155; Ellmaker v. Franklin Ins. Co. 6 Watts & S. 439; Hunt v. Gilmore, 59 Pa. 450; Seinworth v. Leffel, 76 Pa. 476; Halfpenny v. Bell, 82 Pa. 128. But from the earliest to the latest times, it has been uniformly held that a claim of damages for a mere tort is not within the statute. Kachlin v. Mulhallon (1795), 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 237 [1: 363]; S. C. nom. Kachlein v. Ralston, 1 Yeates, 571; Heck v. Shener (1813), 4 Serg. & R. 249; Gogel v. Jacoby (1819), 5 Serg. & R. 117; Cornell v. Green (1823), 10 Serg. & R. 14; Light v. Stoever (1825), 12 Serg. & R. 431; Hubler v. Tamney (1836), 5 Watts, 51, 53; Peterson v. Haight (1838), 3 Whart. 150; Hunt v. Gilmore (1868), 59 Pa. 450, 453; Ahl v. Rhoads (1877), 84 Pa. 319, 325.

The distinction between the right of equitable [642] defense or recoupment, independent of any statute, which may arise even out of a tortious act of the plaintiff, immediately connected with the contract sued on, and by which the defendant can do no more than defeat the plaintiff's claim, in whole or in part, and the right of counterclaim under this statute, which can be based only on contract, and by which the defendant may not only defeat the plaintiff's action, but recover an affirmative judgment against him, has been clearly brought out in the judgments of Chief Justice Tilghman.

In assumpsit to recover for services as a housekeeper, the defendant pleaded nonassumpsit, and payment, with leave to give the special matters in evidence; and offered to prove that the plaintiff, while in his service, clandestinely took and sent away goods of his from the house. Chief Justice Tilghman, after observing that it was contended for the defendant "that the evidence was proper, either by way of set-off, or, under the plea of nonassumpsit, as a defense to the action," expressed the opinion that it was not admissible by way of set-off, because it had been settled that the statute did not comprehend matters of a tortious nature; but that, considering the impolicy of multiplying suits, and the hardship of not permitting the defendant to avail himself of matters arising out of the very transaction on which the plaintiff founds his suit, the evidence offered was admissible under the plea of non assumpsit, to show that the plaintiff's services were ill performed, and thus to affect the amount which she could recover; and on this ground alone the judgment below, which excluded the evidence, was reversed. Heck v. Shener, 4 Serg. & R. 249.

So in assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, it was held that the defendant could not give in evidence, by way of set-off, that the goods had been detained by the plaintiff and conveyed by him to third persons; and the same eminent judge said: "Without undertaking, at present, to draw the line which limits the right of defalcation, it may be safely affirmed that defalcation is not permitted by reason of any demand against the plaintiff for an act done by him of a tortious nature." "But there are cases in [643] which the defendant is permitted to give evidence of acts of nonfeasance or misfeasance by the plaintiff, where these acts are immediately connected with the plaintiff's cause of action; although perhaps such evidence is not so properly a defalcation, as a defeating, in whole or in part, the plaintiff's action." Gogel v. Jacoby, 5 Serg. & R. 117, 122.

Again; in debt against principal and surety on a bond given for the purchase money of a mill sold by the plaintiff to the principal defendant, the defendants proved that at the time of the sale the grantee supposed the dam was at its lawful height; whereas, it was in fact, as the plaintiff knew, so high as to overflow and injure the land and mill of a neighbor without his consent; and that if the grantee should lower his dam to its lawful height, the value of his mill would be greatly reduced; and then offered to show how much the value of his mill would be diminished by so lowering the dam. It was held that the evidence, though going to prove unliquidated damages, was admissible, for reasons thus stated by Chief Justice Tilghman: "It is very true that these damages were not in the nature of a debt, which can be set off. But they were not offered as a set-off. It was an equitable defense, showing that the plaintiff ought not to be permitted to recover the whole purchase money; and if not, then it was necessary to show what would be a reasonable abatement. Such defenses have always been admitted in our courts. Having no court of chancery, we could not get along without them. To permit the plaintiff to recover the whole purchase money, and leave the defendants to their remedy by an action for fraudulent concealment, would be most unjust. The purchase money and damages arise out of the same transaction; and the proper time for inquiry was before the money was taken from the pocket of the defendants. It might be too late afterwards. And certainly the plaintiff has no right to complain if the whole business is settled at once. What he is not in good conscience entitled to receive he should not be permitted to receive." Light v. Stoever, 12 Serg. & R. 481, 483.

The result of the Pennsylvania decisions may be summed up thus: First. Independently of the statute, any matter, either of contract or of [644] tort, immediately connected with the plaintiff's cause of action (which would seem to include everything that could be set up by way of recoupment, under the law as generally understood and administered in the American courts), may be set up by way of defense to the action and in abatement of the plaintiff's damages only. Second. Any matter of contract may be set up by way of counterclaim, under the statute, not only to defeat the plaintiff's action, in whole or in part, but also, if the defendant proves that the plaintiff owes him more than he owes the plaintiff, for the purpose of recovering the excess against the plaintiff. Third. No mere matter of tort can be availed of by the defendant under the statute.

The defendants in the present case pleaded "payment, with leave, etc.," and the special matter stated in the affidavits of defense previously filed, with a counterclaim upon the cause of action stated in those affidavits. Their purpose in so pleading apparently was to give notice to the plaintiff, both of the special matter to defeat his claim, and also of a defalcation or set-off, on which the defendants would ask for a certificate and judgment against the plaintiff, under the statute, for any balance due from him. In the words of Chief Justice Black, "A notice of special matter must state the facts upon which the defendant relies, and not either the evidence by which they are to be established, or the inferences to be drawn from them." Hartman v. Keystone Ins. Co. 21 Pa. 466, 475. The plaintiff might perhaps have objected to the admission of any other evidence than of payment, for want of any notice to him, independently of the affidavits, of the matters intended to be relied on by way of defense and of counterclaim. Finlay v. Stewart, 56 Pa. 183. But no such objection having been made at the trial, it could not be taken for the first time in this court. Calvin v. McClure, 17 Serg. & R. 385; Rearick v. Swinehart, 11 Pa. 233; Partridge v. Ins. Co. 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 573, 580 [21: 229, 230]. Indeed, no objection to the sufficiency of the notice of special matter was taken in argument here.

The special matter stated in the affidavits of [645] defense was that the plaintiff came to the defendants' mill, and there solicited and obtained an order for good merchantable rags, free from infection; that the defendants had no opportunity to inspect the rags before delivery; that the rags sent were infected with smallpox before the plaintiff shipped them; that when some of them were unpacked and used at the defendants' mill, the infection in the rags caused the smallpox to break out in the mill, in consequence of which some of the workmen died, others were disabled from working, it became impossible to hire new ones at the usual rates, and customers were deterred from buying the defendants' paper; that by reason of the interruption and injury to the defendants' business thereby occasioned, and the money paid by the defendants to those disabled by the disease, they were put to loss and expense far exceeding the amount of the plaintiff's bill; that the plaintiff shipped the rags, knowing them to be infected, and intending to deceive, cheat and defraud the defendants; and that the defendants, as soon as they discovered the infection, informed the plaintiff of the fact, and held those which had not been consumed subject to his order, until their foreman by mistake used them up. The affidavits concluded by submitting that the defendants ought not to pay the prices charged, but such amount only as the rags were reasonably worth, if anything; and by asking for a certificate for the amount of their damages in excess of what the plaintiff might be entitled to.

In short, the matter stated in the affidavits of defense was a sale of rags, upon a warranty or a fraudulent representation that they were clean and free from infection, and a delivery by the plaintiff, under that contract of sale, of rags infected with the smallpox, causing the breaking out of the disease in the defendants' mill, and consequent injuries to their workmen and their business. The plaintiff, by counter affidavit of claim, met all the issues so notified to him by the defendants' plea and affidavits.

At the trial, the defendants, as appears by the answer of their counsel to an inquiry of the court after the arguments to the jury, and by [646] the statement thereupon made by the court in its charge, did not deny the sale and delivery of the rags at the prices sued for; but relied on their counterclaim for damages on the cause of action growing out of the infected condition of the rags, both by way of a full defense to the plaintiff's action, and also as a ground for obtaining a certificate and judgment for the damages sustained by them in excess of his claim.

The defendants offered evidence tending to show that the contract was for clean rags, that the rags delivered were filthy and infected with the smallpox, and that their infected condition caused the breaking out of the disease in the defendants' mill. This was of itself sufficient evidence to be submitted to the jury of a warranty and a breach of it. A warranty, express or implied, that rags sold are fit to be manufactured into paper, is broken, not only if they will not make good paper, but equally if they cannot be made into paper at all, without killing or sickening those employed in the manufacture.

Upon the question whether the plaintiff, when he shipped the rags, knew them to be infected with the smallpox, and fraudulently represented to the defendants that they were clean and free from infection, the evidence was as follows: The plaintiff, having been called as a witness in his own behalf, admitted on cross examination that the rags were collected by him in Pittsburgh and Allegheny City and the country round about, where he knew that the smallpox was then epidemic, and that he bought rags from any and all dealers, not knowing where they were collected; and further testified that the rags were assorted and baled up under his instructions in his establishment, and had been baled up and lain in his warehouse for a year or more before that to the best of his knowledge and belief they were clean and free from infection, and there was no sulphur, carbolic acid or other disinfectant in the bales, and that he never used disinfectants in his establishment. In contradiction of this testimony, the defendants produced a letter sent to them by him with the first invoice of rags, showing that he did not then have all the rest on hand; and introduced the testimony of three workwomen in the mill, that the rags, when opened, smelt strongly of sulphur and carbolic [647] acid.

This evidence, taken in connection with that already mentioned, was in our opinion sufficient to be submitted to the jury, as tending to prove that the plaintiff knew that the rags which he sold and shipped as clean rags, fit to be used in the manufacture of paper, were in fact infected with the smallpox, and that he fraudulently represented them to be clean, intending to deceive and defraud the defendants.

Upon the question of damages, there was distinct proof, not only of the rags being so infected with the smallpox that they could not be made into paper without injury to the workmen, but also of sums paid by the defendants to support those workmen who had been disabled by the disease; besides evidence that the defendants, in consequence of the injury to their business by the smallpox introduced in the rags, were obliged to run their mill shorthanded, and lost a considerable part of a profitable country trade. This evidence was competent for the consideration of the jury; and the want of more full and definite proof of the amount of damages, resulting to the defendants from the unfitness of the rags to be manufactured into paper, while it might lessen the sum which the jury could find in the defendants' favor, did not justify the court in withdrawing the defendants' claim from the jury.

In the rulings excluding evidence offered by the defendants in the course of the trial, there was no error. The court might properly decline to permit one of the defendants to testify in general terms what he estimated the amount of their damages to be, when he had not testified to the items of damages, or to any facts upon which his opinion was based. The testimony of workmen, not shown to be experts, that the infected rags were the cause of smallpox, which they or their children had taken, was clearly incompetent.

But for the reasons above stated, we are of opinion that the court erred in instructing the jury that the evidence admitted would not justify them in finding that the plaintiff knowingly and fraudulently shipped to the defendants rags infected with the smallpox; as well as in instructing them that there was no evidence which would enable the jury to estimate the amount of damage, if any, which the defendants had sustained; and in directing the jury [648] to return a verdict for the plaintiff for the whole amount of his claim. The defendants' exceptions to these instructions must therefore be sustained, and a new trial had.

For the guidance of the parties and their counsel, it may be well to restate exactly what will be open to the defendants upon another trial.

By way of recoupment or equitable defense, which is limited to defeating the plaintiff's action, in whole or in part, the defendants may avail themselves of any evidence tending to show that by reason, either of a breach of warranty, or of a fraudulent representation, the goods were worth less than they would have been if they had been such as they were warranted or represented to be; as well as of any evidence tending to show that the defendants suffered damages which, in the contemplation of the parties, or according to the natural or usual course of things, were the consequences of the breach of warranty, or the fraudulent representation.

But under their counterclaim, seeking, as permitted by the Statute of Pennsylvania, not only to defeat the plaintiff's action, but also to recover an affirmative judgment against him, they can avail themselves only of a claim sounding in contract, in the nature of an action of assumpsit upon the supposed warranty. If they fail to prove a warranty, express or implied, the statute can have no application; because it extends to no claim sounding in tort only, whether in the nature of an action of deceit, or of such an action as these defendants might maintain against a person, with whom they never had any contract, who wilfully or negligently introduced the smallpox into their mill.

Judgment reversed, and case remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to set aside the verdict and to order a new trial.

[775] KATE W. GOODWIN ET AL., Appts.,
v.
ELEANOR FOX ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 775-778.)

Practice—approval of appeal bond, equivalent to citation—whether cause was docketed in time—orders as renewals of allowance of appeal.

On motion to dismiss an appeal for want of a citation and for failure to docket the cause in time it is held: that an indorsement on the bond by counsel for appellees approving it "as to form and surety" was the equivalent of a citation; and that the cause was docketed in time; various orders entered by stipulation extending the time for filing the appeal bond and certificate of evidence being equivalent to an order at the date of each respectively, renewing the allowance of the appeal in open court in the presence of the parties.

Submitted March 14, 1887. Decided March 21, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

On motion to dismiss. Denied.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. W. C. Goudy, for appellees, in support of motion:

No notice was given of the application for an appeal, nor that it had been taken by the filing of a bond. This action was not taken at the same term at which the main decree was entered; no citation was signed by the judge, and, of course, none was served. Upon such a state of facts the appeal must be dismissed.

In Hewitt v. Filbert, 116 U. S. 144 (29:582), this court reviewed the cases on this subject, and reiterated that a citation is one of the necessary elements of an appeal taken after the term, and if it is not issued and served before the end of the term to which it must be made returnable, the appeal becomes inoperative, and that without a citation or its waiver this court cannot take jurisdiction.

An appeal must be dismissed if the transcript has not been filed at the term next succeeding the one at which the appeal is allowed.

Messrs. Charles H. Wood and John N Jewett, solicitors for appellants, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts on which this motion rests are these:

On the 17th of February 1877, Kate W. Fox filed a bill in equity against I. Willard Fox and Eleanor Fox to enforce a lien on certain property held by her through a deed from them, absolute on its face as security for a debt. Pending the suit she was married to Charles S. Goodwin, and Sarah E. R. Smith, wife of Charles M. Smith, in some way acquired title to a part of the mortgaged property. To the original bill some amendments were made, and answers were filed. On the 8th of December, I. Willard Fox and Eleanor Fox filed a cross bill against Kate W. Goodwin, Charles S. Goodwin, Sarah E. R. Smith, and Charles M. Smith. To this cross bill answers were filed, and on the issues made in the suit there was a final hearing, which resulted in a decree July 29, 1884, [776] fixing the amount of debt due and allowing a redemption on terms specified in the decree.

The record then shows that on the 6th of August, 1884, the "complainant" came into court and prayed an appeal, which was "allowed on her filing a bond in the penal sum of one thousand dollars within sixty days from this date, with surety to be approved by the court," and the time for filing certificate of evidence was extended to October 1.

On the 29th of August, I. Willard Fox died testate, leaving Eleanor Fox, his widow, and Isaac B. Fox, Flora F. Clark, Truman G. Fox, Emily F. Beckley, Eleanor J. Fox, and Gertrude R. Fox, his heirs at law, all of whom were legatees and devisees under his will.

On the 29th of September an amendment of some kind was made to the decree, and on the 6th of October an order was entered in accordance with a stipulation that day filed, extending for twenty days the time for filing a certificate of evidence and a bond. On the 25th of October the court ordered an extension of eight days for filing bond, and on the first of November, 1884, upon a stipulation that day filed, a further extension of twenty-five days for the bond and certificate was granted. Upon the 25th of November, under a like stipulation, a further extension was granted until January 1, 1885, and on the 26th of December, 1884, until thirty days after January 1. This last order was also made upon stipulation.

On the 12th of January, 1885, the death of I. Willard Fox was suggested on the record, and his heirs made parties in his stead. The defendants were thereupon required to convey the property in accordance with the decree. On the 26th of January, the master reported the execution of the deeds and they were confirmed. On the 31st of January, the time for filing certificate of evidence and bond was extended until March 1; afterwards, February 28, by stipulation, until March 20; then March 19, also by stipulation, for thirty days; and finally, by stipulation, the time for filing the certificate [777] of evidence was extended until May 1. On the first of May the certificate of evidence was signed and filed. On the 20th of June, 1885, an appeal bond in the penal sum of $1,000, executed by Kate W. Goodwin, Charles S. Goodwin, Sarah E. R. Smith, and Charles M. Smith, with J. Bradner Smith as surety, to Eleanor Fox and the above named heirs and representatives of I. Willard Fox, was duly approved by the district judge, and filed with the clerk. The bond, when it was approved, had on it this indorsement: "This bond, as to form and surety is satisfactory. W. C. Goudy." Mr. Goudy was the counsel of the appellees.

The appeal was docketed in this court October 20, 1885, but no citation was ever signed or issued. The times for holding the terms of the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois are fixed by law on the first Monday of July and the third Monday of December, and there are adjourned terms held on the first Monday of October and the first Monday of March in each year.

The grounds of the motion to dismiss are, (1) that no citation has ever been issued or served; and (2) that the appeal was not docketed here before the end of October Term, 1884.

In our opinion, the entries on the stipulation of the parties of the various orders extending the time for filing the appeal bond and certificate of evidence, were equivalent to an order at the date of each respectively, renewing the allowance of the appeal in open court in the presence of both parties. They were evidently made to keep alive the original allowance, but to give it effect as of the new date, and this because the record in its then condition was incomplete and not ready for filing in this court. Under these circumstances, the docketing of the cause here at October Term, 1885, was in time. The appeal was not actually taken until the entry of the last extension of time for filing a bond and certificate of evidence. This was March 19, 1885, too late to make it returnable at October Term, 1884.

Had the appeal bond been taken and approved by the court at the same term no citation would have been necessary, because the allowance of the appeal was, under the operation of the stipulation, the same in its effect for the purpose of a citation as the allowance of an appeal in open court during the term at which the decree was rendered. But as the bond was not filed until after the term, a citation or something equivalent was necessary, as matter of procedure, to give the appellees notice that the appeal which had been allowed in term time had not been abandoned by the failure to furnish the security before the adjournment. Dodge v. Knowles, 114 U. S. 430 [29:144]; Hewitt v. Filbert, 116 U. S. 142 [29:582]. In the present case the indorsement by the counsel for the appellees, of his approval of the bond, was the equivalent of such a notice, and there was no necessity for a citation in form. [778]

The motion is denied.

LEATHER MANUFACTURERS' NATIONAL BANK, Plff. in Err., [778]

v.

WILLIAM B. COOPER, JR.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 778–784.)

Removal of causes—right of national banks to remove limited—colorable assignment to give state court jurisdiction—decision by this court, in another suit, of questions involved.

1. Under section 4 of the Act of July 12, 1882, national banks cannot remove suits to which they are parties merely on the ground that they are federal corporations; said banks being thereby put on the same footing as to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States as the banks of the State in which they are located.

2. A case is not removable because a colorable assignment has been made to give a state court exclusive jurisdiction.

3. A case does not arise under the laws of the United States simply because a federal court has decided in another suit the questions of law which are involved therein.

Submitted March 7, 1887. Decided March 21, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

Review of an order of the circuit court remanding the cause to the state court from which it had been removed. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Noel B. Sanborn and Charles M. DaCosta, for plaintiff in error:

Cases arising under the laws of the United States are such as grow out of the legislation of Congress, whether they constitute the right or privilege, or claim or protection, or defense of the party, in whole or in part, by whom they are asserted.

Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. S. 257, 264 (25: 648, 650); R. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 102 U. S. 141 (26: 98); Starin v. N. Y. 115 U. S. 248, 257 (29: 388, 390).

And this rule includes within its operation all cases where the due or operative effect of a judgment of a court of the United States is drawn in question.

Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 130 (22: 588); Factors & T. Ins. Co. v. Murphy, 111 U. S. 738 (28: 582); New Orleans S. F. & L. R. R. Co. v. Delamore, 114 U. S. 501 (29: 244).

A circuit court may acquire by removal jurisdiction which it is inhibited from exercising originally.

Green v. Custard, 64 U. S. 23 How. 484 (16: 471); Bushnell v. Kennedy, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 387 (19: 736); City of Lexington v. Butler, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 282 (20: 809); Claflin v. Commonwealth Ins. Co. 110 U. S. 81 (28: 76).

The firm of Ashburner & Co., the principals and assignors of Cooper, commenced in April, 1881, an action in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, on the identical causes of action in declaration herein set forth. Judgment went in their favor, which, however, this court reversed, and remanded the cause for a new trial and for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Leather Mfrs. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 122 (29: 811, 821).

On the mandate coming down, Ashburner & Co. voluntarily discontinued the action and paid the costs. Immediately thereafter this action was commenced by Cooper, the present plaintiff.

Admonished by what this court held in Provident Sav. L. Assur. Society v. Ford, 114 U. S. 635 (29: 261), and reiterated in Oakley v. Goodnow, 118 U. S. 43 (ante, 61), to the effect that a colorable assignment made to deprive federal courts of jurisdiction furnishes no ground for removal, the plaintiff in error did not seek to remove the case on that ground. But it may not be inappropriate to say that the remedy there suggested by this court, i. e., a defense to the action in the state court would, as to the State of New York, be illusory.

It is a settled law in New York that a person to whom a cause of action is transferred by assignment absolute on its face is the real party in interest within the meaning of the Code, although it may conclusively appear that the assignment was founded on no or only on a nominal consideration, and that the recovery in the suit is to be for the sole benefit of the assignor.

Allen v. Brown, 44 N. Y. 231; Stone v. Frost, 61 N. Y. 614; Sheridan v. The Mayor, 68 N. Y. 30.

Mr. John M. Bowers, for defendant in error.

This is a writ of error brought under section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470, for the review of an order of the circuit court remanding a suit which had been removed from the Supreme Court of the County and State of New York. The suit was begun June 1, 1886, by William B. Cooper, Jr., a citizen of New York, against the Leather Manufacturers' National Bank, to recover a balance of account due from the Bank to the firm of Ashburner & Co., which had been assigned to him. The Bank was originally organized under the National Banking Act, chap. 106, 13 Stat. at L. 99, on the 27th of May, 1865, and its corporate existence was extended May 27, 1885, under the Act of July 12, 1882, chap. 290, 22 Stat. at L. 162. Its place of business is in the City of New York, in the State of New York.

Section 4 of the Act of July 12, 1882, is as follows:

Section 4. "That any association so extending the period of its succession shall continue to enjoy all the rights and privileges and immunities granted, and shall continue to be subject to all the duties, liabilities and restrictions imposed by the Revised Statutes of the United States and other Acts having reference to national banking associations, and it shall continue to be in all respects the identical association it was before the extension of its period of succession; Provided, however, That the jurisdiction for suits hereafter brought by or against any association established under any law providing for national banking associations, except suits between them and the United States, or its officers and agents, shall be the same as, and not other than, the jurisdiction for suits by or against banks, not organized under any law of the United States, which do or might do banking business where such national banking associations may be doing business when such suits may be begun; and all laws and parts of laws of the United States inconsistent with this proviso be and the same are hereby repealed."

On the 23d of September, 1886, the Bank presented its petition to the state court for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the [780] United States for the Southern District of New York under the Act of March 3, 1875, on the ground of its being a national Bank, and consequently the suit was one arising under the laws of the United States. The cause was duly entered in the circuit court October 4, 1886; and, on the 9th of the same month, Cooper moved that it be remanded. This motion was granted October 22, because section 4 of the Act of July 12, 1882, had taken away from national banks the right of removing suits under the Act of 1875 on the ground of their being federal corporations. To reverse that order this writ of error was brought.

The Act of 1882 repeals in express terms "all laws and parts of laws of the United States" inconsistent with its provisions, and enacts that jurisdiction for suits thereafter brought by or against national banks, with few exceptions, "shall be the same as and not other than the jurisdiction for suits by or against banks not organized under any law of the United States" doing business where the national bank "may be doing business when such suits may be begun." This was evidently intended to put national banks on the same footing as the banks of the State where they were located for all the purposes of the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. The first national banking Act, that of February 25, 1863, chap. 58, 12 Stat. at L., 681, provided, in section 59, that suits by and against banks organized thereunder might be brought in any "circuit, district or territorial court of the United States held within the district in which such association may be established." By the Act of June 3, 1864, chap. 106, § 57, 13 Stat. at L. 116, there was added to this, "or in any state, county or municipal court in the county or city in which such association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases." Both these provisions were carried into section 5198 of the Revised Statutes by the amendatory Act of February 18, 1875, chap. 80, 18 Stat. at L. 320.

The removal of this class of cases from a state court to a circuit court was first provided for by the Act of March 3, 1875, in that clause of section 2 which relates to suits "arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States," as construed in the Pacific Railroad Removal Cases, 115 U. S. 1 [29: 319]. Thus 781] the federal and state courts had concurrent jurisdiction for suits brought by or against national banks, and a suit of that character begun in a state court could be removed by either party to a Circuit Court of the United States, if the value of the matter in dispute exceeded $500, because, as a national bank is a federal corporation, a suit by or against it is necessarily a suit arising under the laws of the United States. But the Act of 1882 provided in clear and unmistakable terms that the courts of the United States should not have jurisdiction of such suits thereafter brought, save in a few classes of cases, unless they would have jurisdiction under like circumstances of suits by or against a state bank doing business in the same State with the national bank. The provision is not that no such suit shall be brought by or against such a national bank in a federal court, but that a federal court shall not have jurisdiction. This clearly implies that such a suit can neither be brought nor removed there, for jurisdiction of such suits has been taken away, unless a similar suit could be entertained by the same court by or against a state bank in like situation with the national bank. Consequently, so long as the Act of 1882 was in force, nothing in the way of jurisdiction could be claimed by a national bank because of the source of its incorporation. A national bank was by that statute placed before the law in this respect the same as a bank not organized under the laws of the United States.

A suggestion was made in argument that the case is one arising under the laws of the United States, for the reason that the cause of action is identical with that sued on in Leather Manufacturers National Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96 [29: 811], decided by this court at the last term, and in which the principles of law which govern the rights of the parties were determined. Nothing of the kind, however, appears in the record, and if it did it would not authorize a removal. This is not that suit, and a case does not arise under the laws of the United States, simply because this court, or any other federal court, has decided in another suit the questions of law which are involved.

A case is not removable because a colorable assignment has been made to give a state court exclusive jurisdiction. Provident Sav.
782] L. Assur. Society v. Ford, 114 U. S. 635 [29: 261], followed in Oakley v. Goodnow, 118 U. S. 43 [ante, 61].

Order to remand is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Blatchford did not take part in the decision of this case.

In the Matter of HOLLON PARKER, Petitioner. [737]

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 737–747.)

Jurisdiction—mandamus to reinstate an appeal—notice to codefendant to join—evidence—Code of Washington Territory—construction of.

1. This court has power to issue a writ of mandamus when the inferior court refuses to take jurisdiction, where by law it should do so, or where, having obtained jurisdiction, it refuses to proceed in the due exercise thereof.

2. A notice of his intention to appeal by one of two codefendants to the other, requesting him to join in it, is a sufficient compliance with section 454 of the Code of Washington Territory, which does not require the notice to be of an appeal already actually taken.

3. Upon appeal to the Supreme Court of Washington Territory in an equitable proceeding, where it appears with certainty from the record that it contains all of the evidence introduced by the parties on the trial, an objection that the evidence was not properly certified under sections 451 and 484 of the Code of said Territory cannot be sustained.

[No. 3. Orig.]

Argued March 7, 1887. Decided March 21, 1887.

PETITION for writ of mandamus to the Supreme Court of Washington Territory, directing that court to take jurisdiction of an appeal which it had declined to do. Granted.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John H. Mitchell, Alfred E. Isham, A. T. Britton, A. B. Browne, and W. W. Upton, for petitioner.

Messrs. J. H. Hoffecker, Jr., and John B. Allen, for respondents.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opin- [739]
ion of the court:

This is an application under section 688 of the Revised Statutes for a writ of mandamus, directed to the Supreme Court of Washington Territory, to reinstate an appeal from a decree of the District Court of the Territory for the First Judicial District, in a suit in equity wherein Elizabeth Denney, executrix of the estate of Timothy P. Denney, is plaintiff, and Hollon Parker and John F. Boyer are defendants. The decree in question was against each of the defendants severally, and the appeal was taken by the defendant Hollon Parker. Upon his petition heretofore filed a rule to show cause has been issued, to which the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Washington, on behalf of the court, have made and filed their return. They set forth that at the time the said Hollon Parker sought to appeal said cause referred to from said district court to said Supreme Court of Washington Territory, the manner of taking such appeal was defined by section 458 of the Territorial Code, still in force, as follows:

"Sec. 458. An appeal or writ of error is taken by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order of the court appealed from is entered, a notice, stating the appeal from the same, or some specific part thereof, and serving a copy of said notice on the adverse party or his attorney. Every notice of appeal or writ of error must be signed by the party taking the same or his attorney of record, and must contain the title of the district court in which the proceedings sought to be reviewed were had; the title of the cause as in the district court; a particular description of the judgment, decree, or order sought to be reviewed; and in case of appeal, a particular description of every decision, ruling, order, or decree by which the appellant claims to have been aggrieved, and which he relies upon as grounds for a reversal or modification of the judgment, order, or decree; and in case of a writ of error, a particular description of the errors assigned."

NOTE.—Mandamus; control of inferior tribunal; discretion; rules. See Ex parte Morgan, 114 U. S. bk. 29, p. 135, note.

The return further sets forth that the defendant, John F. Boyer, did not join in said appeal [740] as an appellant, nor was he made an appellee therein, as appears by the notice of appeal which is set out. This notice of appeal is entitled "In the District Court of the First Judicial District of the Territory," with the title of the cause, and is addressed to Timothy P. Denney, the plaintiff, James K. Kennedy, W. A. George, John B. Allen, and T. J. Anders, attorneys for plaintiff, and A. Reeves Ayres, clerk of the court, giving notice that the said Hollon Parker in the above entitled action "hereby appeals to the Supreme Court of Washington Territory from the decree and judgment therein made and entered in the District Court of the First Judicial District of Washington Territory, in and for Walla Walla County, in favor of the plaintiff, Timothy P. Denney, in said action, and against the defendants, Hollon Parker and John F. Boyer, and from the whole thereof, said decree and judgment rendered on the 31st day of March, 1882, against the defendants, Hollon Parker and John F. Boyer."

It is further stated in the return that no notice of appeal was served on Boyer, nor was service thereof waived by him. The Statute of Washington Territory relative to coparties on appeal is as follows:

"Sec. 454. A part of several coparties may appeal or prosecute a writ of error; but in such case they must serve notice thereof upon all the other coparties, and file the proof thereof with the clerk of the supreme court."

It is further set forth that section 464 of the Code of Washington Territory prescribed the only means by which, in a cause appealed to the Supreme Court of the Territory, the evidence upon which the same was tried could be certified to said supreme court. That section is as follows:

"Sec. 464. In an action by ordinary proceedings, and in an action by equitable proceedings, tried in whole or in part on oral testimony, all proper entries made by the clerk, and all papers pertaining to the cause and filed therein, except subpenas, depositions, and other papers which are used as mere evidence, are to be deemed part of the record. But in an action by equitable proceedings, tried upon written testimony, the depositions and all papers which were used as evidence, are to be certified up to the supreme court, and shall be [741] so certified, not by transcript, but in the original form. But a transcript of a motion, affidavit, or other paper, when it relates to a collateral matter, shall not be certified unless by direction of the appellant. If so certified, when not material to the determination of the appeal or writ of error, the court may direct the person blamable therefor to pay the costs thereof."

It is further set forth that, accompanying a large quantity of written testimony, and a great number of detached papers in said cause, were two certificates, copies of which are, respectively, as follows:

"Certificate of referee.

"I, B. L. Sharpstein, referee in the case of Timothy P. Denney v. H. Parker and J. F. Boyer, do hereby certify that the foregoing evidence, consisting of five packages or bundles numbered one (1), two (2), three (3), four (4) and five (5) is the evidence written down before me and taken in said action, and that the same, with the documentary evidence returned herewith by me into court, constitute the evidence submitted to and taken by me in said action.

"Dated March 10, 1882."

"Certificate of clerk.

"I, A. Reeves Ayres, clerk of the District Court of Washington Territory and for the First Judicial District thereof, holding terms at Walla Walla, Walla Walla County, in said Territory, do hereby certify that the five packages of testimony herewith transmitted to the supreme court, and numbered by pages from 1 to 1572, is all the testimony in the case of Timothy P. Denney v. Hollon Parker and John F. Boyer as taken before B. L. Sharpstein, Esquire, referee in said case, and by him deposited with the clerk of said court; and I further certify that the letters, papers, and exhibits herewith transmitted and numbered in red ink figures from 1 to 130, respectively, are all the papers, letters, and evidence introduced in said cause before said referee, and by him deposited with the clerk of said court.

"In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set [742] my hand and affixed the seal of said District Court this 15th day of June, 1883.

"[SEAL.] "A. REEVES AYRES, Clerk,

"By FRANK W. GOODHUE, Deputy,

"U. S. District Court, First Judicial District,

"Walla Walla, Washington Territory."

The evidence in said cause was in no other manner authenticated.

It further appears that the said cause was docketed in the supreme court as upon the appeal of Hollon Parker. That after divers motions had been determined in said cause, the same was argued on the merits at the regular July Term, 1883, and taken under advisement; but before a decision had been reached, by an Act of Congress, the organization of the Supreme Court of Washington Territory was so altered as to make the same consist of four justices, and as to disqualify the justice rendering a decision or judgment from sitting in the review thereof.

The death of the appellee was suggested, and due showing made; and thereupon Elizabeth Denney, executrix of the last will of Timothy P. Denney, deceased, was substituted as appellee; and thereupon the cause was again placed upon the docket of the supreme court for hearing at its regular July Term, 1885. At that time the appellee moved to dismiss the appeal on the grounds: first, that all the coparties had not joined in said appeal, and had not been served with any notice of appeal; and second, because no evidence was properly certified. After argument it was determined by the court and decided that each of the grounds in said motion was well taken; and thereupon, for want of jurisdiction, to hear and determine the cause upon its merits, a final judgment of the court was entered that the appeal from the judgment of the said district court be dismissed, with costs.

Although the Supreme Court of Washington Territory rendered judgment in this case for costs against Parker, the appellant, it, nevertheless, dismissed his appeal for want of jurisdiction in that court to entertain it. [743] There were two grounds alleged in the motion to dismiss, and in the opinion of the court giving its reasons for granting the same, on which it was contended and decided that Parker had failed to take the necessary preliminary steps to transfer his cause from the district court to the Supreme Court of the Territory. It was adjudged against him that he had not complied with the requisition of the law prescribing the conditions precedent to perfecting his appeal. The supreme court refused to hear the cause and to decide it upon its merits, because it considered that the cause was not lawfully before the court; that the parties were not in court for the purposes of an appeal. This presents a case for the exercise of the jurisdiction of this court in mandamus according to the principles and practice applicable thereto. That writ properly lies in cases where the inferior court refuses to take jurisdiction where by law it ought so to do, or where, having obtained jurisdiction in a cause, it refuses to proceed in the due exercise thereof; but it will not lie to correct alleged errors occurring in the exercise of its judicial discretion within its jurisdiction. As was said in Ex parte Brown, 116 U. S. 401 [29: 676] "Mandamus lies to compel a court to take jurisdiction in a proper case, but not to control its discretion while acting within its jurisdiction." In that case the motion for the writ was denied because the court below, having entertained jurisdiction of the cause, had dismissed it for want of due prosecution. That is to say, because errors had not been assigned in accordance with the rules of practice applicable to the form of the action; although the statement in the report does not sufficiently recite the facts from the record on which the opinion is based. In the present case, the Supreme Court of Washington Territory, on consideration, decided that it could not legally exercise jurisdiction upon the appeal of the petitioner Parker. The question for our determination is whether that decision was in conformity with law.

It appears from the record that on the 19th day of June, 1882, Parker addressed to his codefendant, Boyer, a notice, in which, after setting out the title of the court and of the cause, it proceeds as follows: [744]

"To John F. Boyer, one of the defendants in the above entitled cause:

"You will please take notice that your codefendant, Hollon Parker, in the above entitled action, will, on this the 19th day of June, 1882, file a notice of appeal and stay bond, and appeal said cause to the Supreme Court of Washington Territory, holding terms at Olympia, July Term, 1882; and you are herewith requested to join in said appeal."

This notice was duly signed and dated. Service of this notice was acknowledged in writing by Boyer, as follows:

"I hereby accept service of the above notice this 19th day of June, 1882, and decline to join in an appeal in said cause, wherein T. P. Denney is plaintiff and Hollon Parker and John F. Boyer are defendants."

It was held by the Supreme Court of the Territory that this notice upon Boyer was not a sufficient compliance with section 454, because it was a notice of an intention to appeal, and not notice of an actual appeal. The language of that section, already quoted, is:

"Sec. 454. A part of several coparties may appeal or prosecute a writ of error; but in such case they must serve notice thereof upon all the other coparties and file a proof thereof with the clerk of the supreme court."

This was a notice of a present intention to appeal, with a request to Boyer, as a codefendant, to join in it. We cannot understand how it could more exactly and effectually comply with this section of the statute. If the required notice must be of an appeal already actually taken, then it is not a condition precedent to the perfecting of the appeal, and the failure to give it would not deprive the court of jurisdiction to proceed in the cause; but if the notice is a necessary prerequisite to perfecting the appeal, then it cannot be a notice of an appeal already taken. Besides which, the codefendant Boyer expressly declined to join in the appeal, which, of itself, was a waiver of any further notice.

The other ground on which the court proceeded was that there was nothing in the transcript to certify to the court that it had before [745] it the whole of the evidence. Section 451 of the Code of Washington Territory is as follows:

"When a cause is tried by the court it shall not be necessary, in order to secure a review of the same in the supreme court, that there should have been any finding of facts or conclusions of law stated in the record; but the supreme court shall hear and determine the same whenever it shall appear from a certificate of the judge, agreement of parties, or their attorneys, or, in case the evidence consists wholly of written testimony, from the certificate of the clerk, that the transcript contains all the evidence introduced by the parties on the trial in the court below."

By section 464, heretofore set out, it is provided that "In an action by equitable proceedings, tried upon written testimony, the depositions and all papers which were used as evidence are to be certified up to the supreme court, and shall be so certified, not by transcript, but in the original form. But a transcript of a motion, affidavit, or other paper, when it relates to a collateral matter, shall not be certified unless by direction of the appellant. If so certified, when not material to the determination of the appeal or writ of error, the court may direct the person blamable to pay the costs thereof."

In this case the appellant, in writing, in his notice of appeal, gave the following direction to the clerk of the court:

"And you, the clerk of said court, will please transmit to the supreme court all the papers filed in this cause (except subpenas), as by law provided in sections 459 and 464, Code of 1881, together with your certificate, as provided in Rule 2 of the Supreme Court."

The cause, it will be remembered, while in the district court had been referred to B. L. Sharpstein as a referee. The order of reference directed him to "take the evidence and a full accounting of said cause, and find the facts thereon, and that he report the same to this court," etc. The cause was heard by the district court upon exceptions to the report of the referee, consisting of the testimony as returned by him, with his findings of fact thereon. The decree sought to be appealed from was based upon that report and the findings and conclu-[746] sions of the referee, the exceptions to which on behalf of Parker were overruled. The certificate of the referee returned into the district court, and sent up to the supreme court as a part of the transcript by the clerk of the district court, in pursuance of the appeal, was as follows:

"I, B. L. Sharpstein, referee in case of Timothy P. Denney v. H. Parker and J. F. Boyer, do hereby certify that the foregoing evidence, consisting of five packages or bundles, numbered one (1), two (2), three (3), four (4), five (5), is the evidence written down before me and taken in said action, and that the same, with the documentary evidence returned herewith by me into court, constitutes the evidence submitted to and taken by me in said action."

The clerk of the district court stated in his certificate, contained in the transcript transmitted to the supreme court, "that the five packages of testimony herewith transmitted to the supreme court, and numbered by pages from 1 to 1572, is all the testimony in the case of Timothy P. Denney v. Hollon Parker and John F. Boyer, as taken before B. L. Sharpstein, Esquire, referee in said case, and by him deposited with the clerk of said court. And I further certify that the letters, papers, and exhibits, herewith transmitted and numbered in ink figures from 1 to 130 respectively, are all the papers, letters, and evidence introduced in said cause before said referee, and by him deposited with the clerk of said court."

The transcript on appeal also was certified by the clerk, stating "that the foregoing is a full, true, and correct transcript of so much of the record in the above entitled cause as I am by statute and directions of attorneys in said cause required to transmit to the supreme court."

It appears from these documents very clearly that nothing was omitted in the transcript by direction of attorneys except the subpenas; that all the testimony introduced by the parties on the trial before the referee was returned into the supreme court, duly certified as such, and that that constituted all the evidence introduced by the parties on the trial in the court below, in accordance with section 451 of the Territorial Code, because it appears by the decree sought to be appealed from that the cause [747] was finally heard upon the report of the referee, the exceptions thereto of the defendant Parker being overruled, and the report of said referee being in all things confirmed, except as modified and altered by the findings and conclusions of the court itself. It thus appears with certainty that the transcript contained all the evidence introduced by the parties on the trial in the court below. It follows that Parker's appeal had been duly taken and perfected, and the cause had been properly transferred from the District to the Supreme Court of the Territory; and that the latter, having acquired jurisdiction thereof, should have proceeded in the exercise of its jurisdiction to hear and determine the same upon its merits. For the failure to do so the writ of mandamus must issue, and it is accordingly so ordered.

E. D. LE BRETON, Assignee in Bankruptcy of NOLAN S. WILLIAMS; SAMUEL H. KENNEDY ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 765–774.)

Foreclosure of mortgage—bill to foreclose and set aside former sale—Louisiana laws—pact de non alienando—sale without notice to other creditors, valid—acknowledgment of amount due on unliquidated account and confession of judgment by mortgagor for amount of advances—fraud—Statute of Limitations—laches.

1. In an action to foreclose a mortgage containing the pact de non alienando, on a plantation in Louisiana, and to set aside a former sale made by executory process at the suit of others secured by the same instrument, it is held: that the holders of the first mortgage were not bound to give notice to any person but the debtor in possession; that the acknowledgment by the mortgagor of the amount due on their unliquidated account of advances, to secure which the mortgage was given, and his confession of judgment for the amount so acknowledged, did not invalidate the sale; that any irregularities in the sale are within the Statute of Limitations: that the charge of fraud and conspiracy on the part of the holders of the first mortgage and the mortgagor is not sustained by the evidence; that said holders of the first mortgage were not trustees for the complainants; and that the delay of more than eight years in filing the present bill is a very serious objection.

2. A mortgage to cover future advances is valid under the Code of Louisiana.

Argued and submitted Oct. 21, 22, 1886. Decided March 21, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John A Campbell, J. D. Rouse, and Wm. Grant, for appellants.

Mr. J. McConnell, for S. H. Kennedy & Company, appellees.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion [766] of the court:

The bill in this case is brought to foreclose a certain mortgage on a plantation in Terrebonne Parish, Louisiana, called the Ardoyne Plantation, with the stock thereon, and to have the same sold, and the proceeds distributed amongst the parties secured by the mortgage, and to set aside, as illegal, fraudulent, and void, a former sale made by executory process at the suit of S. H. Kennedy & Co., one of the parties secured by the same instrument.

The mortgage referred to was given by notarial act on the 12th of April, 1872, by one Nolan S. Williams, to secure various creditors large amounts respectively due to them; amongst others, to secure the complainants in the bill (the appellants here) the sum of $50,606.83, with interest at 8 per cent per annum, due to the New Orleans National Banking Association, and $6,856.95, with like interest, due to McComb. The mortgage contained the pact de non alienando. In the same instrument it was agreed that Williams should conduct and cultivate the plantation, and should receive $2,000 per year for his support out of the advances to be made as hereafter stated; and Samuel H. Kennedy, one of the appellees, for his [767] firm of S. H. Kennedy & Co., agreed to make all necessary advances in cash and in purchase of supplies to carry on and cultivate the plantation during the existence of the mortgage, not to exceed $30,000 per year, to be evidenced by an open account to be kept by said firm between them and the plantation. To secure Kennedy & Co. for these advances, Williams, by the same instrument, mortgaged the plantation to said firm, with the like pact de non alienando; and it was agreed by all the parties, both mortgagor and mortgagees (who all joined in the act), that the mortgage granted in favor of Kennedy & Co. should have priority and rank of first mortgage over the one granted in favor of the other creditors. To further secure Kennedy & Co., Williams also mortgaged to them the crops of the plantation, and agreed to consign the same to them for sale in New Orleans, and Kennedy and Co. were to have the usual commissions and charges; and, after they were reimbursed for their advances, interest, and costs, the balance of the proceeds of the crops was to be applied by them, each year, to the debts due to the other mortgagees.

The accounts of Kennedy & Co. with the plantation, for the year 1872, showed that the advances required for that year amounted to over $40,000, and that the net proceeds of the crop were less than that sum.

In anticipation of this state of things another instrument was executed before a notary by all the parties, on the 30th of December, 1872, by which it was agreed that Kennedy & Co. should advance $40,000 for that year and $35,000 for each succeeding year, instead of $30,000, as provided by the first agreement; and to secure them for such advances, Williams mortgaged to them the plantation anew; and the other creditors agreed and consented that the new mortgage should have priority and rank of first mortgage over that granted in their favor by the act of April 12, 1872.

The accounts of the next year, 1873, showed that the proceeds of the crop were insufficient to pay Kennedy & Co's advances by more than $28,000; and it seemed evident that the plantation could not be carried on without serious loss to all the parties concerned.

In this condition of things Kennedy & Co. [768] justly considered themselves authorized to proceed upon their mortgage for the collection of the amount due to them. It stood at that time upon an open account; and, on the 28th of January, 1874, they procured Williams to make an acknowledgment before a notary public of the balance due, which amounted to $28,097.36, for which he, at the same time, confessed judgment, and consented and agreed that, under said act, and the two acts of mortgages before referred to, Kennedy & Co. should have the right to seize and sell the plantation under execution process.

Thereupon, on the 31st of January, 1874, Kennedy & Co. presented a petition for executory process to the judge of the District Court for the Parish of Terrebonne, setting out therein the two mortgages, the fact that the plantation was incurring indebtedness every year, instead of paying anything, the amount of balance due them, and the notarial act by which Williams had admitted the amount, and confessed judgment therefor, and praying for an order of seizure and sale to be directed to the sheriff, for the purpose of satisfying their claim. Williams indorsed the petition, waiving all notices and legal delays. An order was accordingly made, and Williams having waived all formal notices, the property was advertised and sold by the sheriff on the 7th of March, 1874, and S. H. Kennedy became the purchaser for the sum of $17,435.32, the appraised value being $26,142.62.

The grounds on which the complainants seek to set this sale aside are illegality and fraud.

The illegalities alleged are: first, that the complainants and other mortgage creditors were not made parties to the proceeding and were not notified of the sale; and secondly, that the debt, being an open account until acknowledged by Williams, was not an exigible debt under the mortgage alone, and that the seizure and sale had no validity except in virtue of the confession of judgment made by Williams on the 31st of January, and hence could not affect the complainants who had a prior mortgage.

Neither of these objections seems to be well founded. A holder of a first mortgage, duly executed before a notary, with pact de non [769] alienando, is not bound to give notice to any person but the debtor in possession.

The Code of Practice (art. 732) declares that "Executory process can only be resorted to in the following cases: 1. When the creditor's right arises from an act importing a confession of judgment, and which contains a privilege or mortgage in his favor."

Art. 733. "An act is said to import a confession of judgment in matters of privileges and mortgage, when it is passed before a notary public or other officer fulfilling the same functions, in the presence of two witnesses, and the debtor has declared or acknowledged the debt for which he gives the privilege or mortgage."

Art. 734. "When the creditor is in possession of such an act, he may proceed against the debtor or his heirs, by causing the property subject to the privilege or mortgage to be seized and sold, on a simple petition, and without previous citation of the debtor, in the manner laid down in the third paragraph, second section, third chapter of the first part of this Code."

Art. 735. "In obtaining this order of seizure, it shall suffice to give three days' notice to the debtor, counting from that on which the notice is given, if he resides on the spot; adding a day for every twenty miles, between the place of his residence and the residence of the judge to whom the petition has been presented."

The Civil Code, art. 3397 (3360), declares that "The mortgage has the following effects: 1. That the holder cannot sell, engage or mortgage the same property to other persons, to the prejudice of the mortgage which is already made to another creditor."

These sections do not, it is true, speak of the pact de non alienando and its peculiar effect. This pact and its consequences were derived from the Spanish law and were not affected by the Code, and have been firmly established in the jurisprudence of Louisiana. Nathan v. Lee, 2 Mart. (La.) N. S. 32; Donaldson v. Maurin, 1 La. 39, and other cases cited in Hennen's Dig. arts. Executory Process, III. (b.)'; Mortgage, VI. (c.), 6); Louque's Dig. ib. This rule not only applies to subsequent purchasers from [770] the mortgagor, but to subsequent incumbrancers. Guesnard v. Soulie, 8 La. Ann. 58. The mortgage of Kennedy & Co. contained all the requisites required for this process. It was a first mortgage by agreement of all the parties, and contained the pact in question. The fact that the complainants and other creditors had a junior mortgage by virtue of the same instrument makes no difference. They agreed to stand on the plane of second mortgagees, and must be bound by the conditions attaching to such a position. It has even been held by the Supreme Court of Louisiana that where two separate notes, drawn in favor of different individuals, were secured by the same mortgage, either mortgagee may sue to enforce his rights without a joinder of the other. Utz v. Utz, 34 La. Ann. 752. And, in another case, it was held that where there are concurrent mortgagees, one of them may proceed by executory process to foreclose the mortgage without giving special notice to the others. Soniat v. Miles, 32 La. Ann. 164. In such cases the other interested parties are entitled to their proper shares of the common proceeds. Carite v. Trotot, 105 U. S. 751, 755 [26: 1223, 1224].

But in this case, Kennedy & Co. had not only the joint mortgage of April 12, 1872, as security for their claim, but the separate one of December 30, 1872, in which the complainants and other creditors repeated their consent that it should be a first mortgage and have priority over theirs. We think, therefore, that there can be no doubt that Kennedy & Co. had a right to proceed by executory process without giving special notice to the other mortgagees, if they had a right to executory process at all.

The complainants, however, deny that Kennedy & Co. had any such right, because their claim stood in the form of an open, unliquidated account, and the balance had to be acknowledged by the debtor Williams before it was in a proper shape for executory proceedings. We do not think that this objection can prevail. The mortgage on its face was good for any sum not exceeding $35,000; and though this was to cover future advances, it was none the less efficacious as a mortgage to the extent of those advances, less the amount of any credits realized from the proceeds of the crop or [771] otherwise. The law on the subject of such mortgages is laid down in the Civil Code as follows:

Art. 3292 (3259): "A mortgage may be given for an obligation which has not yet risen into existence; as when a man grants a mortgage by way of security for an endorsement which another promises to make for him."

Art. 3293 (3260): "But the right of mortgage in this case, shall only be realized in so far as the promise shall be carried into effect by the person making it. The fulfillment of the promise, however, shall impart to the mortgage a retrospective effect to the time of the contract."

These articles, read in connection with those previously quoted, and the express agreement of the parties, are sufficient to show that there is no foundation for the objection. As matters stood in January, 1874, all that was necessary was an ascertainment of the balance due from the plantation of Kennedy & Co.; and for this balance, to any amount less than $35,000, the mortgage was as good as if the precise sum had been named in it when it was executed. To ascertain this balance, for the purposes of executory process, all that was wanted under the Code was the acknowledgment of the debtor. Such an acknowledgment was made in solemn form before a notary and satisfied the conditions of the law.

It is true that the other mortgagees were interested in the amount of the balance due at the end of each year, and were undoubtedly entitled to inspect the accounts which Kennedy & Co. were to keep with the plantation; but the latter were not required to render accounts to them in the ordinary sense of those terms. Their accounts were with Williams, to whom the advances were made, or with the plantation, which was the same thing; and their settlements were 'properly made with him; and being so made, were binding on all the parties, unless fraud or collusion could be shown. The evidence shows that Kennedy & Co. were always ready and willing to have their accounts inspected, if the other parties had desired to inspect them. This was all that the agreement implied or required. Hence the acknowledgment by Williams of the correctness of the ac- [772] counts, and of the balance due to Kennedy & Co., was a sufficient ascertainment of the amount due to them to "impart to the mortgage a retrospective effect to the time of the contract."

The fact that Williams, in addition to making an acknowledgment of the amount of the debt, also confessed judgment for it, did not deprive Kennedy & Co. of their rights under the mortgages, which themselves had the force of confessed judgments. The executory process was sued out upon them all, and had the effect due to all or any of them. The acknowledgment, it is true, was all that was needed under the law to make the mortgages exigible, and the confession of judgment was a supererogatory formality which did not affect their validity.

The complainants' case, therefore, must stand or fall upon the charge of fraud and conspiracy on the part of Kennedy & Co. and Williams. We have carefully examined the evidence in relation to this charge, and are satisfied with the conclusions reached by the circuit court on the subject. The main stress of the argument of the appellants on this point is laid on the want of notice to them of the executory proceedings, and the haste with which the proceedings were conducted. We have already shown that they were not entitled to notice, and the haste in the proceedings is accounted for by the fact that unless a sale were made in the early spring, the purchaser could not make a crop for that year; and, hence, the property would command a greater price at an early sale than at a later one. The evidence shows that everything was done in good faith and with all due publicity. The charge that Kennedy induced parties not to appear and bid at the sale is not substantiated by satisfactory proof; on the contrary, we think it is disproved. None of the parties interested seem to have thought the proceedings assailable, either for fraud or any other cause. The sale was made March 7, 1874; Kennedy took immediate possession, and carried on the plantation. The complainant Bank had suspended October 4, 1873, and went into bankruptcy. A receiver (Cockrem) was appointed October 20, 1873, and another receiver (Casey) July 1, 1874. The [773] latter, in his report to the comptroller, classed the claim against Williams as worthless. He, or his predecessor, must have examined into the condition of the security at the time, and must have ascertained all about the sale to Kennedy, if they were not aware of it when it took place. The receiver paid no further attention to the claim until shortly before the filing of the bill in this case, which was May 15, 1882, more than eight years after the sale took place. The notes given to the complainants had then been due over five years, and no interest or principal had ever been paid on them. Surely such an important asset of the Bank, the principal of which was over $50,000, could not have been overlooked. The other second mortgagees were equally oblivious to any illegality or fraud in the sale until this suit was brought. It seems incredible that parties so deeply interested, represented as they were by vigilant and able counsel, did not in all this period discover the alleged illegalities and frauds. The proceedings incident to the sale were matter of record; the petition for executory process, the order, the acknowledgment of the debt, the appraisement of the property, the purchaser's bid, the sheriff's deed, all lay open to inspection; and no sign was ever made for more than eight years by any of these parties. They must have been satisfied with the regularity of the proceedings, and the good faith of Kennedy & Co. and Williams. Their conduct is inexplicable on any other hypothesis.

As to any irregularities in the sale, the Statute of Limitations of 1855, now to be found in sections 2809 and 3392 of the Revised Statutes, and article 3543 of the Civil Code, clearly applies. This statute declares that "All informalities connected with or growing out of any public sale, made by any person authorized to sell at public auction, shall be prescribed against by those claiming under such sale, after the lapse of five years from the time of making it, whether against minors, married women, or interdicted persons."

But it is alleged that the defendants, Kennedy & Co., were trustees for the complainants and the other mortgage creditors; and, therefore, that they are answerable for all profits and gains realized by Mr. Kennedy from the plantation purchased by him. We are of opin-[774] ion, however, that the relation of trustees did not arise from the agreement. Kennedy & Co. were to receive the crops and dispose of them, and if any surplus remained after reimbursing themselves for their advances and proper charges, they were to pay it over to the other mortgagees, instead of paying it to Williams. They only occupied the position of factors, legally responsible for any surplus in their hands. For this surplus, if they neglected to pay it over, they were liable in an action at law. This is a very different position from that of a trustee in the chancery sense of that term. The fact is, they never had any surplus, and were never liable in any amount to the complainants or their comortgagees.

But if we were not satisfied that the complainants have no case on the merits, we should still regard the great lapse of time which intervened between the transaction complained of and the filing of the bill for relief as a very serious obstacle to a decree in their favor. Eight years passed away before any complaint was made. The principal of the notes did not mature till April, 1877, it is true; but the interest became annually due, and none was ever paid. The ground of relief, if any existed, commenced to exist on the day of sale; and if the complainants, or the assignees, did not know of it at once, they must have known of it within a short period thereafter. There is nothing alleged as a ground of disturbing the sale, which they did not know, or which they were not put upon inquiry to ascertain, within a year from the sale at most.

On the whole we are satisfied that the decree of the Circuit Court was right, and it is therefore affirmed.

Petitioner.

Habeas corpus—jurisdiction—irregularities in proceedings.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 782–784.)

1. This court has no jurisdiction for the discharge on habeas corpus of a person who is imprisoned under the sentence of a territorial court in a criminal case, on account of irregularities in the proceedings.

2. The objections that the grand jury was improperly constituted and that the defendant was denied compulsory process for witnesses go only to the regularity of the proceedings, not to the jurisdiction of the court.

Motion for leave to file petition, submitted March 11, 1887. Leave granted to file brief in support of motion March 14, 1887. Motion denied March 21, 1887.

ON motion for leave to file petition for writs of habeas corpus and certiorari. Denied.

The petition accompanying the motion was as follows;

The petitioner avers that he is deprived of his liberty and is imprisoned and about to be deprived of his life by the Sheriff of Beaverhead County, in Montana Territory, under the pretended judgment of conviction of the crime of murder, made and entered by the district court in and for said county, and the sentence of said court imposed thereunder. He avers that the indictment, judgment, and sentence were "contrary to the Constitution and laws of the United States," and the laws of said Territory under which these acts are done, and were unconstitutional, null and void:

First. Because the indictment under which he was prosecuted, tried, convicted and sentenced was not found by a legal grand jury, one of the members thereof being an alien.

Second. That an Act of the Territorial Legislature, whereunder said grand jury was selected and impaneled (Sess. Laws of Montana Legislature, 1881, p. 57), is in conflict with article 6 of the Amendments of the Federal Constitution and the laws of the United States, in that such Act makes any male person of lawful age, other than a citizen of the United States, competent to serve on said grand jury.

Third. Because said court denied his right to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, in derogation of his constitutional right under said article 6.

Wherefore he prays the issuance of the writ of habeas corpus, and also the writ of certiorari addressed to said district court, whereby the entire record of his indictment, trial and conviction may be brought before this court.

Messrs. A. T. Britton, A. B. Browne and J. K. Toole, for petitioner.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This motion is denied. This court has no jurisdiction for the discharge on habeas corpus of a person imprisoned under the sentence of a territorial court in a criminal case, unless the sentence exceeds the jurisdiction of that court, [784] or there is no authority to hold him under the sentence. Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 420 [29:90], and the cases there cited. The fact that a law of the Territory allowed an alien who had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States to sit on a grand jury, and that an alien did in fact sit on the jury that found the indictment against this petitioner, did not deprive the court of its jurisdiction for his trial under the indictment. The objection, if it be one, goes only to the regularity of the proceedings, not to the jurisdiction of the court. The same is true of the allegation in the petition that the petitioner was denied his right to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor. For such errors or irregularities, if they exist, a judgment is not void, and a writ of habeas corpus gives this court no authority for their correction.

v.

CHARLES G. FRANCKLYN, Ext. of EDWIN HOYT, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 747-759.)

Corporations—liability of stockholders under Statutes of Rhode Island—statutory remedy exclusive—courts of the United States take judicial notice of state laws—practice.

1. Where a statute creates a right or liability and prescribes a remedy, the remedy prescribed is exclusive and must be strictly pursued.

2. Under the Statutes of Rhode Island regulating the liability of the stockholders for the obligations of a corporation, the debt must first be established by a judgment against the corporation before the creditor can proceed against the stockholder. The execution under the earlier statute and the action against the stockholder under the Statute of 1877 must be founded on that judgment.

3. The individual liability of stockholders in a corporation for the payment of its debts being a statutory one, the courts of the United States follow the statutes and decisions relating thereto of the State which creates the corporation, although it is sought to enforce such liability in a court held beyond the limits of the State.

4. The Circuit Court of the United States, as well as this court on appeal or error from that court, takes judicial notice of the laws of every State of the Union.

5. It would be unreasonable to apply the general rule that this court should not review a judgment on a ground not presented to the court below, when the effect would be to make the rights of the parties depend upon a statute which the court is judicially bound to know does not govern the case.

The case of Flash v. Conn, Bk. 27, distinguished.

[No. 134.]

Argued Jan. 14, 1887. Decided March 21, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray: [748]

This was an action at law, brought December 10, 1879, by a National Bank against the executor of Edwin Hoyt, a stockholder in the Atlantic De Laine Company, to recover the amount of a debt for upwards of $100,000, due from that corporation to the plaintiff on promissory notes made and payable in December, 1878, and January, 1874.

The parties duly waived a jury, and submitted the case to a referee under a rule of court; and also agreed in writing upon "a statement of certain of the facts in this action," which defined the amount of the debt due from the corporation to the plaintiff, and the material parts of the rest of which were as follows:

The Atlantic De Laine Company was a manufacturing corporation, established in the State of Rhode Island, under a charter granted in 1851 by the General Assembly of that State, which fixed and limited its capital stock at $300,000, and by section 8 of which "The liability of the members and officers of this corporation for the debts of the company shall be fixed and limited by, and the corporation, its members and officers, shall in all respects be subject to, the provisions of an Act" mentioned below. R. I. Laws, May Sess. 1851, pp. 33-36.

"Fourth. In and by an Act entitled 'An Act in Relation to Manufacturing Corporations,' passed at the June session of 1847 by the aforesaid General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, it was provided, among other things, as follows: 'The members of every manufacturing company that shall be hereafter incorporated shall be jointly and severally liable for all debts and contracts made and entered into by such company until the whole amount of the capital stock, fixed and limited by the charter of said company, or by vote of the company in pursuance of the charter, shall have been paid in, and a certificate thereof shall have been made, and recorded in a book kept for that purpose in the office of the city or town clerk of the city or town wherein the manufactory is established, and no longer, except as hereinafter provided.'

"It was also therein provided that 'When the stockholders in a manufacturing company shall be liable, by the provisions of this Act, to [749] pay the debts of such company, or any part thereof, their persons and property may be taken therefor, on any writ of attachment or execution issued against the company for such debt, in the same manner as on writs and executions against them for their individual debts. The person to whom said officers or stockholders may render themselves liable as aforesaid may, instead of the proceedings aforementioned, have his remedy against said officers or stockholders by a bill in equity in the supreme court.' R. I. Laws, June sess. 1847, pp. 30, 35.

"The foregoing provisions were substantially continued in force by chapter 128 of the revision of the Statutes of the State of Rhode Island of 1851, and by chapter 142 of the revision of said Statutes of 1872, and continued to be, and at all times mentioned and set forth herein were, and still are, in full force and effect as Statutes of the State of Rhode Island."

The whole amount of the capital stock of the Atlantic DeLaine Company was never paid in, nor a certificate filed, as required by these provisions. Hoyt was a resident of New York, and a stockholder in that company, from its incorporation until his death in May, 1874. He left a will, under which letters testamentary were issued to the defendant in New York; but it was never proved in Rhode Island, nor were letters testamentary or of administration upon his estate ever issued there.

"Tenth. No writ of attachment or execution has ever been issued against the Atlantic De Laine Company for or on account of the claim of the plaintiff upon the aforesaid promissory notes; and no suit in equity has ever been begun in the Supreme Court of Rhode Island against any of the officers or stockholders of the Atlantic DeLaine Company, founded upon the plaintiff's claim herein.

"Upon the 30th day of March, 1874, the said Atlantic DeLaine Company was duly adjudicated a bankrupt by the United States District Court for the District of Rhode Island."

The referee found the facts as agreed by the parties; and, against the objection and exception of the plaintiff, admitted in evidence the reports of the cases, adjudged in the Supreme Court of Rhode Island, of New England Bank v. Stockholders of Newport Factory, 6 R. I. 154, and Moies v. Sprague, 9 R. I. 541, as proof of the [750] law of Rhode Island, and found the following as an additional fact:

"Twelfth. Prior to the making of the aforesaid notes, it had been judicially determined by the Supreme Court of the State of Rhode Island, that court being the highest judicial tribunal of the said State, that the remedies provided in favor of creditors of corporations therein referred to against their stockholders by said Act of June session of 1847 were exclusive of, and did not include, the remedy of an action in favor of such creditor against such stockholder."

"Upon the foregoing facts," the referee reported as a conclusion of law that the defendant was entitled to judgment. The court confirmed his report, specially found the facts as stated by him, and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

Messrs. Benj. H. Bristow and Wm. S. Opdyke, for plaintiff in error:

The company's charter, granted in 1851, applied the provisions of the Statute of 1847, and thereby the broad terms subjected all the holders of the shares of stock of the DeLaine Company to a joint and several liability for the debts of that company, until the capital stock was fully paid. The statute expressly imposes a personal liability in the broadest terms.

A liability, such as that imposed by this statute, unlike that frequently imposed upon the directors or officers of a corporation, is contractual. It is not a liability for a penalty, but upon a contract.

Hawthorn v. Calef, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 10 (17: 776); Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. 371 (27: 966); Cuykendall v. Miles, 10 Fed. Rep. 842; Corning v. McCullough, 1 N. Y. 47; Wiles v. Suydam, 64 N. Y. 173.

Being thus a general liability upon a contract and for an amount certain, it is a liability at law.

Mills v. Scott, 99 U. S. 25 (25: 294); Flash v. Conn, supra.

"A general liability created by a statute without a remedy may be enforced by an appropriate common-law action.

Pollard v. Bailey, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 520 (22: 376).

The statute creating the liability may make the liability one of general obligation, and at the same time give as cumulative remedies particular modes of redress peculiar to the State of the company's domicil; but yet leave the liability enforceable everywhere by proceedings appropriate to the forum.

Ex parte Van Riper,* 20 Wend. 614; approved in Penniman's Case, 103 U. S. 714 (26: 602).

Again, the statute may make the liability one of general obligation, enforceable generally, but in the same Act so provide a special mode of enforcing the liability in its own courts as thus to enact special rules of procedure binding as rules of practice upon the local courts, but not precluding other appropriate proceedings in other jurisdictions.

If the statute prescribes a remedy for the enforcement of the liability of residents alone, that cannot be deemed to exclude all remedies against nonresidents. So far as nonresidents are concerned, the case is one where the liability is imposed, but no remedy whatever is prescribed. It is not to be supposed that the State of Rhode Island, by prescribing a mode of enforcing the liability of stockholders which was peculiar to that State and impossible of application elsewhere, meant to enact that nonresident stockholders should be virtually released from the liability imposed upon them by the express terms of the statute.

So long as no greater measure of liability is sought, the form of remedy is a mere matter of local procedure, regulated by the law of the forum. Even if a statute creating a liability provide that it shall be enforced only in the court of the State, an action in appropriate form to enforce the liability will nevertheless lie in the national courts.

Mr. William Allen Butler, for defendant in error:

The sole question before this court is whether the liability of defendant's testator as a stockholder in the Atlantic DeLaine Company, a Rhode Island corporation, was a general liability on contract, enforceable against his estate in New York, where he resided and died, irrespective of the provisions of the Rhode Island law regulating the mode of enforcement of the liability of stockholders of the corporation.

Where the statute creating the liability also provides the special mode in which it shall be enforced, the remedy thus given by the statute, and that alone, must be followed.

The Supreme Court of Rhode Island has construed the statute in question and held that the remedies which it provides are exclusive.

[751] Mr. Justice Gray, after stating the case as above reported, delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action at law, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, by a creditor of a Rhode Island manufacturing corporation, against the executor of a stockholder in that corporation, to enforce the liability which the Statutes of Rhode Island impose upon stockholders in such corporations for the corporate debts.

In the court below, statutes and decisions of Rhode Island were agreed or proved and found as facts, in seeming forgetfulness of the settled rule that the Circuit Court of the United States, as well as this court on appeal or error from that court, takes judicial notice of the laws of every State of the Union. Hanley v. Donoghue, 116 U. S. 1, 6 [29: 535, 537], and cases there collected. No reference was made to the Statute of 1877, chap. 600, to which the plaintiff has now referred, and which repeals and modifies in some respects the statutes agreed and found in the record to be still in force; and it is contended for the defendant that this court should not review a judgment on a ground which was not presented to the court below. That is doubtless the general rule. Klein v. Russell, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 433 [22: 116; Badger v. Ranlett, 106 U. S. 255 [27: 194]. But it would be unreasonable to apply it when the effect would be to make the rights of the parties depend upon a statute which, as we know, and are judicially bound to know, is not the statute that governs the case. And under either statute the [752] result is the same, as will appear by a sketch of the history of the legislation and of its judicial construction, and a consideration of the principles upon which that construction rests.

The Statutes of Rhode Island, upon which the case was argued and decided in the circuit court, were sections 1 and 14 of the Manufacturing Corporation Act of 1847, re-enacted in the Revised Statutes of 1851, chap. 128, §§ 1, 19, 20, and in the General Statutes of 1872, chap. 142, §§ 1, 20, 21.

By the first section of each of those statutes, the members of every manufacturing company afterwards incorporated "shall be jointly and severally liable for all debts and contracts made and entered into by such company," until the whole amount of the stock shall have been paid in, and a certificate thereof made and recorded in a certain public office; and by the other sections, when the stockholders shall be so liable to pay the debts of the company, or any part thereof, "their persons and property may be taken therefor, on any writ of attachment or execution issued against the company for such debt, in the same manner as on writs and executions against them for their individual debts;" or, the creditor may, instead of such proceedings, have his remedy against the stockholders by bill in equity.

These provisions were substantially copied from the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts of 1836, chap. 38, §§ 16, 30, 31, as clearly appears on a comparison of the statute books of the two States, and as has been expressly recognized by the Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Moies v. Sprague, 9 R. I. 541, 544.

The provisions of the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts, as well as the similar provisions of the earlier statutes therein embodied and re-enacted, were always construed by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts to allow the stockholders to be charged for the debts of the corporation by no other form of proceeding than that given by the statutes themselves.

This was clearly laid down, before the enactment of the statute in Rhode Island, in judgments delivered by Chief Justice Shaw, as follows: "The individual liability of stockholders, [753] created by the Statute of 1808, was of a particular and limited character, and could only be enforced in the manner pointed out by the statute." Ripley v. Sampson (1830), 10 Pick. 370, 372. "The construction uniformly put upon Statute 1808, chap. 65, § 6, has been, that it was a new remedy, given by statute; and as the mode of pursuing it was specially pointed out, that mode must be pursued; that it did not create a legal liability, to be enforced by an action." Kelton v. Phillips (1841), 3 Met. 61, 62. "This liability of an individual to satisfy an execution on a judgment to which he was not a party, and to which he had no opportunity to answer, is created and regulated by statute, and is not to be extended, by construction, beyond the plain enactments of the statute, as found by express provision or necessary implication." Stone v. Wiggin (1842), 5 Met. 316, 317. See also Gray v. Coffin (1852), 9 Cush. 192, 199.

That court accordingly held in Ripley v. Sampson, above cited, as well as in the earlier case of Child v. Coffin (1820), 17 Mass. 64, and in the later case of Dane v. Dane Mfg. Co. (1860), 14 Gray, 488, that an execution against a corporation could not be levied on the estate of a stockholder who died before the commencement of the action; in Kelton v. Phillips, above cited, as well as in Bangs v. Lincoln (1858), 10 Gray, 600, that the statute liability of a stockholder was not a debt provable against his estate in insolvency; in Stone v. Wiggin, above cited, that the estate of a stockholder, though attached on mesne process in an action against the corporation, could not be taken in execution on the judgment in that action, without first making a demand upon the officers of the corporation for payment or satisfaction of the execution; and in Knowlton v. Ackley (1851), 8 Cush. 93, in accordance with the opinion of Chief Justice Shaw in Kelton v. Phillips, above cited, that a creditor of a corporation could not maintain an action at law against a stockholder.

In 1869, before the debt was contracted on which this action was brought, the Supreme Court of Rhode Island, in accordance with Knowlton v. Ackley, and the other Massachusetts cases, above referred to, applied to the [754] Statute of Rhode Island the rule that "When a statute creates a right or liability and prescribes a remedy, the remedy prescribed is the only remedy;" and, while leaving open the question whether the statute liability of a deceased stockholder survived in any manner at law against his estate, adjudged that at all events his estate could not be charged, either at law or in equity, except in the mode of proceeding prescribed by the statute, and therefore such a liability could not be proved before commissioners on the insolvent estate of a deceased stockholder. Moies v. Sprague, 9 R. I. 541. So in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Rhode Island, Judge Shepley and Judge Lowell held that the liability of a stockholder under that statute, unless liquidated and ascertained by a decree in equity, was not a debt that could be proved against his estate under the Bankrupt Act of the United States; and Judge Lowell's decision was affirmed by this court, without any contest upon that point. James v. Atlantic DeLaine Co. 11 Bankr. Reg. 390; Garrett v. Sayles, 1 Fed. Rep. 371, 377, and 110 U. S. 288 [28: 150].

The Statute of Rhode Island of March 27, 1877, chap. 600, is as follows:

"An Act Defining and Limiting the Mode of Enforcing the Liability of Stockholders for the Debts of Corporations.

"Sec. 1. No person shall hereafter be imprisoned, or be continued in prison, nor shall the property of any such person be attached, upon an execution issued upon a judgment obtained against a corporation of which such person is or was a stockholder.

"Sec. 2. All proceedings to enforce the liability of a stockholder for the debts of a corporation shall be either by suit in equity, conducted according to the practice and course of equity, or by an action of debt upon the judgment obtained against such corporation; and in any such suit or action such stockholder may contest the validity of the claim upon which the judgment against such corporation was obtained, upon any ground upon which such corporation could have contested the same in the action in which such judgment was recovered.

"Sec. 3. All Acts and parts of Acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

"Sec. 4. This Act shall take effect from and after the date of the passage thereof." [755]

This statute permits the alternative remedy by suit in equity—whether before or only after recovering judgment against the corporation we need not now inquire—and modifies the previous statutes in no other respect than by abolishing the right to take the person of the stockholder for the debt of the corporation; by substituting, for the taking of his property on attachment and execution against the corporation, a new form of remedy, by action of debt against him upon a judgment obtained against the corporation; and by authorizing him, when so sued, either in equity or at law, to make any defense that the corporation might have made. As it does not undertake to annul the liability of the stockholders for the debts of the corporation, but only modifies the form of remedy and the rules of evidence, it is not doubted that it is a constitutional exercise of the power of the Legislature, even as applied to debts contracted by the corporation before its enactment. Hawthorne v. Calef, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 10 [17: 776]; Penniman's Case, 103 U. S. 714 [26: 602], affirming 11 R. I. 333; Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 213, 262, 349 [6: 606, 622, 653]; Webb v. Den, 58 U. S. 17 How. 576 [15: 35]; Curtis v. Whitney, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 68 [20: 513]; Tennessee v. Sneed, 96 U. S. 69 [24: 610].

Under either statute of Rhode Island, the debt must be established by a judgment recovered against the corporation, before the creditor can proceed against the stockholder. The execution under the earlier laws, and the action against the stockholder under the existing statute, must be founded on that judgment. In short, it is only a judgment creditor of the corporation who can collect a corporate debt from its stockholders, at least at law. What state of facts would be necessary to support a bill in equity by a creditor of the corporation against one or all of its stockholders is a question not before us. See Cambridge Water Works v. Somerville Dyeing & Bleaching Co. 4 Allen, 239; New England Bank v. Stockholders of Newport Factory, 6 R. I. 154; Smith v. R. R. Co. 99 U. S. 398 [25: 487]; Case v. Beauregard, 101 U. S. 688 [25: 1004].

[756] The question of the manner in which the liability of stockholders under the statutes of the State which creates the corporation may be enforced in the courts of the United States is not a new one in this court.

In the leading case of Pollard v. Bailey, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 520 [22:376], under a Statute of the State of Alabama incorporating a bank, and providing in one section that the stockholders should "be bound respectively for all the debts of the bank in proportion to their stock holden therein," and in other sections that they might be charged by bill in equity, it was held that the remedy prescribed in these sections was the only one, and a creditor of the bank could not maintain an action at law against the stockholders in the Circuit Court of the United States; and the Chief Justice, in delivering judgment, affirmed the following principles, which have been constantly adhered to in subsequent cases: "The individual liability of stockholders in a corporation for the payment of its debts is always a creature of statute. At common law it does not exist The statute which creates it may also declare the purposes of its creation, and provide for the manner of its enforcement." "The liability and the remedy were created by the same statute. This being so, the remedy provided is exclusive of all others. A general liability created by statute, without a remedy, may be enforced by an appropriate common-law action. But where the provision for the liability is coupled with a provision for a special remedy, that remedy, and that alone, must be employed." 20 Wall. 526, 527 [22:378].

Pursuant to these principles, this court has repeatedly held, not only that suits, either at law or in equity, in the circuit court, by creditors of a corporation, to enforce the liability of stockholders under a state statute, are governed by the Statute of Limitations of the State, —Terry v. Tubman, 92 U. S. 156 [23: 537]; Carrol v. Green, 92 U. S. 509 [23: 788],—Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628 [24:365]; but also that the question whether the remedy in the federal courts should be by action at law or by suit in equity depends upon the nature of the remedy given by the statutes of the State. Mills v. Scott, 99 U. S. 25 [25:294]; Terry v. Little, 101 U. S. 216 [25:864]; Patterson v. Lynde, 106 U. S. 519 [27:265]; Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. 371 [27:966]. See also Blair v. Gray, 104 U. S. 769 [26:922]; Chase v. Curtis, 113 U. S. 452, 460 [28:1038, 1041].

[757] The case of Flash v. Conn [supra], upon which the learned counsel for the plaintiff greatly relied, is in principle quite in line with the other cases, and was decided in favor of the plaintiff because of essential differences between it and the case at bar.

In Flash v. Conn, the Statute of New York, there in question, did not direct that the stockholder should be charged by execution or action upon a judgment against the corporation, and thus in effect limit the right of proceeding against a stockholder to judgment creditors of the corporation; but it allowed any creditor, after bringing a suit against the corporation and having an execution returned unsatisfied, to bring an independent action against the stockholder upon his original liability; and the Court of Appeals of New York had decided, in Shellington v. Howland, 53 N. Y. 371, that the fact that a corporation had been adjudged bankrupt was a sufficient excuse for not proceeding against it, before suing a stockholder, under that statute. In short, this court upheld a suit in the Circuit Court of the United States in Florida, upon exactly the same conditions on which it appeared that it would have been sustained in the courts of New York.

In the case at bar, on the other hand, neither of the Statutes of Rhode Island gives any action at law against the stockholder upon his original liability, or any right whatever of proceeding against him at law, except by execution or action upon a judgment recovered against the corporation. Before the passage of the Rhode Island Statute of 1877, it had been determined by a decision of the Court of Appeals of New York, nearly contemporaneous with that in Shellington v. Howland, above cited, and affirmed by this court, as well as by a decision of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, that proceedings in bankruptcy against a corporation do not dissolve it, or discharge it from its debts, or prevent any creditor from suing it for so much of his debt as remains unpaid, and recovering a judgment against it for the purpose of charging its stockholders. Ansonia Brass & Copper Co. v. New Lamp Chimney Co. 53 N. Y. 123, and 91 U. S. 656 [23: 336]; Chamberlin v. Huguenot Mfg. Co. 118 Mass. 532. And there is no decision, in Rhode Island [758] or elsewhere, so far as we are informed, that under such a statute a creditor of a corporation can sue a stockholder, without first establishing, by judgment against the corporation, its liability for the debt with which it is sought to charge him.

In Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20 [27:359], the question was whether the defendant was such a holder of stock in a corporation as to be liable for its debts, and no question of the form of the remedy was presented or considered. In Garrett v. Sayles [supra], the remedy against the stockholders was sought by bill in equity, under the Rhode Island Statute, after obtaining judgment against the corporation.

In all the diversity of opinion in the courts of the different States, upon the question how far a liability, imposed upon stockholders in a corporation by the law of the State which creates it, can be pursued in a court held beyond the limits of that State, no case has been found in which such a liability has been enforced by any court, without a compliance with the conditions applicable to it under the legislative Acts and judicial decisions of the State which creates the corporation and imposes the liability. To hold that it could be enforced without such compliance would be to subject stockholders residing out of the State to a greater burden than domestic stockholders.

The provision of the Rhode Island Statutes, which made the stockholders of the Atlantic

DeLaine Company liable for its debts, was coupled with provisions prescribing the form of remedy, which still remain in force, except so far as they have been modified by the later statute of the same State. By the decisions of this court, as well as by those of the courts, both state and federal, held within the State and District of Rhode Island, and of the highest court of Massachusetts where these provisions had their origin and their first judicial construction, this liability can be enforced only in the mode prescribed by the Statutes of Rhode Island. The present suit, therefore, not being a bill in equity, or an action upon a judgment against the corporation, which are the only [759] forms of remedy authorized by these statutes, but being an independent action at law upon the original liability of the stockholder, cannot be maintained, and the circuit court rightly so held.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice Blatchford did not sit in this case, or take any part in its decision.

[649] HENRY H. PORTER, Appt.,

v.

PITTSBURGH BESSEMER STEEL COMPANY (Limited); CLEVELAND ROLLING MILL COMPANY; SMITH BRIDGE COMPANY ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 649-673.)

Railroads—foreclosure proceedings—distribution of proceeds—unsecured claims due on construction account, not entitled to priority over bonds secured by mortgage and representing funds expended in construction—validity of bonds—bona fide holders—subrogation—control of corporation by owner of majority of stock—estoppel—bonds not affected by construction contract—acts of de facto directors—construction of contracts.

1. Unsecured floating debts due contractors and materialmen, on account of the original construction of a railroad, are not entitled to priority of lien over bonds secured by mortgage, representing funds actually expended in the construction of the road and held by bona fide purchasers.

2. Upon appeals from certain decrees and orders of the court below, distributing the proceeds of a sale in foreclosure proceedings of the Chicago and Great Southern Railway, it is held: that the mortgages of November 1, 1881, and April 9, 1883, securing bonds which represent, in the hands of appellant, actual values received by the company and expended on account of construction and in the purchase of the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad, are valid and binding as against the company, there being no bad faith, irregularity, deceit or fraud in their execution or in the issuing of the bonds thereunder; that the mere fact that Henry Crawford, the promoter of the enterprise and the contractor for the construction of the road, owned a majority of its stock did not give him the legal control of the company; that from such ownership by Crawford the legal inference cannot be drawn that he dominated the board of directors; that appellees, whose unsecured claims are on account of the original construction of the road, cannot raise the objection that the bonds secured by the mortgages are invalid for want of a legal board of directors, the contracts under which their claims arise being open to the same objection; that the directors being directors de facto, their official acts bind the corporation and all persons claiming under it; that the mortgages and bonds are not affected by the existence of Crawford's construction contract, which was made March 18, 1882; that as subsequent creditors the appellees cannot be heard to impeach that contract; that the appellant is a bona fide holder of the bonds and is entitled to protect his title by that of the previous holders who were also purchasers thereof in good faith; that the evidence shows that appellant acquired the legal title to the bonds and the right of Crawford to redeem, and became subrogated to all the rights of the former holders thereof; that a certain contract between Crawford and appellant, extinguishing the former's said right to redeem, did not create an equity or lien in favor of the appellees, the appellant having thereby agreed to pay only such claims against the company as should be held by the court to be entitled to priority over the bonds; that to consider Crawford, as all the time substantially the owner of the road, would not affect the rights of appellant; that the decree of February 16, 1886, though a final decree of foreclosure and sale, as respected the interest of the mortgagor, and in some other respects, was not such in respect of the matters involved in these appeals from the decree of October 9, 1886; and that the entire purchase money now in the registry of the court below, after paying the costs and the receiver's indebtedness, must be applied toward the payment of the bonds and coupons secured by the mortgages.

Submitted Jan. 7, 1887. Decided March 21, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

The history and facts of the case fully appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. E. McDonald, John M. Butler, A. L. Mason, O. Peckham and R. B. F. Pierce, for appellant.

Messrs. John S. Cooper, Addison C. Harris, William H. Calkins, E. W. Tolerton, U. Z. Wiley, P. S. Kennedy and Baker, Hord & Hendricks, for appellees:

The rights of these appellees in the property of the railroad and proceeds arising from the sale were adjudicated by the terms of the decree directing the sale of the property. The only question remaining was to ascertain the amounts, and for that purpose the claims were referred to the master. The amounts are not questioned. By procuring a sale, confirmation, title and possession before the report was in, appellant waived or abandoned all further exception to the claim.

The decree was final.

S. 6 How. 201 (12: 404); Thompson v. Dean, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 342 (19: 94); R. R. Co. v. Bradley, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 575 (19: 274); Green v. Fisk, 103 U. S. 518 (26: 486); Grant v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 106 U. S. 429 (27: 237); Bostwick v. Brinkerhoff, 106 U. S. 3 (27:73); R. R. Co. v. Express Co. 108 U. S. 24 (27: 638); Winthrop Iron Co. v. Meeker, 109 U. S. 180 (27: 898).

The relations which Henry Crawford sustained towards each of the appellees when their respective claims accrued, and also his relations to the railway corporation, were such as to preclude him, under the principles enforced by courts of equity, from acquiring the mortgage bonds in controversy, to the prejudice of appellees.

At the time these bonds were delivered, all the evidence shows this corporation to be insolvent. In other words, its property on a sale would not have paid its debts.

That under such circumstances the property was a trust fund to pay its creditors is well settled.

Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 313; Curran v. Arkansas, 56 U. S. 15 How. 304 (14: 705).

Crawford's construction contract was fraudulent and void as against the appellees, creditors of the corporation.

Had Crawford, instead of having resigned at the opening of the meeting of the board of directors, of March 18, 1882, continued his official positions as president and director for about ten or fifteen minutes longer (the period covered by the meeting), there would then, under the authorities, have been no question or doubt as to the invalidity of the contract.

Thomas v. Brownville, Ft. K. & P. R. R. Co. 109 U. S. 522 (27: 1018); Wardell v. R. R. Co. 103 U. S. 651 (26: 509); Gilman, Clinton, etc., R. R. Co. v. Kelly, 77 Ill. 426.

The legal situation was that of a corporation, only in name, vested with the legal title to the railway property for the use of Henry Crawford as sole beneficiary.

See Sawyer v. Hoag, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 610 (21: 731).

Dull and McCormick received the bonds subject to the same equities against them which could be urged whilst they were in Crawford's possession.

The equities of the creditors against the million dollars of bonds in the hands of Drexel, Morgan & Co. are precisely what they were in the hands of Crawford.

By the purchase of the securities, on December 26, 1884, under the syndicate agreement, appellant was charged with full notice of all the facts, from which the equities of appellees against Henry Crawford and the bonds in said suit arise.

Swift v. Smith, 102 U. S. 442, 448 (26: 193, 196.

The First National Bank acquired no better rights against appellees by the assignment of Crawford's interest in the syndicate agreement than Crawford himself had.

See Colebrook, Collateral Securities, 568 et seq., and section 422. See also Cowdrey v. Vandenburgh, 101 U. S. 572 (25: 928); Judson v. Corcoran, 58 U. S. 17 How. 612 (15: 231); Wickham v. Morehouse, 16 Fed. Rep. 324.

The equities of appellees to be paid the amounts due them respectively, as decreed by the circuit court, out of the fund in controversy, are superior to those of appellants, as the nominal party to this appeal, or to those of Henry Crawford, the real party.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

These are five appeals brought by Henry H. Porter, in which the Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Company (Limited), the Cleveland Rolling Mill Company, the Smith Bridge Company, Crerar Adams & Company, and Volney Q. Irwin are severally appellees.

The material facts out of which the questions for consideration arise are as follows:

In March, 1880, the Indiana and Chicago Railway Company was incorporated to construct and operate a railroad from a point on the state line of Indiana, in Lake County, to Attica, in Fountain County, Indiana. William Foster was the chief promoter of this enterprise, and was the president of the company, and of its successor, the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company, from the organization of the Indiana and Chicago Railway Company down to March 15, 1882. From March, 1880, to June 23, 1881, Foster owned substantially all of the stock of the Indiana and Chicago Railway Company which had been issued, a few shares being held by the other directors, and he controlled the enterprise. Prior to June 23, 1881, the work of construction and of procurement of the right of way had progressed so far as Foster could procure and pay for the same, by the issuing of $50,250, par value, of paid-up capital stock of the company, of all of which stock Foster had on June 23, 1881, become the owner.

Prior to June, 1881, Henry Crawford purchased from A. J. Dull and Henry McCormick the entire capital stock, being 8,648 shares, of the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad Company. This was a company organized and incorporated by the purchasers, at a foreclosure sale, of the Indiana North and South Railroad, and it owned and operated a railroad extending south from Attica, through Veedersburg, in Fountain County, to Yeddo, a little over twenty miles in length. It had also procured some right of way and constructed some roadbed south of Yeddo, in the direction of Brazil, Indiana. The purchase price of this stock was $200,000. Crawford made a cash payment of part at the time and gave his notes for the residue, the stock remaining in pledge with the vendors, as security for the payment of the notes. [650]

On June 23, 1881, Foster sold to Crawford 1,005 shares of the capital stock of the Indiana and Chicago Railway Company, of the par value of $50,250, under a written contract, by which Foster guaranteed to Crawford that the stock thus sold was all of the capital stock of the company, excepting $10,000 par value still held by Foster, and that the company was under no obligation to issue any more stock, except a small amount for rights of way contracted to be paid for in stock. In connection with this contract, a certificate of the secretary of the Indiana and Chicago Railway Company was delivered to Crawford, showing the exact amount of capital stock then outstanding. The $10,000 of stock retained by Foster had been issued to him in payment of his salary and personal expenses in connection with the enterprise.

On June 23, 1881, the company had no assets excepting the roadbed and right of way, which had been constructed and procured with the money represented by the $50,250 of stock, and excepting some $50,000 of aid voted by certain townships along the line, but not yet collected.

Foster remained president, and his board of directors remained directors, until March 15, 1882. Immediately after his purchase of the stock on June 23, 1881, Crawford, without any specific contract with the Indiana and Chicago Railway Company, began furnishing from his own means the money and material with which the work of constructing the road was carried on. [651]

On July 14, 1881, the board of directors of the company, at a special meeting, adopted a resolution, changing its name to that of "The Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company." On October 29, 1881, the board of directors of the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company adopted resolutions authorizing the execution of the mortgage and the issuing of the bonds involved in this litigation. At that time Crawford was not a director or officer of the company. The mortgage and the bonds bear date November 1, 1881. The resolutions authorized the issuing of bonds to the amount of $2,000,000, and the mortgage secures that amount. The mortgage was made to John C. New, as trustee, and describes the mortgaged premises as follows: "All and singular the northern division of railway of the said party of the first part, as the same now is or may hereafter be constructed, between Brazil, Clay County, Indiana, extending thence northwardly through the Counties of Clay, Parke, Fountain, Warren, Benton, Newton, and Jasper to a junction with the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railway, at or northwest from Rensselaer, Indiana, being about one hundred miles in length."

Between June 23, 1881, and January 1, 1882, Crawford furnished from his own means over $300,000, which was paid out for work and material used in constructing the road between Attica and the junction at Fair Oaks, northwest of Rensselaer. In addition to this, Crawford, prior to January 1, 1882, had paid out of his own means to Dull and McCormick, upon his purchase of the stock of the Chicago and Block Coal Company, the sum of $85,000, leaving $115,000 and all interest still unpaid.

From June 23, 1881, onwards Foster and his board of directors looked to Crawford to furnish the money and material with which to carry on the work of construction.

In pursuance of the resolutions of October 29, 1881, the mortgage was prepared and exe-[652] cuted, and was duly recorded, in November, 1881, in the several counties through which the line of the railroad ran.

About the last of December, 1881, Foster, then president of the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company, executed and delivered to Crawford—the actual delivery being made to one Starin, an employé of Crawford, at Crawford's office at Chicago, Crawford being absent—1,000 bonds, each for $1,000, negotiable in form, and payable to New or bearer, making $1,000,000, the payment of the bonds and of the interest coupons attached thereto being secured by the said mortgage. At the same time with the delivery of the bonds, Foster also delivered to Starin, for Crawford, the following memorandum, unsigned, but in the handwriting of Foster:

"Memorandum of agreement between the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company and Henry Crawford as to applying the proceeds of an issue of one million dollars of bonds under date of November 1, 1881.

"First. In payment of Block Coal road, purchased by said Crawford, and the contract assigned by him to the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company, with which it is to be consolidated, as provided by law.

"Second. To reimburse said Crawford for money advanced, and to be hereafter advanced, for construction and equipment of the Chicago and Great Southern Railway, which the bills of purchase and vouchers for the necessary payments shall be the evidence of expenditures made.

"Third. Any balance from the proceeds of the first issue or any subsequent issue shall be used and applied to the extension and development of the line of road covered by the mortgage of November 1, 1881.

"Fourth. It is understood and agreed that said Crawford is to furnish the necessary amount of money to pay the debts contracted since the first of July, 1881 and to complete grading and superstructure, and to furnish and equip the line of road from junction with Air Line to Attica, as fast as the work can be done."

Prior to the delivery of the bonds by Foster to Crawford, Crawford had assigned to the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company his contract with Dull and McCormick [653] for the purchase of the stock of the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad Company. When the bonds were thus delivered to Crawford he had no official connection with the company, but owned $50,250 of its stock, and had furnished to it a large amount of money, which it had paid out for construction.

In December, 1881, Crawford's note to Dull and McCormick matured and was unpaid. Crawford negotiated with Dull for an extension of time, and Dull agreed to give the extension if Crawford would deposit with him, as additional collateral security, all of the bonds then issued by the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company, and all the stock which he had bought from Foster, and if he would also, by an agreement with New, the trustee, prevent the issue of any more bonds without Dull's written consent. This arrangement was carried out, and on the 27th of January, 1882, Crawford delivered to Dull all of the stock which he had bought from Foster, and the 1,000 bonds which Foster had delivered to him, and also procured from New the following paper, which was delivered to Dull:

"I, John C. New, of the City of Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana, do hereby make known that, as trustee in a certain mortgage or deed of trust, bearing date the first day of November, 1881, made and executed by the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company, a corporation of the State of Indiana, to me, as trustee, covering the railroad and other property of said company, to secure a certain issue of first mortgage bonds of said company, aggregating the sum of two millions of dollars, I have, as such trustee, certified for issue one thousand of said bonds, of one thousand dollars each, and no more, and, at the request of Henry Crawford, Esq., of Chicago, I agree that I will, as such trustee, certify no more of said bonds without the consent in writing of A. J. Dull, Esq., of Harrisburg, Pa.

"JNO. C. NEW, Trustee."

At this time, the balance due to Dull and [654]
McCormick was $115,000 and interest. The $85,000 which Crawford had paid to Dull and McCormick was in addition to the money he had furnished for constructing the new road north from Attica.

In February, 1882, the work of constructing the railroad being still in progress, and Crawford still continuing to furnish, without any contract with the company, the money used in prosecuting the work, he requested Foster and his board of directors to enter into a construction contract with him, and he sent to the board a written contract which he desired it to execute. The board, on the 7th of February, 1882, unanimously rejected the contract. Crawford then procured Foster to call another meeting of the board, which was held on March 15, 1882. Crawford attended this meeting, it being the first at which he was present. Becoming satisfied that Foster would prevent any contract or settlement from being made with him, unless he would buy from Foster the $10,000 of stock still held by Foster, he purchased that stock from Foster, and the two entered into a written contract, dated March 15, 1882, by which Crawford became the owner of all the remainder of the capital stock of the company. Crawford on the same day assigned and transferred to each of the following persons one share of the capital stock of the company, viz: Henry Crawford, Jr., William A. Starin, D. H. Conklin, F. F. Lacey, H. Moore, G. W. McDonald, D. J. Lyon, and H. Meiselbar. On the same day, Foster and his board of directors, at the request of Crawford, resigned, and Crawford caused himself and the eight persons above named to be elected directors of the company. On the same day, Crawford was elected president of the company, and remained such for four days, until March 18, 1882, when he ceased to be president and director; and he had no official connection with the company from that time until April or May, 1883, when he was again elected director and president.

On March 18, 1882, the new board of directors passed a resolution approving the mortgage to New, and ordering it to be copied at length in the minutes of the meeting, which was done. At the same meeting the board of directors entered into a construction contract with Crawford. Between June 23, 1881, the date of Crawford's first purchase of stock from Foster, and March 18, 1882, the date of the construction contract, Crawford had paid out of his own means, for labor and material used in the construction of the company's railroad north from Attica, about $400,000, and for the purchase of the stock of the Chicago and Block Coal railroad, extending south from Attica, $85,000.

The Chicago and Block Coal Railroad Company and the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company were consolidated in the spring of 1883, under the name of "The Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company." On the 9th of April, 1883, the consolidated company executed and delivered to John C. New, as trustee, a deed of further assurance, covering the railroad and property of the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad Company, extending southwardly from Attica to Yeddo, in addition to the property covered by the mortgage of November 1, 1881, and making the first named property a further security for the bonds issued under mortgage of November 1, 1881. This deed of further assurance was duly recorded in the counties along the line of the railroad.

The work of construction was carried on until January, 1883, Crawford furnishing from his own means all the money paid for labor and material used in the construction between June 23, 1881, and January 5, 1883, except about $40,000 received on account of aid voted by certain townships along the line, which was also expended in paying for construction. Between January 23, 1882 (the date at which Crawford pledged the bonds and stock to Dull and McCormick), and January 5, 1883, Crawford had been endeavoring either to sell the bonds so pledged to Dull and McCormick or to hypothecate them for a loan sufficiently large to pay off Dull and McCormick, and also to furnish money to build the road from Fair Oaks to Attica. Between June 23, 1881, and January 5, 1883, there had been paid out for the construction of the railroad about $500,000, all of which had been furnished by Crawford, except about $40,000 received from township aid.

On January 5, 1883, Crawford negotiated a loan from Drexel, Morgan & Co., a banking house in the City of New York, under a written contract. This contract provided for a loan of $400,000, $250,000 to be paid at once, out of which the balance due to Dull and McCormick for the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad was to be paid; $50,000 more to be paid when the new road should be completed from Iroquois River to Fair Oaks; $50,000 more when the road should be completed eight miles south from Oxford, and when Crawford should furnish satisfactory proof to Drexel, Morgan & Co. that he had put into the work $50,000 of his own money, in addition to all the moneys theretofore expended by him upon the construction of the road; the last $50,000 to be paid when the line should be completed from Fair Oaks to Yeddo. Crawford was to procure the consolidation of the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad with the Chicago and Great Southern Railway. As security for this loan, all of the capital stock of the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad Company, all of the capital stock of the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company, and all of the bonds of the latter company, either then issued or thereafter to be issued, were to be delivered to and held by Drexel, Morgan & Co. Crawford was to give his individual notes for the loan, and Drexel, Morgan & Co. were to appoint, and did appoint, an agent to superintend the expenditure of all the money to be advanced by them, the money to be paid out only upon drafts drawn by Crawford and approved and countersigned by such agent. Under this contract, Drexel, Morgan & Co. advanced $350,000. As part of it, they paid to Dull and McCormick, on January 5, 1883, $132,379.99, being the entire balance due on the purchase of the stock of the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad Company, and received from Dull and McCormick all of the stock and bonds which they held as collateral. Drexel, Morgan & Co. received this stock and these bonds, not from Crawford, but from Dull and McCormick, Crawford never having had possession or control of the stock or the bonds from the time when he pledged them to Dull and McCormick. The remaining $217,620.01 was paid by Drexel, Morgan & Co., through their agent, directly for labor and material used in the construction of the railroad, and was paid at various times between [657] January 5, 1883, and September, 1883. During the same period, Crawford, in addition to what he had theretofore expended out of his own means in the work of construction, and in addition to the money so paid by Drexel, Morgan & Co., paid out of his own means more than $50,000 for labor and material used in the construction of the railroad between Oxford and Attica. From January 5, 1883, to September, 1883, the contractors, subcontractors, furnishers of material and laborers were informed and understood that the money paid to them from time to time during that period was mainly derived from a loan negotiated upon the mortgage bonds of the railway company. Each of these five appellees knew of the pledge of these bonds to Drexel, Morgan & Co. for this loan, and knew that they were getting part of the money loaned by Drexel, Morgan & Co.

After the Drexel, Morgan & Co. loan was exhausted, the work of construction was continued, the money paid for labor and material being furnished by Crawford, until about February, 1884, when the new road was so far constructed as to enable trains to be run from Attica to the junction at Fair Oaks. On the 18th of February, 1884, Crawford submitted to the board of directors a report, showing the then condition of the work, and asked the board to issue to him, in addition to the $1,000,000 of first mortgage bonds theretofore issued, a further sum of $200,000 of the first mortgage bonds, $1,200,000 of capital stock, and $1,200,000 of income bonds, as a payment to him on account. On the same day the board of directors passed the following resolution: "That, as a payment on account for the work done and material furnished up to the present time under such construction contract, there be allowed and paid to the contractor or order the sum of two hundred thousand dollars of first mortgage bonds (in addition to the one million dollars heretofore appropriated), and also ($1,200,000) one million two hundred thousand dollars of income bonds, and ($1,200,000) one million two hundred thousand dollars in the common stock, full paid, of this company, the proper officers of the company to execute the foregoing resolutions and take the proper vouchers for all payments."

[658] No income bonds were ever issued by the company. On the 5th of May, 1884, at the request of Crawford, the board of directors adopted a resolution, providing for an exchange of the old Indiana and Chicago Railway Company stock and of the old Chicago and Block Coal Railroad Company stock for new stock of the consolidated Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company. At the same meeting the board passed a resolution that, in addition to the consolidated stock to be issued in exchange for the old stock of the original companies, the secretary should issue and deliver to the contractor additional new stock, as payment under the construction contract, so as to make the total consolidated stock outstanding amount to $1,200,000, par value. This exchange of stock was made, and enough additional new stock of the consolidated company was issued to make its total stock outstanding amount to $1,200,000, par value, all of which stock was delivered to Drexel, Morgan & Co. under their contract of loan. When Dull and McCormick, on January 5, 1883, delivered their stock and bonds to Drexel, Morgan & Co. they also delivered to the latter the following consent:

"John C. New, trustee:

"I hereby consent to the issue and certification of the remaining $1,000,000 of Chicago and Great Southern railway bonds, whenever you are so requested to do by Drexel, Morgan & Co. A. J. DULL."

"New York, Jan. 5, 1883.

The additional $200,000 of bonds which Crawford was authorized to receive by such resolution of the board of February 18, 1884, were issued. Drexel, Morgan & Co. procured New, as trustee, to certify them, and they were delivered by Crawford to Drexel, Morgan & Co., in August, 1884.

While the construction of the railroad was in progress, Crawford became indebted to the First National Bank of Chicago in the sum of about $300,000, about two thirds of which money Crawford expended in the construction of the Chicago Air Line Railroad, and about one third of it in the construction of the Chicago [659] and Great Southern Railway. While the bonds and stock of the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company were so held in pledge by Drexel, Morgan & Co., Crawford gave to the First National Bank of Chicago a second pledge of the same bonds and stock, to secure the payment of his indebtedness to the bank, he having already pledged to it certain other securities and property, as collateral. Crawford's notes to Drexel, Morgan & Co. matured and were not paid. Drexel, Morgan & Co., under the power given to them in their contract with Crawford, of January 5, 1883, advertised the pledged bonds and stock to be sold on June 2, 1884. By a written agreement between Crawford and Drexel, Morgan & Co., made May 27, 1884, the sale was postponed to June 20, 1884. In the meantime, Samuel M. Nickerson, President of the First National Bank of Chicago, which held the second pledge of the securities held by Drexel, Morgan & Co., and Henry H. Porter, a director and stockholder of the bank, entered into negotiations with Drexel, Morgan & Co. respecting the purchase of the bonds and stock from them, if Crawford should further fail to pay his debt to them and to redeem the securities. These negotiations resulted in a contract between Crawford and Drexel, Morgan & Co., by which the time of payment was extended for sixty days from June 20, 1884; and a further contract between Nickerson and Porter of the one part, and Drexel, Morgan & Co. of the other part, by which Nickerson and Porter agreed to buy the pledged securities from Drexel, Morgan & Co., and to pay them their claim in full with interest, if Crawford should fail to pay his debt to them at the expiration of the sixty days. These two contracts were both of them dated June 25, 1884. Crawford failed to pay his debt to Drexel, Morgan & Co. within the sixty days. Prior to January 12, 1885, Porter purchased Nickerson's interest in the contract of June 25, 1884, between Nickerson and Porter, and Drexel, Morgan & Co. On January 12, 1885, Porter paid to Drexel, Morgan & Co. $392,868.24 by drafts, and sent them the drafts enclosed in a letter, in which Nickerson concurred. Drexel, Morgan & Co. received the payment, [660] and delivered the pledged bonds and stock to Porter, accompanying the delivery with a letter giving in detail a list of the stocks, bonds, notes, agreements and papers held by them as collateral to the loan. One of the papers enclosed by them to Porter was a consent signed by them, authorizing New, as trustee, to certify the remaining uncertified $800,000 of first mortgage bonds whenever so requested to to do by Porter. Porter associated with himself certain other persons, who entered into a subscription or syndicate agreement, for the purpose of buying in the railroad, and reorganizing, completing and extending it. By this agreement it was provided that Porter, as the agent and attorney of the parties concerned, should go on "in his own name" and foreclose the mortgage, sell the property, bid it off, reorganize the company, and convey the property to be purchased under the foreclosure to the reorganized company. The agreement was, in effect, one by the subscribers to pay so much money for so much stock and bonds of the new company to be organized after the foreclosure and sale by Porter. It gave to Porter absolute power over and control of all the bonds of the existing company, with full authority in his own name to foreclose the mortgage and reorganize the company upon the foreclosure purchase, and conduct and control the new enterprise.

On the 26th of December, 1884, Porter and Crawford entered into a contract, under which Porter and the syndicate represented by him purchased and became the absolute owner of any and all right Crawford might have to redeem from Porter the bonds and stock he should receive from Drexel, Morgan & Co., by paying to him the amount he should pay to them. This contract recognized the right of Crawford so to redeem the bonds and stock. Drexel, Morgan & Co. did not sell the bonds and stock at public auction on notice, but sold to Porter at private sale their debt against Crawford, and put Porter in their place as to the collateral security for the debt. Crawford was willing that Porter should take the bonds and stock in this way if he, Crawford, could still have an opportunity to protect his second pledge of them to the First National Bank of Chicago. By this contract [661] Porter and his associates fixed the ultimate price they were willing to pay for the bonds and stock, which price left a margin for the bank after paying off Drexel, Morgan & Co. On the same day, and as a part of the same transaction, Crawford, by written assignment, transferred to the First National Bank of Chicago all of his right, title, and interest in and to the contract of the same date between himself and Porter, and all the rights, claims, demands, moneys, and payments he, Crawford, might be or become entitled to by reason of and under that contract. These two instruments simply constituted the method pursued to protect the bank in its second lien upon the bonds and the stock, and were entered into for the purpose of securing to it any margin of value there might be in the bonds and stock, after paying the Drexel, Morgan & Co. debt.

The amount of money furnished by Crawford and expended in the construction of the railroad during the time the Drexel, Morgan & Co. loan was being used in construction, and during the time after that loan was exhausted, amounted to at least $250,000, in addition to the moneys which Crawford had theretofore paid out for such construction. The total expenditure in constructing the Chicago and Great Southern railway was something over $1,000,000, all of which came from Crawford's private means, and from the Drexel, Morgan & Co. loan, except some $40,000 or $50,000 received from aid voted by some townships along the line. The mortgage bonds involved in this litigation represent this $1,000,000 expended in construction and the accrued interest thereon. The railroad from Yeddo to Fair Oaks was opened for business in April or May, 1884. Prior to the appointment of a receiver, on October 28, 1884, the company did not earn sufficient money to pay its operating expenses. No interest was ever paid on any of the mortgage bonds issued by the company. Crawford never received anything from the company for personal services or expenses, or any repayment of moneys expended by him in constructing the railroad.

On October 27, 1884, John Hack and others filed a creditors' bill in the Circuit Court of Jasper County, Indiana, against the Chicago & Great Southern Railway Company and Henry [662] Crawford. On the same day that court entered an order appointing Philip B. Shumway receiver. Afterwards, on March 5, 1885, Crawford filed his answer in the suit, disclaiming all interest in its result, and upon that answer an order was entered that Crawford recover from the plaintiffs his costs, and that he had no interest in any controversy pertaining to the action. On February 26, 1885, the court removed Shumway and appointed as receiver in his stead William Foster. In the order appointing Foster there was this provision:

"And the court, as a condition of the appointment of said receiver, reserves the right to make any further order respecting the priority and payment of labor and supply claims accruing prior to the receivership herein as may hereafter seem and appear to the court to be equitable and just."

On the 4th of April, 1885, the Hack suit was removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana. On the 9th of March, 1885, Porter filed in that court his bill of complaint against the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company, John C. New, trustee, and others, alleging that New as trustee refused to bring the suit, and praying for the foreclosure of the mortgage of November 1, 1881, and of the deed of further assurance of April 9, 1883. On the 18th of April, 1885, this suit and the Hack suit were consolidated under the title of the Porter suit. On April 29, 1885, and August 15, 1885, orders were entered authorizing the receiver to issue certificates to pay receiver's indebtedness and to make needed repairs and replacements on the railroad. Under these orders receiver's certificates amounting in the aggregate to $153,000 were issued. The railway company filed an answer in the consolidated suit, admitting the averments of the bill. A decree pro confesso was entered against New, trustee. Various creditors of the company were made parties defendant to the bill, some being judgment creditors and some not. Other creditors filed intervening petitions. In May, 1885, the trustees of four townships, two in Benton County and two in Newton County, which had voted aid in the construction of the railroad amounting to about 663] $40,000, applied to the court as trustees of common schools to be made defendants and to be allowed to defend against the foreclosure; but the application was denied.

In June, 1885, the same trustees, as trustees of the townships voting aid, applied to be permitted to defend against the foreclosure as minority stockholders. This application was denied on the ground that under the Statutes of Indiana the individual taxpayers of the townships which had voted aid were entitled to the benefit of the stock, in proportion to the amount of taxes paid by them respectively. Thereupon John W. Swan and Cephas Atkinson, as taxpayers of two townships, applied for leave to become defendants and to defend against the foreclosure. Without disposing of that application the court, on the 17th of August, 1885, entered a decree of foreclosure and sale.

On the 30th of September, 1885, the application of Swan and Atkinson was reheard by the court, and it entered an order admitting Swan and Atkinson as defendants, and allowing them to file their petition and answer. The order contained this provision: "This order shall in nowise affect the decree heretofore made for the sale of the railroad by the court or rights of parties thereunder." Swan and Atkinson filed their petition and sworn answer, charging that the mortgage and the bonds were fraudulently executed and issued, and were without consideration and void, and that Crawford's construction contract was fraudulent and void. On October 8, 1885, Swan and Atkinson and others filed a petition to set aside the foreclosure decree of August 17, 1885, containing substantially the same charges against the mortgage that were contained in the answer of Swan and Atkinson. On the 12th of October, 1885, the court set aside the foreclosure decree and made an order giving the defendants thirty-nine days in which to take their evidence "as to so much of said case as involves the validity of the mortgage and mortgage debts, as the same are described in the bill of said Porter and the defendants' answers." Porter filed a replication to the answer of Swan and Atkinson.

Voluminous testimony was taken, on which
664] the case was heard, and a decree of foreclosure was entered on the 16th of February, 1886. That decree denied the relief prayed by the answer of Swan and Atkinson as stockholders, and dismissed their petition. It declared that 1,200 of the mortgage bonds were issued and delivered by the company to Crawford; that 1,000 thereof were to be accounted for by Crawford under the construction contract; that 200 of them were delivered to Crawford under that contract; that the 1,200 bonds were sold and delivered by Crawford to Porter and his associates; and that the remaining 800 of them had never been issued. It recited the making, delivery and recording of the two mortgages of November 1, 1881, and April 9, 1883; that the company defaulted in paying the interest due July 1, 1882, on the bonds; that there were $291,860 of interest in default upon the bonds issued; and that the mortgages "are valid and binding obligations as against the" company, and a paramount lien on all the property thereby conveyed, "excepting as hereinafter provided." It then proceeded to decree as follows:

"Sixth. That all unpaid valid claims against said railway company, accrued for right of way, lands, labor, rolling stock and material used in the construction and betterment of said railway, whether reduced to judgment or remaining in open account, are hereby adjudged and decreed to be prior, superior and paramount to the lien of the said mortgages or deeds of trust and the bonds secured thereby; that all unpaid valid claims for labor, supplies, rolling stock and material used in the operation of said railway prior to the appointment of a receiver, whether reduced to judgment or remaining in open account, are hereby adjudged and decreed to be prior, superior and paramount in lien to the said lien of said mortgages or deeds of trust and the bonds secured thereby; and all of said claims accrued in the construction of said railway and its betterment; and all of said claims accrued in the operation of said railway, prior to the appointment of a receiver, as hereinabove in this paragraph of this decree described, are hereby adjudged and decreed to be prior, superior and paramount in lien to the lien of any and all receiver's certificates issued under the order of this court in this cause, excepting only receiver's certificates to the amount of twenty-three [665] thousand dollars ($23,000) issued under the order of this court of April 29, A. D., 1885, the proceeds of said certificates other than said twenty-three thousand dollars ($23,000) representing construction or betterment of said railway.

"Seventh. That all court and receiver's indebtedness accrued against said property since the appointment of a receiver is hereby adjudged and decreed to be prior, superior, and paramount in lien to the lien of said mortgages or deeds of trust and the bonds secured thereby."

It then provided for the sale of the mortgaged property at public auction, by a master, for not less than $500,000; for the payment of the purchase money into the registry of the court; and for a reference to the master to take testimony and report his findings and such testimony as to certain specified matters, among which was the following:

"5. The amount due the several claimants under the sixth paragraph of this decree, showing the amount due each claimant and the aggregate amount due upon each of the two classes of the claims mentioned in said sixth paragraph."

On March 27, 1886, the railroad was sold by the master, and bought by Porter, for $501,000 On April 5, 1886, the sale was confirmed by the court, and the purchaser was empowered to pay, as cash, in part payment of the purchase money, all receiver's certificates outstanding, then amounting, with interest, to $157,884.64, the remainder of the purchase money, $343,115.36, being paid in cash.

The reference was had before the master, and much testimony was taken upon it. On August 31, 1886, the master filed his first report under the reference, in which he allowed the following claims at the following amounts: The Cleveland Rolling Mill Company, $29,643.97; Crerar, Adams & Company, $7,809.94; the Smith Bridge Company, $20,900.24; the Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Co. (Limited), $12,944,-20. Porter duly filed exceptions to these allowances. On the 8th of October, 1886, the master filed his report as to the claim of Irwin, allowing it at the sum of $10,950.30. Porter duly excepted to this allowance. On the 9th of October, 1886, on a hearing on the reports and exceptions, the court made the following decree:

"First. That the said five several defendants, claimants, and intervening petitioners hereinbefore named, have each done work or furnished materials which have been used in the construction and betterment of the railway of said Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company prior to the appointment of the receiver therefor, which respective claims for such labor and material are valid claims against said railway company to the amounts hereinafter named, and which said amounts are adjudged and decreed to be valid claims under and in pursuance of the sixth paragraph of the decree heretofore, on the 16th day of February, 1886, entered in this cause, prior and superior and paramount to the lien of the mortgages or deeds of trust in said decree mentioned and the bonds secured thereby.

"Second. And the court further finds that there is now in the registry of this court, to the credit of this cause, the sum of $825,194.27, derived from the sale of said property, and remaining after the payment of all receiver's certificates and certain of the indebtedness incurred by the court since it assumed the control and management of said railroad, and which sum is largely in excess of the total amount of claims filed or proven under the terms of said decree entered on the 16th day of February, 1886, including all unpaid costs and indebtedness incurred by the court since it took possession of said railway property.

"Third. And the court further finds that there is due to the Smith Bridge Company the sum of $20,900.24, with interest to be added from the 27th day of October, 1884, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"That there is due to the Cleveland Rolling Mill Company the sum of $29,643.97, with interest to be added from the 27th day of October, 1884, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"That there is due to Crerar, Adams & Co. the sum of $7,809.94, with interest to be added from the 27th day of October, 1884, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"That there is due to the Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Company the sum of $12,944.20, with interest to be added from the 27th day of October, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"That there is due Volney Q. Irwin the sum of $11,450.30, with interest to be added from the 27th day of October, 1884, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"Which several sums of money are due to said above named parties respectively, for and on account of labor or material used in the construction and betterment of said railway, as provided and set forth in the sixth paragraph of said decree, entered in said cause on the 16th day of February, 1886.

"It is, therefore, finally ordered, adjudged and decreed by the court that the clerk of this court shall pay out of the said fund in the registry of the court to the credit of this cause, the said several sums of money, with interest to be computed thereon, to the said parties, respectively, or their solicitors of record, viz.: To the Smith Bridge Company, the sum of $23,-345.54; to the Cleveland Rolling Mill Company, the sum of $33,112.32; to Crerar, Adams & Co., the sum of $8,723.71; to the Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Company, the sum of $14,458,-65; to Volney Q. Irwin, the sum of $12,789.98.

"Said several payments shall be made, with interest at the rate of 6 per centum per annum from the date of the entry of this decree, in full payment and discharge of said respective claims against said railway property and franchises."

Porter has appealed separately from each of these decrees and orders of payment, and these are the appeals now presented for consideration.

It is alleged that the circuit court erred in decreeing the several claims of these five appellees to be liens on the railroad and property of the original Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company superior to the lien of the mortgage of November 1, 1881; and that it also erred in decreeing these claims to be liens on the railroad and property of the consolidated company superior to the lien of the mortgage of April 9, 1883, conveying the railroad and property formerly known as the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad. [668]

It is urged, in the maintenance of the decree below, that the relations which Crawford sustained towards the several appellees when their claims respectively accrued, and his relations to the railway company, were such as to preclude him from acquiring the mortgage bonds in controversy to the prejudice of the appellees; that his construction contract was fraudulent and void as against the appellees, as creditors of the company; that, as between him and the appellees, he is estopped, by the provisions of his construction contract, from claiming the right to a prior lien upon, or an equal distribution of, the proceeds of sale of the property of the company; that the legal situation was that of a nominal corporation vested with the legal title to its property for the use of Crawford as sole beneficiary; that Dull and McCormick received the bonds subject to the same equities against them which could be urged while they were in Crawford's possession; that the equities of the appellees against the $1,000,000 of bonds, in the hands of Drexel, Morgan & Co., were precisely what they were while the bonds were in the hands of Crawford; that the appellees are entitled, in equity, to be paid out of the assets of the company the amounts of their respective claims in preference to Crawford; that all rights which Nickerson and Porter might have had to be subrogated to the position of Drexel, Morgan & Co. were lost by the syndicate agreement of December 26, 1884; that the legal effect of that agreement was a purchase by Porter directly from Crawford; that the amounts in controversy on these appeals are a part of the purchase price of the securities on such purchase of them by Porter, reserved by him to be paid either to Crawford or to the appellees; that the real controversy here is between Crawford and the First National Bank of Chicago on the one hand and the appellees

669] on the other; that the appellant had no interest in that controversy; that, by the purchase of the securities under the syndicate agreement, Porter was charged with full notice of all the facts from which the equities of the appellees against Crawford and the mortgage bonds arise; that the First National Bank acquired no better rights against the appellees, by the assignment to it of Crawford's interest in the syndicate agreement, than Crawford himself had; that the equities of the appellees to be paid the amounts due to them out of the fund in court are superior to those of Porter, as the nominal party, and to those of Crawford, as the real party; and that Porter, by reason of his ownership and possession of over $700,000 of unpaid capital stock of the company, had no right, as against the appellees, to foreclose the mortgage for the benefit of his bonds until the claims of the appellees should first be paid.

The considerations which seem to us to show that the circuit court erred in awarding priority to the claims of these creditors over the mortgage bonds, are few and controlling.

The mortgages and the bonds are valid and binding as against the company; the company owes a large debt for the construction of its road, which is represented by the bonds; there was no bad faith, irregularity, deceit or fraud in the execution of the mortgages or in the issuing of the bonds thereunder; the bonds in the hands of Porter represent actual values received by the company; they represent the entire purchase money that was paid for the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad, extending south from Attica to Yeddo; they represent all the money that was paid directly by Drexel, Morgan & Co., through their agent, for the construction of the railroad north of Attica, a considerable portion of which money was paid to these five appellees; they represent all the money that was paid by Crawford out of his own means for the construction of the new railroad north of Attica; in fact, they represent all the money that has ever been paid by the company for the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad and for the construction of the sixty miles of 670] new road from Attica to Fair Oaks, excepting only some $40,000 or $50,000 received from aid voted by townships.

To the objection, that, at the time the mortgage of November 1, 1881, was executed and the bonds were issued, Crawford owned the entire stock of the company and dominated the board of directors, and that the mortgage and bonds were issued under his dictation and coercion, even if such an objection could be legally tenable, it is a sufficient answer, that, when the mortgage was made, and the $1,000,000 of bonds were issued and pledged to Dull and McCormick, Crawford was not a director or officer of the company. Foster was its president, and he and his associates constituted the entire board of directors, and they remained in full control until March 15, 1882. That this board was not dominated or controlled by Crawford is shown by the fact that when, on February 7, 1882, eleven days after Crawford had delivered in pledge to Dull and McCormick the $1,000,000 of bonds, Crawford asked the board to enter into a construction contract with him, and sent them a draft of the contract which he desired, the board unanimously rejected it. At the time the mortgage was executed, and at the time the bonds were issued and pledged to Dull and McCormick, Crawford held $50,250 par value of the stock and Foster held $10,000 par value of it. The mere fact that Crawford owned a majority of the stock did not give him the legal control of the company; nor from such ownership can the legal inference be drawn that he dominated the board of directors. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 115 U. S. 587, 596 [29:499, 501].

The circumstances attending the issuing of the $1,000,000 of bonds show that they were issued by Foster and his board of directors in good faith, and largely for indebtedness of the company then existing. There is no foundation for the suggestion that the mortgage and the bonds were without consideration; nor does it lie in the mouths of these appellees to raise the objection as to the absence of a legal board of directors of the company; for, if the mortgage and the bonds are invalid for want of such legal board, and for want of the legal existence of the corporation, the contracts between these appellees and the company, upon which their claims are based, are invalid for the same reason, and the consolidation by which the company procured the Chicago and Block Coal Company's road would be void, and that road would be free from all debts incurred by the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company. Moreover, the directors were directors de facto, who held themselves out to the world as such, under such circumstances that their [6-official acts bind the corporation and all persons who claim under it.

The claims of the appellees are for the original construction of the railroad. This is not a case where the proceeds of the sale of the property of a railroad, as a completed structure, open for travel and transportation, are to be applied to restore earnings which, instead of having been applied to pay operating expenses and necessary repairs, have been diverted to pay interest on mortgage bonds, and the improvement of the mortgaged property, the debts due for the operating expenses and repairs having remained unpaid when a receiver was appointed. The equitable principles upon which the decisions rest, applying to the payment, out of the proceeds of the sale of railroad property, of such debts for operating expenses and necessary repairs, are not applicable to claims such as the present, accrued for the original construction of a railroad while there was a subsisting mortgage upon it. These five appellees gave credit to the company for their work. It was construction work, and none of it was for operating expenses or repairs, and none of it went towards keeping a completed road in operation, either in the way of labor or of material. When these claims accrued, the road of the company had not been opened for use. The claims accrued after the mortgage had been executed and recorded, and after $1,000,000 of the bonds secured by it had been issued and pledged to innocent bona fide holders for value.

We are not aware of any well considered adjudged case which, in the absence of a statutory provision, holds that unsecured floating debts for construction are a lien on a railroad superior to the lien of a valid mortgage duly recorded, and of bonds secured thereby, and held by bona fide purchasers for value. The authorities are all the other way.

[672] On the facts of this case, the mortgage and the bonds are not affected by the existence of Crawford's construction contract, which was made on the 18th of March, 1882, after the issuing of the bonds and the pledging of them to Dull and McCormick. The amount of those bonds constitute the present value of the entire railroad property. By the construction contract, Crawford, in consideration of the bonds and stock which he was to receive under it, bound himself not only to complete, but to equip the road. The contract was not an unfair one. It was performed in part. Only $200,000 of the bonds were issued after the construction contract was made. At the date of that contract, Crawford was a large creditor of the company for money advanced by him and expended in construction. He had been advancing from his own means large amounts of money, and it was to reimburse to him the $300,000 or $400,000 of his own means already expended in the work, and to enable him to complete the payment for the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad, and to proceed with the work of construction, that the $1,000,000 of bonds were issued to him. All the money received by the company for the bonds went into the property. The property produced by that money has never been worth what was expended in its production. From the date of the construction contract, the company was never able to issue or deliver a single bond under it, except by the consent of Dull and McCormick, or of Drexel, Morgan & Co., the parties who held the bonds and stock in pledge. The advances of money made by Crawford after the date of the construction contract were made without any security to him. Every bond issued after the date of the contract with Drexel, Morgan & Co. was required by that contract to be delivered directly to them, as additional security to them. Crawford realized no profits out of the mortgaged property, and never received anything for his services, or any reimbursement of the large sums of money he expended in this work. On these facts, it is impossible to see that the existence of the construction contract can have any bearing upon the case. Under any circumstances, no contract under which about

[673] sixty miles of railroad had been constructed would be held invalid for the reasons assigned in this case, without the repayment to the contractor of the amount actually expended by him in good faith under the contract. Thomas v. Brownville, Ft. K. & P. R. R. Co. 109 U. S. 522, 526 [27:1018, 1019].

Moreover, it is a well settled principle that subsequent creditors cannot be heard to impeach an executed contract, where their dealings with the the company, of which they claim the benefit, occurred after the contract became an executed contract. Graham v. R. R. Co. 102 U. S. 148 [26:106]. The claims of all the appellees except the Cleveland Rolling Mill Company accrued after the construction contract was made. As to that Company, it, afte construction contract was made, and Crawford was carrying on the work of struction under it, knowingly received o count of its claims money which came dir from Drexel, Morgan & Co., as a result o pledge of the bonds to that firm.

Dull and McCormick, Drexel, Morgan & and Porter were respectively, in succes purchasers in good faith of these bonds, gotiable commercial securities, without n of any irregularity or infirmity in them; an entitled to the benefit of the principles cable under such circumstances. Porter to Drexel, Morgan, & Co. more than $39 in money for the bonds, and, under all cir stances, is entitled to protect his title by t Drexel, Morgan & Co., and through then the title of Dull and McCormick.

It is contended for the appellees that P did not purchase the bonds from Drexel, gan & Co. but bought them directly from ford. The evidence shows that Crawford, January 27, 1882, the date at which he pl the $1,000,000 of bonds to Dull and McCor never had one of those bonds in his possessi under his control. Dull and McCormick Crawford, delivered the bonds to Drexel, gan & Co., upon the payment to them by D Morgan & Co. of the debt due to them on ac of the purchase of the Chicago and Coal Railroad. The $200,000 of bonds i after the negotiation of the loan from D Morgan & Co. were at once delivered to under their contract of pledge. This p vested in them the legal title to the bonds Porter purchased that legal title from them opposition to this view, it is urged tha terms of the written agreement between ford and Porter of December 26, 1884, sho the purchase by Porter was from Crawfor the true purport and effect of that instru is, as before stated, a sale by Crawford to and his associates of Crawford's right to re the bonds from Porter and his associat paying the amount of money which Porte paid to Drexel, Morgan & Co. By the tract of June 25, 1884 between Porter Nickerson and Drexel, Morgan & Co. former bound themselves to pay to the Crawford's debt to them, upon receiving them the stock and bonds which they as collateral to the debt. Nickerson ass to Porter his interest in this contract, and paid to Drexel, Morgan & Co. the an of Crawford's debt to them, and took them the bonds pledged to them by Cra as collateral. By this transaction Port came the owner of the legal title to the b and was subrogated to all the rights of D Morgan & Co. in them. The contract o cember 26, 1884, between Crawford and P merely extinguished Crawford's right deem the pledged bonds. Under these ci stances, whatever it was that Porter purc from Crawford, the former would, in e be subrogated to all the rights of Drexel, gan & Co., and, through them, to all the of Dull and McCormick.

Certain clauses in the agreement be Crawford and Porter of December 26, 188 cited as creating an equity or lien in fa the appellees. By one clause in the agre the syndicate represented by Porter agrees: "Second. To pay and clear off any and all claims against said Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company which may be decided by the court to be liens upon the said line of railway paramount to the lien of the bonds and coupons secured by the trust deed to said John C. New, dated November 1, 1881, or which the court may decide shall be equitably payable out of the proceeds of the sale of the said line of railway prior to any payment of the said bonds or coupons, including therein any and all claims for right of way and depot grounds, engine house and station buildings, water tanks and shops, between Fair Oaks and Yeddo, both inclusive, bridges and other structures heretofore built and put in place on said railway, and essential to the operation thereof, but the title to which is not in said railway company, and which the court may decide must be paid for in preference to said bonds, and also any and all indebtedness incurred by the receiver in possession of said property prior to January 15, 1885, and not paid out of moneys earned by the operation of said road prior to January 15, 1885." By the same instrument, Crawford agrees as follows: "Section 5. The party of the first part hereby, in consideration of the premises, guarantees and agrees that the claims, liens, and other possible indebtedness mentioned in subdivision two, which shall be held to be prior in right to payment over said twelve hundred bonds and coupons, shall not in any event exceed the sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000)."

These clauses do not create the lien or equity supposed. They leave the question as to the existence of any such "claims, liens, and other possible indebtedness," mentioned in the agreement, to be adjudicated by the court, and also leave to be decided by the court the question of the priority of such claims over the bonds, and merely provide for the rights of the parties as between themselves in case the court establishes such priority. As before said, the purpose of Crawford, in making the agreement of December 26, 1884, was to protect the second pledge of the bonds and stock to the First National Bank of Chicago, he having put into the construction of the railroad about $100,000 of the money which he had borrowed from the bank; and he immediately assigned to the bank all his interest in the contract with Porter. The contract between Porter and Crawford, and that between Crawford and the bank, having been entered into in contemplation of the purchase of the bonds from Drexel, Morgan & Co. by Porter, the legal relation of the appellees to the company and to its property, as unsecured holders of construction claims, was not affected by these transactions, so as to give them any greater rights against the mortgaged property than they had previously had. In any event, as before said, the bonds would be sustained in 676] the hands of Porter, as a first lien, to the amount actually advanced upon the faith of the pledge of them and expended in constructing the railroad, with interest. It is found by the final decree that there is now in court $325,194.27 derived from the sale of the mortgaged property. All the money advanced by Drexel, Morgan & Co., went directly into this property. The amount paid by Porter to Drexel, Morgan & Co., on January 12, 1885, was $392,363.24, exceeding by $67,168.97 the entire net proceeds in court, saying nothing about interest for over two years on the amount paid by Porter. This view is entirely conclusive of this case, and shows that there is no fund in court arising from the sale of the property that can upon any principle be held applicable to the payment of the construction claims of these appellees; and this is irrespective of the fact that, in addition, Crawford put into this property, in good faith, out of his own individual means, the further sum of $600,000.

It is contended, however, that Crawford was all the time substantially the owner of the entire railroad property, and that the claims of the appellees were debts due to them from Crawford for work and material in constructing his railroad, and that these claimants have a lien, in this way, superior to the lien of the mortgage bonds. In answer to this view, in addition to the suggestions already made, and treating Crawford as the owner of the railroad, it may be said that the rights of Porter would be no different from his rights as dealing with the company as owner of the property. The delivery by Crawford of the bonds secured by a mortgage made by himself on the railroad, to a third person, for a valuable consideration, made the mortgage a valid security, and made the bonds in the hands of Dull and McCormick a valid lien on the railroad. An owner of a railroad, though he may be in debt to those who aid in constructing it by furnishing materials, may still execute a mortgage on it which will be good against unsecured creditors. No more than this was done, upon the theory we are now considering. The creditors would have no lien superior to the lien of the bonds. The mortgage was recorded, and the $1,000,000 of bonds were issued before the claims accrued. It results from these views [677 that the entire purchase money now in court, arising from the foreclosure sale, after paying the costs and the receiver's indebtedness, should be paid out upon the bonds and coupons secured by the mortgage, in preference to the payment of the claims of the appellees, such net amount being less than the amount of money advanced by Drexel, Morgan & Co. on the pledge of the bonds and reimbursed to them by Porter.

It has been contended for the appellees, that the appeals by Porter now under consideration are appeals only from the decree of October 9, 1886; that he did not perfect any appeal from the decree of February 16, 1886; that the latter decree was a final decree; that the errors which Porter now insists on were errors committed in entering the decree of February 16, 1886; and that none of the errors now assigned can be considered by this court, because of the want of any appeal from the decree of February 16, 1886, and because the adjudications now complained of were made by that decree, and not by the decree of October 9, 1886.

It is a sufficient answer to these contentions to say that the decree of February 16, 1886, though a final decree of foreclosure and sale as respected the interest of the mortgagor, and in some other respects, was not a final decree in respect of the matters involved in these appeals. The sixth clause of that decree merely provided that all unpaid, valid claims against the company for right of way, lands, labor, rolling stock and material used in the construction and betterment of the railway were prior, superior and paramount to the lien of the mortgages and the bonds; but determined nothing as to who were the holders of such claims, or as to what were their amounts. It designated no persons who could be appellees in any appeal by Porter in respect of such claims, and it provided for a reference to ascertain who were the several claimants under the sixth paragraph of the decree, and what were the amounts due to them severally. The first and only decree from which Porter could appeal, in respect of the claims of these appellees, was the decree of October 9, 1886. The sale made under the decree of February 16, 1886, was not made subject to 8] any claim of any of these appellees. An amendment of that decree, made on the 2d of March, 1886, prior to the sale, provided "that the sale of the property hereinbefore ordered shall pass to the purchaser a title thereto free and discharged of all liens and claims, including the two classes of claims mentioned in the sixth paragraph of said decree." The question of the existence and priority of those claims is, therefore, one open for consideration on these appeals.

The various questions above stated as being raised by the appellees, which are not particularly adverted to, have been fully considered, and it is not regarded as necessary to further remark upon them, or upon the special points made in regard to the particular claims of the appelles, as the views on which we have rested the case seem to us to be controlling on those questions and points.

The decree of the Circuit Court, made October 9, 1886, is reversed, in so far as it decrees that the claims of the five appellees are prior, superior, and paramount to the lien of the mortgages or deeds of trust mentioned in the decree of February 16, 1886, and of the bonds secured thereby; and in so far as it provides for the payment to the appellees, out of the fund in the registry of the court, of the several sums of money specified in the said decree of the 9th of October, 1886; and the case is remanded to the circuit court, with a direction to take such further proceedings as shall not be inconsistent with this opinion.

company were made parties defendant to the bill, some being judgment creditors and some not. Other creditors filed intervening petitions. In May, 1885, the trustees of four townships, two in Benton County and two in Newton County, which had voted aid in the construction of the railroad amounting to about [663] $40,000, applied to the court as trustees of common schools to be made defendants and to be allowed to defend against the foreclosure; but the application was denied.

In June, 1885, the same trustees, as trustees of the townships voting aid, applied to be permitted to defend against the foreclosure as minority stockholders. This application was denied on the ground that under the Statutes of Indiana the individual taxpayers of the townships which had voted aid were entitled to the benefit of the stock, in proportion to the amount of taxes paid by them respectively. Thereupon John W. Swan and Cephas Atkinson, as taxpayers of two townships, applied for leave to become defendants and to defend against the foreclosure. Without disposing of that application the court, on the 17th of August, 1885, entered a decree of foreclosure and sale.

On the 30th of September, 1885, the application of Swan and Atkinson was reheard by the court, and it entered an order admitting Swan and Atkinson as defendants, and allowing them to file their petition and answer. The order contained this provision: "This order shall in nowise affect the decree heretofore made for the sale of the railroad by the court or rights of parties thereunder." Swan and Atkinson filed their petition and sworn answer, charging that the mortgage and the bonds were fraudulently executed and issued, and were without consideration and void, and that Crawford's construction contract was fraudulent and void. On October 8, 1885, Swan and Atkinson and others filed a petition to set aside the foreclosure decree of August 17, 1885, containing substantially the same charges against the mortgage that were contained in the answer of Swan and Atkinson. On the 12th of October, 1885, the court set aside the foreclosure decree and made an order giving the defendants thirty-nine days in which to take their evidence "as to so much of said case as involves the validity of the mortgage and mortgage debts, as the same are described in the bill of said Porter and the defendants' answers." Porter filed a replication to the answer of Swan and Atkinson.

Voluminous testimony was taken, on which
[664] the case was heard, and a decree of foreclosure was entered on the 16th of February, 1886. That decree denied the relief prayed by the answer of Swan and Atkinson as stockholders, and dismissed their petition. It declared that 1,200 of the mortgage bonds were issued and delivered by the company to Crawford; that 1,000 thereof were to be accounted for by Crawford under the construction contract; that 200 of them were delivered to Crawford under that contract; that the 1,200 bonds were sold and delivered by Crawford to Porter and his associates; and that the remaining 800 of them had never been issued. It recited the making, delivery and recording of the two mortgages of November 1, 1881, and April 9, 1883; that the company defaulted in paying the interest due July 1, 1882, on the bonds; that there were $291,860 of interest in default upon the bonds issued; and that the mortgages "are valid and binding obligations as against the" company, and a paramount lien on all the property thereby conveyed, "excepting as hereinafter provided." It then proceeded to decree as follows:

"Sixth. That all unpaid valid claims against said railway company, accrued for right of way, lands, labor, rolling stock and material used in the construction and betterment of said railway, whether reduced to judgment or remaining in open account, are hereby adjudged and decreed to be prior, superior and paramount to the lien of the said mortgages or deeds of trust and the bonds secured thereby; that all unpaid valid claims for labor, supplies, rolling stock and material used in the operation of said railway prior to the appointment of a receiver, whether reduced to judgment or remaining in open account, are hereby adjudged and decreed to be prior, superior and paramount in lien to the said lien of said mortgages or deeds of trust and the bonds secured thereby; and all of said claims accrued in the construction of said railway and its betterment; and all of said claims accrued in the operation of said railway, prior to the appointment of a receiver, as hereinabove in this paragraph of this decree described, are hereby adjudged and decreed to be prior, superior and paramount in lien to the lien of any and all receiver's certificates issued under the order of this court in this cause, excepting only receiver's certificates to the amount of twenty-three [665] thousand dollars ($23,000) issued under the order of this court of April 29, A. D., 1885, the proceeds of said certificates other than said twenty-three thousand dollars ($23,000) representing construction or betterment of said railway.

"Seventh. That all court and receiver's indebtedness accrued against said property since the appointment of a receiver is hereby adjudged and decreed to be prior, superior, and paramount in lien to the lien of said mortgages or deeds of trust and the bonds secured thereby."

It then provided for the sale of the mortgaged property at public auction, by a master, for not less than $500,000; for the payment of the purchase money into the registry of the court; and for a reference to the master to take testimony and report his findings and such testimony as to certain specified matters, among which was the following:

"5. The amount due the several claimants under the sixth paragraph of this decree, showing the amount due each claimant and the aggregate amount due upon each of the two classes of the claims mentioned in said sixth paragraph."

On March 27, 1886, the railroad was sold by the master, and bought by Porter, for $501,000. On April 5, 1886, the sale was confirmed by the court, and the purchaser was empowered to pay, as cash, in part payment of the purchase money, all receiver's certificates outstanding, then amounting, with interest, to $157,884.64, the remainder of the purchase money, $343,115.36, being paid in cash.

The reference was had before the master, and much testimony was taken upon it. On August 31, 1886, the master filed his first report under the reference, in which he allowed the following claims at the following amounts: The Cleveland Rolling Mill Company, $29,643.97; Crerar, Adams & Company, $7,809.94; the Smith Bridge Company, $20,900.24; the Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Co. (Limited), $12,944.20. Porter duly filed exceptions to these allowances. On the 8th of October, 1886, the master filed his report as to the claim of Irwin, allowing it at the sum of $10,950.30. Porter duly excepted to this allowance. On the 9th of October, 1886, on a hearing on the reports [666] and exceptions, the court made the following decree:

"First. That the said five several defendants, claimants, and intervening petitioners hereinbefore named, have each done work or furnished materials which have been used in the construction and betterment of the railway of said Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company prior to the appointment of the receiver therefor, which respective claims for such labor and material are valid claims against said railway company to the amounts hereinafter named, and which said amounts are adjudged and decreed to be valid claims under and in pursuance of the sixth paragraph of the decree heretofore, on the 16th day of February, 1886, entered in this cause, prior and superior and paramount to the lien of the mortgages or deeds of trust in said decree mentioned and the bonds secured thereby.

"Second. And the court further finds that there is now in the registry of this court, to the credit of this cause, the sum of $325,194.27, derived from the sale of said property, and remaining after the payment of all receiver's certificates and certain of the indebtedness incurred by the court since it assumed the control and management of said railroad, and which sum is largely in excess of the total amount of claims filed or proven under the terms of said decree entered on the 16th day of February, 1886, including all unpaid costs and indebtedness incurred by the court since it took possession of said railway property.

"Third. And the court further finds that there is due to the Smith Bridge Company the sum of $20,900.24, with interest to be added from the 27th day of October, 1884, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"That there is due to the Cleveland Rolling Mill Company the sum of $29,643.97, with interest to be added from the 27th day of October, 1884, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"That there is due to Crerar, Adams & Co. the sum of $7,809.94, with interest to be added from the 27th day of October, 1884, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"That there is due to the Pittsburgh Bessemer [667] Steel Company the sum of $12,944.20, with interest to be added from the 27th day of October, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"That there is due Volney Q. Irwin the sum of $11,450.30, with interest to be added from the 27th day of October, 1884, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"Which several sums of money are due to said above named parties respectively, for and on account of labor or material used in the construction and betterment of said railway, as provided and set forth in the sixth paragraph of said decree, entered in said cause on the 16th day of February, 1886.

"It is, therefore, finally ordered, adjudged and decreed by the court that the clerk of this court shall pay out of the said fund in the registry of the court to the credit of this cause, the said several sums of money, with interest to be computed thereon, to the said parties, respectively, or their solicitors of record, viz.: To the Smith Bridge Company, the sum of $23,345.54; to the Cleveland Rolling Mill Company, the sum of $33,112.32; to Crerar, Adams & Co., the sum of $8,723.71; to the Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Company, the sum of $14,458.65; to Volney Q. Irwin, the sum of $12,789.98.

"Said several payments shall be made, with interest at the rate of 6 per centum per annum from the date of the entry of this decree, in full payment and discharge of said respective claims against said railway property and franchises."

Porter has appealed separately from each of these decrees and orders of payment, and these are the appeals now presented for consideration.

It is alleged that the circuit court erred in decreeing the several claims of these five appel- [668] lees to be liens on the railroad and property of the original Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company superior to the lien of the mortgage of November 1, 1881; and that it also erred in decreeing these claims to be liens on the railroad and property of the consolidated company superior to the lien of the mortgage of April 9, 1888, conveying the railroad and property formerly known as the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad.

It is urged, in the maintenance of the decree below, that the relations which Crawford sustained towards the several appellees when their claims respectively accrued, and his relations to the railway company, were such as to preclude him from acquiring the mortgage bonds in controversy to the prejudice of the appellees; that his construction contract was fraudulent and void as against the appellees, as creditors of the company; that, as between him and the appellees, he is estopped, by the provisions of his construction contract, from claiming the right to a prior lien upon, or an equal distribution of, the proceeds of sale of the property of the company; that the legal situation was that of a nominal corporation vested with the legal title to its property for the use of Crawford as sole beneficiary; that Dull and McCormick received the bonds subject to the same equities against them which could be urged while they were in Crawford's possession; that the equities of the appellees against the $1,000,000 of bonds, in the hands of Drexel, Morgan & Co., were precisely what they were while the bonds were in the hands of Crawford; that the appellees are entitled, in equity, to be paid out of the assets of the company the amounts of their respective claims in preference to Crawford; that all rights which Nickerson and Porter might have had to be subrogated to the position of Drexel, Morgan & Co. were lost by the syndicate agreement of December 26, 1884; that the legal effect of that agreement was a purchase by Porter directly from Crawford; that the amounts in controversy on these appeals are a part of the purchase price of the securities on such purchase of them by Porter, reserved by him to be paid either to Crawford or to the appellees; that the real controversy here is between Crawford and the First National Bank of Chicago on the one hand and the appellees

[669] on the other; that the appellant had no interest in that controversy; that, by the purchase of the securities under the syndicate agreement, Porter was charged with full notice of all the facts from which the equities of the appellees against Crawford and the mortgage bonds arise; that the First National Bank acquired no better rights against the appellees, by the assignment to it of Crawford's interest in the syndicate agreement, than Crawford himself had; that the equities of the appellees to be paid the amounts due to them out of the fund in court are superior to those of Porter, as the nominal party, and to those of Crawford, as the real party; and that Porter, by reason of his ownership and possession of over $700,000 of unpaid capital stock of the company, had no right, as against the appellees, to foreclose the mortgage for the benefit of his bonds until the claims of the appellees should first be paid.

The considerations which seem to us to show that the circuit court erred in awarding priority to the claims of these creditors over the mortgage bonds, are few and controlling.

The mortgages and the bonds are valid and binding as against the company; the company owes a large debt for the construction of its road, which is represented by the bonds; there was no bad faith, irregularity, deceit or fraud in the execution of the mortgages or in the issuing of the bonds thereunder; the bonds in the hands of Porter represent actual values received by the company; they represent the entire purchase money that was paid for the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad, extending south from Attica to Yeddo; they represent all the money that was paid directly by Drexel, Morgan & Co., through their agent, for the construction of the railroad north of Attica, a considerable portion of which money was paid to these five appellees; they represent all the money that was paid by Crawford out of his own means for the construction of the new railroad north of Attica; in fact, they represent all the money that has ever been paid by the company for the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad and for the construction of the sixty miles of [670] new road from Attica to Fair Oaks, excepting only some $40,000 or $50,000 received from aid voted by townships.

To the objection, that, at the time the mortgage of November 1, 1881, was executed and the bonds were issued, Crawford owned the entire stock of the company and dominated the board of directors, and that the mortgage and bonds were issued under his dictation and coercion, even if such an objection could be legally tenable, it is a sufficient answer, that, when the mortgage was made, and the $1,000,000 of bonds were issued and pledged to Dull and McCormick, Crawford was not a director or officer of the company. Foster was its president, and he and his associates constituted the entire board of directors, and they remained in full control until March 15, 1882. That this board was not dominated or controlled by Crawford is shown by the fact that when, on February 7, 1882, eleven days after Crawford had delivered in pledge to Dull and McCormick the $1,000,000 of bonds, Crawford asked the board to enter into a construction contract with him, and sent them a draft of the contract which he desired, the board unanimously rejected it. At the time the mortgage was executed, and at the time the bonds were issued and pledged to Dull and McCormick, Crawford held $50,250 par value of the stock and Foster held $10,000 par value of it. The mere fact that Crawford owned a majority of the stock did not give him the legal control of the company; nor from such ownership can the legal inference be drawn that he dominated the board of directors. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 115 U. S. 587, 596 [29:499, 501].

The circumstances attending the issuing of the $1,000,000 of bonds show that they were issued by Foster and his board of directors in good faith, and largely for indebtedness of the company then existing. There is no foundation for the suggestion that the mortgage and the bonds were without consideration; nor does it lie in the mouths of these appellees to raise the objection as to the absence of a legal board of directors of the company; for, if the mortgage and the bonds are invalid for want of such legal board, and for want of the legal existence of the corporation, the contracts between these appellees and the company, upon which their claims are based, are invalid for the same reason, and the consolidation by which the company procured the Chicago and Block Coal Company's road would be void, and that road would be free from all debts incurred by the Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company. Moreover, the directors were directors de facto, who held themselves out to the world as such, under such circumstances that their [671] official acts bind the corporation and all persons who claim under it.

The claims of the appellees are for the original construction of the railroad. This is not a case where the proceeds of the sale of the property of a railroad, as a completed structure, open for travel and transportation, are to be applied to restore earnings which, instead of having been applied to pay operating expenses and necessary repairs, have been diverted to pay interest on mortgage bonds, and the improvement of the mortgaged property, the debts due for the operating expenses and repairs having remained unpaid when a receiver was appointed. The equitable principles upon which the decisions rest, applying to the payment, out of the proceeds of the sale of railroad property, of such debts for operating expenses and necessary repairs, are not applicable to claims such as the present, accrued for the original construction of a railroad while there was a subsisting mortgage upon it. These five appellees gave credit to the company for their work. It was construction work, and none of it was for operating expenses or repairs, and none of it went towards keeping a completed road in operation, either in the way of labor or of material. When these claims accrued, the road of the company had not been opened for use. The claims accrued after the mortgage had been executed and recorded, and after $1,000,000 of the bonds secured by it had been issued and pledged to innocent bona fide holders for value.

We are not aware of any well considered adjudged case which, in the absence of a statutory provision, holds that unsecured floating debts for construction are a lien on a railroad superior to the lien of a valid mortgage duly recorded, and of bonds secured thereby, and held by bona fide purchasers for value. The authorities are all the other way.

[672] On the facts of this case, the mortgage and the bonds are not affected by the existence of Crawford's construction contract, which was made on the 18th of March, 1882, after the issuing of the bonds and the pledging of them to Dull and McCormick. The amount of those bonds constitute the present value of the entire railroad property. By the construction contract, Crawford, in consideration of the bonds and stock which he was to receive under it, bound himself not only to complete, but to equip the road. The contract was not an unfair one. It was performed in part. Only $200,000 of the bonds were issued after the construction contract was made. At the date of that contract, Crawford was a large creditor of the company for money advanced by him and expended in construction. He had been advancing from his own means large amounts of money, and it was to reimburse to him the $300,000 or $400,000 of his own means already expended in the work, and to enable him to complete the payment for the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad, and to proceed with the work of construction, that the $1,000,000 of bonds were issued to him. All the money received by the company for the bonds went into the property. The property produced by that money has never been worth what was expended in its production. From the date of the construction contract, the company was never able to issue or deliver a single bond under it, except by the consent of Dull and McCormick, or of Drexel, Morgan & Co., the parties who held the bonds and stock in pledge. The advances of money made by Crawford after the date of the construction contract were made without any security to him. Every bond issued after the date of the contract with Drexel, Morgan & Co. was required by that contract to be delivered directly to them, as additional security to them. Crawford realized no profits out of the mortgaged property, and never received anything for his services, or any reimbursement of the large sums of money he expended in this work. On these facts, it is impossible to see that the existence of the construction contract can have any bearing upon the case. Under any circumstances, no contract under which about

[673] sixty miles of railroad had been constructed would be held invalid for the reasons assigned in this case, without the repayment to the contractor of the amount actually expended by him in good faith under the contract. Thomas v. Brownville, Ft. K. & P. R. R. Co. 109 U. S. 522, 526 [27: 1018, 1019].

Moreover, it is a well settled principle that subsequent creditors cannot be heard to impeach an executed contract, where their dealings with the the company, of which they claim the benefit, occurred after the contract became an executed contract. Graham v. R. R. Co. 102 U. S. 148 [26: 106]. The claims of all the appellees except the Cleveland Rolling Mill Company accrued after the construction contract was made. As to that Company, it, after the construction contract was made, and while Crawford was carrying on the work of construction under it, knowingly received on account of its claims money which came directly from Drexel, Morgan & Co., as a result of the pledge of the bonds to that firm.

Dull and McCormick, Drexel, Morgan & Co., and Porter were respectively, in succession, purchasers in good faith of these bonds, as negotiable commercial securities, without notice of any irregularity or infirmity in them; and are entitled to the benefit of the principles applicable under such circumstances. Porter paid to Drexel, Morgan, & Co. more than $392,000 in money for the bonds, and, under all circumstances, is entitled to protect his title by that of Drexel, Morgan & Co., and through them, by the title of Dull and McCormick.

It is contended for the appellees that Porter did not purchase the bonds from Drexel, Morgan & Co. but bought them directly from Crawford. The evidence shows that Crawford, after January 27, 1882, the date at which he pledged the $1,000,000 of bonds to Dull and McCormick, never had one of those bonds in his possession or under his control. Dull and McCormick, not Crawford, delivered the bonds to Drexel, Morgan & Co., upon the payment to them by Drexel, Morgan & Co. of the debt due to them on account of the purchase of the Chicago and Block Coal Railroad. The $200,000 of bonds issued after the negotiation of the loan from Drexel, Morgan & Co. were at once delivered to them, under their contract of pledge. This pledge vested in them the legal title to the bonds, and Porter purchased that legal title from them. In [674] opposition to this view, it is urged that the terms of the written agreement between Crawford and Porter of December 26, 1884, show that the purchase by Porter was from Crawford; but the true purport and effect of that instrument is, as before stated, a sale by Crawford to Porter and his associates of Crawford's right to redeem the bonds from Porter and his associates by paying the amount of money which Porter had paid to Drexel, Morgan & Co. By the contract of June 25, 1884 between Porter and Nickerson and Drexel, Morgan & Co., the former bound themselves to pay to the latter Crawford's debt to them, upon receiving from them the stock and bonds which they held as collateral to the debt. Nickerson assigned to Porter his interest in this contract, and Porter paid to Drexel, Morgan & Co. the amount of Crawford's debt to them, and took from them the bonds pledged to them by Crawford as collateral. By this transaction Porter became the owner of the legal title to the bonds, and was subrogated to all the rights of Drexel, Morgan & Co. in them. The contract of December 26, 1884, between Crawford and Porter, merely extinguished Crawford's right to redeem the pledged bonds. Under these circumstances, whatever it was that Porter purchased from Crawford, the former would, in equity, be subrogated to all the rights of Drexel, Morgan & Co., and, through them, to all the rights of Dull and McCormick.

Certain clauses in the agreement between Crawford and Porter of December 26, 1884, are cited as creating an equity or lien in favor of the appellees. By one clause in the agreement

the syndicate represented by Porter agrees: "Second. To pay and clear off any and all claims against said Chicago and Great Southern Railway Company which may be decided by the court to be liens upon the said line of railway paramount to the lien of the bonds and coupons secured by the trust deed to said John C. New, dated November 1, 1881, or which the court may decide shall be equitably payable out of the proceeds of the sale of the said line of railway prior to any payment of the said bonds or coupons, including therein any and all claims for right of way and depot grounds, engine house and station buildings, water tanks and shops, between Fair Oaks and Yeddo, both inclusive, bridges and other structures heretofore built and put in place on said railway, and essential to the operation thereof, but the title to which is not in said railway company, and which the court may decide must be paid for in preference to said bonds, and also any and all indebtedness incurred by the receiver in possession of said property prior to January 15, 1885, and not paid out of moneys earned by the operation of said road prior to January 15, 1885." By the same instrument, Crawford agrees as follows: "Section 5. The party of the first part hereby, in consideration of the premises, guarantees and agrees that the claims, liens, and other possible indebtedness mentioned in subdivision two, which shall be held to be prior in right to payment over said twelve hundred bonds and coupons, shall not in any event exceed the sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000)."

These clauses do not create the lien or equity supposed. They leave the question as to the existence of any such "claims, liens, and other possible indebtedness," mentioned in the agreement, to be adjudicated by the court, and also leave to be decided by the court the question of the priority of such claims over the bonds, and merely provide for the rights of the parties as between themselves in case the court establishes such priority. As before said, the purpose of Crawford, in making the agreement of December 26, 1884, was to protect the second pledge of the bonds and stock to the First National Bank of Chicago, he having put into the construction of the railroad about $100,000 of the money which he had borrowed from the bank; and he immediately assigned to the bank all his interest in the contract with Porter. The contract between Porter and Crawford, and that between Crawford and the bank, having been entered into in contemplation of the purchase of the bonds from Drexel, Morgan & Co. by Porter, the legal relation of the appellees to the company and to its property, as unsecured holders of construction claims, was not affected by these transactions, so as to give them any greater rights against the mortgaged property than they had previously had. In any event, as before said, the bonds would be sustained in [676] the hands of Porter, as a first lien, to the amount actually advanced upon the faith of the pledge of them and expended in constructing the railroad, with interest. It is found by the final decree that there is now in court $325,194.27 derived from the sale of the mortgaged property. All the money advanced by Drexel, Morgan & Co., went directly into this property. The amount paid by Porter to Drexel, Morgan & Co., on January 12, 1885, was $392,363.24, exceeding by $67,168.97 the entire net proceeds in court, saying nothing about interest for over two years on the amount paid by Porter. This view is entirely conclusive of this case, and shows that there is no fund in court arising from the sale of the property that can upon any principle be held applicable to the payment of the construction claims of these appellees; and this is irrespective of the fact that, in addition, Crawford put into this property, in good faith, out of his own individual means, the further sum of $600,000.

It is contended, however, that Crawford was all the time substantially the owner of the entire railroad property, and that the claims of the appellees were debts due to them from Crawford for work and material in constructing his railroad, and that these claimants have a lien, in this way, superior to the lien of the mortgage bonds. In answer to this view, in addition to the suggestions already made, and treating Crawford as the owner of the railroad, it may be said that the rights of Porter would be no different from his rights as dealing with the company as owner of the property. The delivery by Crawford of the bonds secured by a mortgage made by himself on the railroad, to a third person, for a valuable consideration, made the mortgage a valid security, and made the bonds in the hands of Dull and McCormick a valid lien on the railroad. An owner of a railroad, though he may be in debt to those who aid in constructing it by furnishing materials, may still execute a mortgage on it which will be good against unsecured creditors. No more than this was done, upon the theory we are now considering. The creditors would have no lien superior to the lien of the bonds. The mortgage was recorded, and the $1,000,000 of bonds were issued before the claims accrued. It results from these views [677] that the entire purchase money now in court, arising from the foreclosure sale, after paying the costs and the receiver's indebtedness, should be paid out upon the bonds and coupons secured by the mortgage, in preference to the payment of the claims of the appellees, such net amount being less than the amount of money advanced by Drexel, Morgan & Co. on the pledge of the bonds and reimbursed to them by Porter.

It has been contended for the appellees, that the appeals by Porter now under consideration are appeals only from the decree of October 9, 1886; that he did not perfect any appeal from the decree of February 16, 1886; that the latter decree was a final decree; that the errors which Porter now insists on were errors committed in entering the decree of February 16, 1886; and that none of the errors now assigned can be considered by this court, because of the want of any appeal from the decree of February 16, 1886, and because the adjudications now complained of were made by that decree, and not by the decree of October 9, 1886.

It is a sufficient answer to these contentions to say that the decree of February 16, 1886, though a final decree of foreclosure and sale as respected the interest of the mortgagor, and in some other respects, was not a final decree in respect of the matters involved in these appeals. The sixth clause of that decree merely provided that all unpaid, valid claims against the company for right of way, lands, labor, rolling stock and material used in the construction and betterment of the railway were prior, superior and paramount to the lien of the mortgages and the bonds; but determined nothing as to who were the holders of such claims, or as to what were their amounts. It designated no persons who could be appellees in any appeal by Porter in respect of such claims, and it provided for a reference to ascertain who were the several claimants under the sixth paragraph of the decree, and what were the amounts due to them severally. The first and only decree from which Porter could appeal, in respect of the claims of these appellees, was the decree of October 9, 1886. The sale made under the decree of February 16, 1886, was not made subject to [678] any claim of any of these appellees. An amendment of that decree, made on the 2d of March, 1886, prior to the sale, provided "that the sale of the property hereinbefore ordered shall pass to the purchaser a title thereto free and discharged of all liens and claims, including the two classes of claims mentioned in the sixth paragraph of said decree." The question of the existence and priority of those claims is, therefore, one open for consideration on these appeals.

The various questions above stated as being raised by the appellees, which are not particularly adverted to, have been fully considered, and it is not regarded as necessary to further remark upon them, or upon the special points made in regard to the particular claims of the appelles, as the views on which we have rested the case seem to us to be controlling on those questions and points.

The decree of the Circuit Court, made October 9, 1886, is reversed, in so far as it decrees that the claims of the five appellees are prior, superior, and paramount to the lien of the mortgages or deeds of trust mentioned in the decree of February 16, 1886, and of the bonds secured thereby; and in so far as it provides for the payment to the appellees, out of the fund in the registry of the court, of the several sums of money specified in the said decree of the 9th of October, 1886; and the case is remanded to the circuit court, with a direction to take such further proceedings as shall not be inconsistent with this opinion.

THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States,

AT

OCTOBER TERM, 1886.

Ex Parte:

[1] In the Matter of GEORGE M. BAIN, JR., Petitioner.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 1-14.)

Habeas corpus—Fifth Amendment, jurisdictional—indictment cannot be changed without resubmission to grand jury—trial on changed indictment, void.

*1. The declaration of article V of the Amendments to the Constitution, that "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury," is jurisdictional; and no court of the United States has authority to try a prisoner without indictment or presentment in such cases.

2. The indictment here referred to is the presentation to the proper court, under oath, by a grand jury, duly impaneled, of a charge describing an offense against the law for which the party charged may be punished.

3. When this indictment is filed with the court no change can be made in the body of the instrument by order of the court, or by the prosecuting attorney, without a resubmission of the case to the grand jury. And the fact that the court may deem the change immaterial, as striking out of surplus words, makes no difference. The instrument, as thus changed, is no longer the indictment of the grand jury which presented it.

4. This was the doctrine of the English Courts under the common law. It is the uniform ruling of the American Courts, except where statutes prescribe a different rule; and it is the imperative requirement of the provision of the Constitution above recited, which would be of little avail if an indictment once found can be changed by the prosecuting officer, with consent of the court, to conform to their views of the necessity of the case.

5. Upon an indictment so changed the court can proceed no farther. There is nothing (in the language of the Constitution) which the prisoner can "be held to answer." A trial on such indictment is void. There is nothing to try.

6. According to principles long settled in this court the prisoner, who stands sentenced to the penitentiary on such trial, is entitled to his discharge by writ of habeas corpus.

[No. 7, Orig.]

Argued March 8, 1887. Decided March 28, 1887.

ON petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Granted.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Richard Walke, Wm. W. Crump, and Leigh R. Page, for petitioner.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., and John Catlett Gibson, contra:

The court will not fail to observe that there is no complaint that the court below did not, in the first instance, have jurisdiction to indict and try the party. And this is the true test of the question of jurisdiction in this court to examine into the case in any respect and for any purpose. Complaint is made that he was not properly and legally indicted and tried, but that is all quite different from the matter of jurisdiction to indict and to try at all.

Efforts like this, to convert this court into one of review for such questions as are here presented, have been made many times from the early history of this court to the present, but without avail.

Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339 (25:676); Siebold's Case, 100 U. S. 371 (25:717); Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U.S. 651 (28:274), Ex parte Bigelow, 113 U. S. 328 (28:1005).

This court will not undertake to say whether the party was legally indicted and legally tried—that is not its province—but merely and only, could the court below indict him at all? It being conceded it could be done, this court will not give an opinion as to the soundness of the decisions or rulings in the trial by the court below.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of [2] the court:

This is an application to this court for a writ of habeas corpus to relieve the petitioner, George M. Bain, Jr., from the custody of Thomas W. Scott, United States Marshal for the Eastern District of Virginia. The original petition set out with particularity proceedings in the Circuit Court of the United States for that district, in which the petitioner was convicted, under section 5209 of the Revised Statutes, of having made a false report or statement as cashier of the Exchange National Bank of Norfolk, Virginia. The petition has annexed to it as an exhibit all the proceedings, so far as they are necessary in the case, from the order for the impaneling of a grand jury to the final judgment of the court sentencing the prisoner to imprisonment for five years in the Albany Penitentiary. Upon this application the court directed a rule to be served upon the marshal to show cause why the writ should not issue, to which that officer made the following return:

"Comes the said Scott, as marshal aforesaid, and states that there is no sufficient showing made by the said Bain that he is illegally held and confined in custody of respondent; but, on the contrary, his confinement is under the judgment and sentence of a court having competent jurisdiction to indict and try him, and he should not be released; and respondent prays the judgment of this court, that the rule entered herein against him be discharged, and the prayer of the petition be denied."

[3] The Attorney-General of the United States and the District Attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia appeared in opposition to the motion, and thus the merits of the case were fully presented upon the application for the issue of the writ.

Upon principles which may be considered to be well settled in this court it can have no right to issue this writ as a means of reviewing the judgment of the circuit court simply upon the ground of error in its proceedings; but if it shall appear that the court had no jurisdiction to render the judgment which it gave, and under which the petitioner is held a prisoner, it is within the power and it will be the duty of this court to order his discharge. The jurisdiction of that court is denied in this case upon two principal grounds: the first of these relates to matters connected with the impaneling of the grand jury and its competency to find the indictment under which the petitioner was convicted; the second refers to a change made in the indictment, after it was found, by striking out some words in it, and then proceeding to try the prisoner upon the indictment as thus changed. We will proceed to examine the latter ground first.

Section 5209 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, under which this indictment is found, reads as follows:

"Every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk, or agent of any association, who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, or credits of the association; or who, without authority from the directors, issues or puts in circulation any of the notes of the association; or who, without such authority, issues or puts forth any certificate of deposit, draws any order or bill of exchange, makes any acceptance, assigns any note, bond, draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment, or decree; or who makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the association, with intent, in either case, to injure or defraud the association or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual person, or to deceive any officer of the association, or any agent appointed to examine the affairs of any such association; and every person who with like intent aids or abets any officer, clerk, or agent in any violation of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be imprisoned not less than five years nor more than ten."

[4] Section 5211 requires every banking association organized under this Act of Congress to "make to the Comptroller of the Currency not less than five reports during each year, verified by the oath or affirmation of the president or cashier of such association, and attested by the signatures of at least three of the directors."

The indictment in this case, which contains but a single count, and is very long, sets out one of these reports, made on the 17th day of March, 1885, by the petitioner, as cashier, and Charles E. Jenkins, John B. Whitehead, and Orlando Windsor, as directors, of the Exchange National Bank of Norfolk, a national banking association. The indictment also points out numerous false statements in this report, which, it is alleged in the early part of it, were made "with intent to injure and defraud the said association and other companies, bodies politic and corporate, and individual persons to the jurors aforesaid unknown, and with the intent then and there to deceive any agent appointed by the Comptroller of the Currency to examine the affairs of said association." Following this allegation come the specifications of the particulars in which the report is false, and the concluding part charges that the defendants, "and each of them, did then and there well know and believe the said report and statement to be false to the extent and in the mode and manner above set forth; and that they, and each of them, made said false statement and report in manner and form as above set forth with intent to deceive the Comptroller of the Currency and the agent appointed to examine the affairs of said association, and to injure, deceive, and defraud the United States and said association and the depositors thereof, and other banks and national banking associations, and divers other persons and associations to the jurors aforesaid unknown, against the peace of the United States and their dignity, and contrary to the form of the statute of the said United States in such case made and provided."

The defendants having been permitted to withdraw the pleas of not guilty which they had entered, were then allowed to demur to the indictment, and, as it is important to be accurate in stating what was done about this demurrer, the transcript of the record on that subject is here inserted:

"United States vs. Geo. M. Bain, Jr., John B. Whitehead, Orlando Windsor and C. E. Jenkins.	Indictment for making false entries, etc.

"This day came the parties, by their attorneys, pursuant to the adjournment order entered herein on the 18th day of November, 1886, and thereupon the defendants, by their counsel, asked leave to withdraw the pleas heretofore entered, which being granted, they submitted their demurrer to the indictment, which, after argument, was sustained; and thereupon, on motion of the United States, by counsel, the court orders that the indictment be amended by striking out the words 'the Comptroller of the Currency and' therein contained.

"Thereupon, on motion of John B. Whitehead and C. E. Jenkins, by their counsel, for a severance of trial, it was ordered by the court that the case be so severed that George M. Bain, Jr., cashier and director, be tried separately from John B. Whitehead, Orlando Windsor and C. E. Jenkins, directors.

"Thereupon the trial of George M. Bain, Jr., was taken up, and the said defendant, George M. Bain, Jr., entered his plea of not guilty."

This was done December 13, 1886, thirteen months after the presentment of the indictment by the grand jury, and probably long after it had been discharged.

A verdict of guilty was found against Bain, a motion for a new trial was made, and then a motion in arrest of judgment, both of which were overruled. The opinion of the circuit judge on the question which we are about to consider, delivered in overruling that motion, is found in the record.

The proposition, that in the courts of the United States any part of the body of an indictment can be amended after it has been found and presented by a grand jury, either by order of the court or on the request of the prosecuting attorney, without being resubmitted to them for their approval, is one requiring serious consideration. Whatever judicial precedents there may have been for such action in other courts, we are at once confronted with the fifth [6] of those articles of amendment, adopted early after the Constitution itself was formed, and which were manifestly intended mainly for the security of personal rights. This article begins its enumeration of these rights by declaring that "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous, crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury," except in a class of cases of which this is not one.

We are thus not left to the requirements of the common law in regard to the necessity of a grand jury or a trial jury, but there is the positive and restrictive language of the great fundamental instrument by which the national government is organized, that "no person shall be held to answer" for such a crime, "unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury."

But even at common law it is beyond question that in the English courts indictments could not be amended. The authorities upon this subject are numerous and unambiguous. In the great case of Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burr. 2527, tried in 1770, which attracted an immense deal of public attention, Wilkes, after being convicted by a jury of having printed and caused to be published a seditious and scandalous libel, was brought up before the court of King's Bench on a motion to set aside the verdict, on the ground that an amendment had been made in the language of the information on which he was tried. In the course of an opinion delivered by Lord Mansfield overruling the motion, he remarks, on this subject (page 2569), that "There is a great difference between amending indictments and amending informations. Indictments are found upon the oaths of a jury, and ought only to be amended by themselves; but informations are as declarations in the King's suit. An officer of the Crown has the right of framing them originally; he may, with leave, amend in like manner as any plaintiff may do."

Mr. Justice Yates, on the same occasion, said that indictments, being upon oath, cannot be amended.

Hawkins, in his Pleas of the Crown, Book 2, chap. 25, sec. 97, says:

"I take it to be settled that no criminal [7] prosecution is within the benefit of any of the statutes of amendments; from whence it follows that no amendment can be admitted in any such prosecution but such only as is allowed by the common law. And agreeably hereto I find it laid down as a principle in some books that the body of an indictment removed into the King's Bench from any inferior court whatsoever, except only those of London, can in no case be amended. But it is said that the body of an indictment from London may be amended, because, by the city charter, a tenor of the record only can be removed from thence."

He further says, in section 98:

"It seems to have been anciently the common practice, where an indictment appeared to be insufficient, either for its uncertainty or the want of proper legal words, not to put the defendant to answer it; but if it were found in the same county in which the court sat, to award process against the grand jury to come into court and amend it. And it seems to be the common practice at this day, while the grand jury who found a bill is before the court, to amend it, by their consent, in a matter of form, as the name or addition of the party."

This language is repeated in Starkie's Criminal Pleading, p. 287. There are, however, several cases in which it has been decided that the caption of an indictment may be amended, and we therefore give here the language of Starkie, p. 258, as describing what is meant by the phrase "caption of an indictment."

"Where an inferior court," he says, "in obedience to a writ of certiorari from the King's Bench, transmits the indictment to the Crown office, it is accompanied with a formal history of the proceeding, describing the court before which the indictment was found, the jurors by whom it was found, and the time and place where it was found. This instrument, termed a schedule, is annexed to the indictment, and both are sent to the Crown office. The history of the proceedings, as copied or extracted from the schedule, is called the caption, and is entered of record immediately before the indictment."

It will be seen that, as thus explained, the caption is no part of the instrument found by the grand jury.

Wharton, in his work on Criminal Pleading and Practice, section 90, says: "No inconsider- [8] able portion of the difficulties in the way of the criminal pleader at common law have been removed in England by the 7th Geo. 4, chap. 64, §§ 20, 21; 11 & 12 Vict. chap. 46, and 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 100, and in most of the States of American Union, by statutes, containing similar provisions." He also cites cases in the English courts, where amendments have been made under those statutes; but they can have no force as authority in this country, even if they permitted such amendments as the one under consideration.

No authority has been cited to us in the American courts which sustains the right of a court to amend any part of the body of an indictment without reassembling the grand jury, unless by virtue of a statute. On the contrary, in the case of Commonwealth v. Child, 13 Pick. 200, Chief Justice Shaw says: "It is a well settled rule of law that the statute respecting amendments does not extend to indictments; that a defective indictment cannot be aided by a verdict; and that an indictment bad on demurrer must be held insufficient upon a motion in arrest of judgment."

In the case of the Commonwealth v. Mahar, 16 Pick. 120, the court, having held upon the arraignment of the defendant that the indictment was defective, the Attorney-General moved to amend it, and the prisoner's counsel consented that the name of William Hayden, as the owner of the house in which the offense had been committed, should be inserted, not intending, however, to admit that Hayden was in fact the owner. "But the court were of opinion that this was a case in which an amendment could not be allowed, even with the consent of the prisoner."

In the case of Commonwealth v. Drew, 8 Cush. 279, Chief Justice Shaw said: "Where it is found that there is some mistake in an indictment, as a wrong name or addition, or the like, and the grand jury can be again appealed to, as there can be no amendment of an indictment by the court, the proper course is for the grand jury to return a new indictment, avoiding the defects of the first."

In the case of the State v. Sexton, 3 Hawks, [9] Law & Equity (N. C.), 184, the Supreme Court of that State said: "It is a familiar rule that the indictment should state that the defendant committed the offense on a specific day and year; but it is unnecessary to prove, in any case, the precise day and year, except where the time enters into the nature of the offense. But if the indictment lay the offense to have been committed on an impossible day, or on a future day, the objection is as fatal as if no time at all had been inserted. Nor are indictments within the operation of the statutes of jeofails, and cannot therefore be amended; being the finding of a jury upon oath, the court cannot amend without the concurrence of the grand jury by whom the bill is found. These rules are too plain to require authority, and show that the judgment of the court was right, and must be affirmed."

It will be perceived that the amendment in that case had reference to a matter which the law did not require to be proved, as it was alleged, and which to that extent was not material.

The same proposition was held in the New York Court of General Sessions, in the case of People v. Campbell, 4 Parker, Crim. Rep. 387, where it was laid down that the averments in an indictment could not be changed, even by consent of the defendant.

The learned judge who presided in the circuit court, at the time the change was made in this indictment, says that the court allowed the words "Comptroller of the Currency and" to be stricken out as surplusage, and required the defendant to plead to the indictment as it then read. The opinion which he rendered on the motion in arrest of judgment, referring to this branch of the case, rests the validity of the court's action in permitting the change in the indictment, upon the ground that the words stricken out were surplusage, and were not at all material to it, and that no injury was done to the prisoner by allowing such change to be made. He goes on to argue that the grand jury would have found the indictment without this language. But it is not for the court to say whether they would or not. The party can only be tried upon the indictment as found [10] by such grand jury, and especially upon all its language found in the charging part of that instrument. While it may seem to the court, with its better instructed mind in regard to what the statute requires to be found as to the intent to deceive, that it was neither necessary nor reasonable that the grand jury should attach importance to the fact that it was the Comptroller who was to be deceived, yet it is not impossible nor very improbable that the grand jury looked mainly to that officer as the party whom the prisoner intended to deceive by a report which was made upon his requisition and returned directly to him. As we have already seen, the statute requires these reports to be made to the Comptroller at least five times a year, and the averment of the indictment is that this report was made and returned to that officer in response to his requisition for it. How can the court say that there may not have been more than one of the jurors who found this indictment who was satisfied that the false report was made to deceive the Comptroller, but was not convinced that it was made to deceive anybody else? And how can it be said that, with these words stricken out, it is the indictment which was found by the grand jury? If it lies within the province of a court to change the charging part of an indictment to suit its own notions of what it ought to have been, or what the grand jury would probably have made it if their attention had been called to suggested changes, the great importance which the common law attaches to an indictment by a grand jury, as a prerequisite to a prisoner's trial for a crime, and without which the Constitution says "no person shall be held to answer," may be frittered away until its value is almost destroyed.

The importance of the part played by the grand jury in England cannot be better illustrated than by the language of Justice Field in a charge to a grand jury reported in 2 Sawy. C. C. 667:

"The institution of the grand jury," he says, "is of very ancient origin in the history of England—it goes back many centuries. For a long period its powers were not clearly defined; and it would seem from the accounts of commentators on the laws of that country that it was at first a body which not only accused, but [11] which also tried, public offenders. However this may have been in its origin, it was at the time of the settlement of this country an informing and accusing tribunal only, without whose previous action no person charged with a felony could, except in certain special cases, be put upon his trial. And in the struggles which at times arose in England between the powers of the King and the rights of the subject, it often stood as a barrier against persecution in his name; until, at length, it came to be regarded as an institution by which the subject was rendered secure against oppression from unfounded prosecutions of the Crown. In this country, from the popular character of our institutions, there has seldom been any contest between the government and the citizen which required the existence of the grand jury as a protection against oppressive action of the government. Yet the institution was adopted in this country, and is continued from considerations similar to those which give to it its chief value in England, and is designed as a means, not only of bringing to trial persons accused of public offenses upon just grounds, but also as a means of protecting the citizen against unfounded accusation, whether it come from government, or be prompted by partisan passion or private enmity. No person shall be required, according to the fundamental law of the country, except in the cases mentioned, to answer for any of the higher crimes unless this body, consisting of not less than sixteen nor more than twenty-three good and lawful men, selected from the body of the district, shall declare upon careful deliberation, under the solemnity of an oath, that there is good reason for his accusation and trial."

The case of Hurtado v. People of California, 110 U. S. 516 [28:232], was a writ of error to the Supreme Court of that State by a party who had been convicted of the crime of murder in the state court upon an information instead of an indictment. The writ of error from this court was founded on the proposition that the provision of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, that no State shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law," required an indictment as necessary to due proc-
[12] ess of law. This court held otherwise, and that it was within the power of the States to provide punishment of all manner of crimes without indictment by a grand jury. The nature and value of a grand jury, both in this country and in the English system of law, were much discussed in that case, with references to Coke, Magna Charta, and to other sources of information on that subject, both in the opinion of the court and in an exhaustive review of that question by Mr. Justice Harlan in a dissenting opinion.

It has been said that, since there is no danger to the citizen from the oppressions of a monarch, or of any form of executive power, there is no longer need of a grand jury. But, whatever force may be given to this argument, it remains true that the grand jury is as valuable as ever in securing, in the language of Chief Justice Shaw (in the case of Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray, 329), "individual citizens from an open and public accusation of crime, and from the trouble, expense, and anxiety of a public trial before a probable cause is established by the presentment and indictment of such a jury; and in case of high offenses it is justly regarded as one of the securities to the innocent against hasty, malicious and oppressive public prosecutions."

It is never to be forgotten that in the construction of the language of the Constitution here relied on, as indeed in all other instances where construction becomes necessary, we are to place ourselves as nearly as possible in the condition of the men who framed that instrument. Undoubtedly the framers of this article had for a long time been absorbed in considering the arbitrary encroachments of the Crown on the liberty of the subject, and were imbued with the common-law estimate of the value of the grand jury as part of its system of criminal jurisprudence. They, therefore, must be understood to have used the language which they did in declaring that no person should be called to answer for any capital or otherwise infamous crime, except upon an indictment or presentment of a grand jury, in the full sense of its necessity and of its value. We are of the opinion that an indictment found by a grand jury was indispensable to the power of the court to [13] try the petitioner for the crime with which he was charged. The sentence of the court was that he should be imprisoned in the penitentiary at Albany. The case of Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 418 [29:89], and the later one of Mackin v. U. S. 117 U. S. 348 [29:909], establish the proposition that this prosecution was for an infamous crime within the meaning of the constitutional provision.

It only remains to consider whether this change in the indictment deprived the court of the power of proceeding to try the petitioner and sentence him to the imprisonment provided for in the statute. We have no difficulty in holding that the indictment on which he was tried was no indictment of a grand jury. The decisions which we have already referred to, as well as sound principle, require us to hold that after the indictment was changed it was no longer the indictment of the grand jury who presented it. Any other doctrine would place the rights of the citizen, which were intended to be protected by the constitutional provision, at the mercy or control of the court or prosecuting attorney; for, if it be once held that changes can be made by the consent or the order of the court in the body of the indictment as presented by the grand jury, and the prisoner can be called upon to answer to the indictment as thus changed, the restriction which the Constitution places upon the power of the court, in regard to the prerequisite of an indictment, in reality no longer exists. It is of no avail, under such circumstances, to say that the court still has jurisdiction of the person and of the crime; for, though it has possession of the person, and would have jurisdiction of the crime, if it were properly presented by indictment, the jurisdiction of the offense is gone, and the court has no right to proceed any further in the progress of the case for want of an indictment. If there is nothing before the court which the prisoner, in the language of the Constitution, can be "held to answer," he is then entitled to be discharged so far as the offense originally presented to the court by the indictment is concerned. The power of the court to proceed to try the prisoner is as much arrested as if the indictment had been dismissed or a nolle prosequi had been entered. There was nothing be-[14] fore the court on which it could hear evidence or pronounce sentence. The case comes within the principles laid down by this court in Ex parte Lange, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 163 [21:872]; Ex parte Parks, 93 U. S. 18 [23:787]; Ex parte Wilson [supra], and other cases.

These views dispense with the necessity of examining into the questions argued before us concerning the formation of the grand jury and its removal from place to place within the district.

We are of opinion that the petitioner is entitled to the writ of habeas corpus, and it is accordingly granted.

v.
ANSON SEARLS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 14-17.)

Patents—infringement—reissue No. 5400, void—fines for violation of preliminary injunction for benefit of complainant—jurisdiction of this court to review orders imposing—section 725 R. S. —discretion.

1. The claim of original letters patent No. 70627, for an improvement in whip sockets, is not infringed by the device covered by letters patent No. 70075.

2. The reissue of said letters patent No. 70627 is void, its claims being an unlawful expansion of the original, and designed to cover the device claimed in said letters patent No. 70075.

3. Section 725 R. S. does not make the action of the court below, in imposing fines for the violation of a preliminary injunction, such a matter of discretion as to prevent this court from reviewing its orders imposing such fines.

4. Fines nominally imposed as a punishment for a contempt, in the violation of a preliminary injunction, but in fact imposed for the benefit of the complainant and measured by the damages he had sustained and expenses he had incurred, cannot be sustained.

Argued March 16, 17. Decided March 28, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan. Opinion below, 11 Fed. Rep. 501. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Charles J. Hunt and Thomas S. Sprague, for appellants:

A reissue in which the specification contains new matter, or the claims are enlarged, is void. Gill v. Wells, 89 U. S. 22 Wall, 1 (22:699); Burr v. Duryee, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 531 (17:650); Case v. Brown, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 320 (17:817); McMurray v. Mallory, 111 U. S. 97 (28:365); Torrent & Arms L. Co. v. Rodgers, 112 U. S. 659 (28:842); Wood Paper Patent, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 566 (23:31); Powder Co. v. Powder Works, 98 U. S. 126 (25:77); Ball v. Langles, 102 U. S. 128 (26:104); James v. Campbell, 104 U. S. 356 (26:786); Heald v. Rice, 104 U. S. 737 (26:910).

A reissue with expanded claims is lost when the application for the reissue is made, as in this case, more than five years after the date of the original letters patent.

Miller v. Brass Co. 104 U. S. 350 (26:783); Bantz v. Frantz, 105 U. S. 160 (26:1013); James v. Campbell, supra; Mahn v. Harwood, 112 U. S. 354 (28:665); Clements v. Odorless Excavating etc. Co. 109 U. S. 641 (27:1060).

If the proceedings to punish the defendants, appellants, had been in the name of the United States, to fine the defendants for the contempt, they would have had to pay the fine, and the case would not have been appealable; but being orders in the case they must come up with the case, on appeal after the final decree.

Hayes v. Fischer, 102 U. S. 121 (26:95).

Mr. J. P. Fitch, for appellee.

[15] Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan, by Anson Searls against Alva Worden and John S. Worden, for the alleged infringement of reissued letters patent No. 5400, granted to Erastus W. Scott and Anson Searls, May 6, 1873, for an "improvement in whip sockets," on an application for reissue filed January 16, 1873, the original letters patent, No. 70627, having been granted to E. W. Scott, November 5, 1867, on an application filed August 23, 1867. One of the defenses set up in the answer is that the reissued letters patent are not for the same invention as that described and claimed in the original letters patent, and contain new matter not contained or claimed in the original.

The specification and claim and drawings of the original patent are as follows:

"Be it known that I, E. W. Scott, of Wauregan, in the County of Windham and State of Connecticut, have invented a new and useful improvement in whip sockets; and I do hereby declare that the following is a full, clear, [16] and exact description thereof, which will enable others skilled in the art to make and use the same, reference being had to the accompanying drawings, and to the letters of reference marked thereon.

This invention relates to a new and improved fastening applied to a whip socket in such a manner as to hold the whip firmly therein, prevent it from moving or shaking laterally, and at the same time not interfere in the least with its ready insertion in the socket and its withdrawal therefrom. In the accompanying sheet of drawings, Figure 1 is a vertical central section of my invention taken in the line a x, Fig. 2; Fig. 2, an external view of the same. Similar letters of reference indicate like parts.

The whip socket A may be made of cast iron, hard rubber, or any of the materials now used for such purpose. Cast iron, however, would probably be the preferable material. The socket may have an opening, a, at its bottom, to admit of the escape of water, dust, etc., and in the side of the socket there is an opening or slot, d, extending nearly its whole height or length. In this slot there is secured a fulcrum pin, b, a lever, B, which is slightly curved, as shown clearly in Fig. 1, the fulcrum pin being [17] rather below the center of the lever, and the latter provided with a projection, b', near its fulcrum pin, which renders the lower part of the lever heavier than its upper part, with its center of gravity at one side of its fulcrum pin.

so that the upper end c of the lever will have a tendency to move out from within the socket, as indicated by the arrow 1. The lower end of the lever B is so curved as to extend within the lower part of the socket at all times, and, when the socket is empty, no whip in it, the upper end c of the lever will be in the slot a, if not out from it, so as not to form any obstruction to the butt of the whip C as it is shoved into the socket; but when the butt of the whip reaches the lower part of the socket, it strikes the lower curved end of the lever B, and throws the upper end c of the same in contact with the butt (see Fig. 1), the weight of the whip keeping the upper end c of the lever in contact with the butt, and holding the whip steady in the socket. In withdrawing the whip from the socket the upper end c of the lever moves freely outward from the butt as soon as the lower end of the lever is relieved of the weight of the whip. This simple device has been practically tested, and it operates well. There are no springs required, and no parts used which are liable to get out of repair, or become deranged so as to be inoperative.

Having thus described my invention, I claim as new and desire to secure by letters patent:

A whip socket provided with a fastening composed of a lever, arranged or applied substantially as shown and described, to hold the whip steady or firm in its socket, as set forth."

The specification and claims of the reissue are as follows, the drawings of the reissue being substantially the same as those of the original:

"Be it known that I, Erastus W. Scott, of Wauregan, in the County of Windham, and State of Connecticut, have invented certain new and useful improvements in whip sockets, which are simple in construction, efficient in operation, and durable in use; and the improvements consist in the use of a lever with the [18] stationery or upright portion of the socket, and in the construction and combination of the parts, as hereinafter more fully described; and I do hereby declare that the following is a full, clear and exact description thereof, which will enable others skilled in the art to which it appertains to make and use the same, reference being had to the accompanying drawing, with letters of reference marked thereon, forming a part of this specification, in which Figure 1 is a central vertical section, taken on line x x of Fig. 2, of a socket embodying my invention, and Fig. 2 is an elevation of the same.

A represents a tubular socket provided with a suitable flange at the top, and the interior of the bottom part of the socket gradually decreases in size, being constructed in a partially cone form, as shown. The socket A is provided with a suitable fastener for the purpose of securing the same to the carriage. The socket A is provided with a slot d, extending a sufficient distance to admit the lever B, which is suitably pivoted to the part A in such a manner as to move on its pivot, for a purpose presently described. This lever B extends upward and downward from its pivot and inclines or curves inward from the pivot to each end, so that each end of the lever, or a point near each end of the lever, forms a bearing point for the whip C when inserted in the socket, while the opposite side of the whip stock C bears upon the socket A, as shown in Fig. 1. The lever B is pivoted to the socket A at a point inside of its center of gravity, so that when the whip is removed the upper part of the lever automatically moves outward, as indicated by the arrow, leaving the top of the socket open for the reception of the whip. The same outward movement of the top of the lever would be caused by the butt of the whip when withdrawn from the socket.

The operation is as follows: The whip C being removed from the socket, the upper part of the lever falls outward, as above described, leaving the top of the socket open. The whip, then being again inserted in the socket, first comes in contact with the lower inclined or curved part e of the lever B, and, as the whip passes down, the lower part e of the lever is pressed outward, which action brings the upper part c inward until it is brought to bear [19] firmly against the whip C, and thus holding the whip securely between the lever and the opposite side of the socket A. By this means a whip of any ordinary size may be firmly and securely held in position.

Having thus fully described the invention, what is claimed and desired to be secured by letters patent is:

1. The combination of a stationary part of a whip socket and a lever, the lever being hinged or pivoted so that the lever bears against the whip at or near the ends of the lever, to hold the whip in position for the purpose set forth.

2. The lever B, curved or inclined inward from its point of pivot, and used in connection with the stationary part A, substantially as and for the purpose specified.

3. The lever B, pivoted at a point inside of its center of gravity, so that when left free the upper part of the lever will fall outward, substantially as and for the purpose set forth."

The bill was filed in July, 1880. On the 19th of July, 1880, a preliminary injunction was issued and served. In the answer, filed in September, 1880, it was set up that the defendants were making and selling whip sockets constructed under and in accordance with the specification and drawings of letters patent No. 70075, owned by them, granted to Henry M. Curtis and Alva Worden, October 22, 1867, for an "improvement in self-adjusting whip-holder." After replication and proofs, the case was heard, and, on the 24th of February, 1882, an interlocutory decree was made, declaring that the reissue was valid and had been infringed, and awarding a perpetual injunction and a reference as to profits and damages. On the 6th of March, 1882, an order was made, entitled in the cause, imposing a fine of $250 on the defendants, to be paid by them to the complainant, for a violation of the preliminary injunction. This order was opened on the 29th of April, 1882, for a further hearing, and on the 9th of October, 1882, an order was made entitled in the cause, imposing a fine of $1,182 on the defendants for such violation, to be paid to the clerk of the court, and by him to be paid over to the plaintiff for damages and costs, the defendants to stand committed until the same should be paid. 13 Fed. Rep. 716. An appeal by the defendants from this order [20] was allowed, and an order was made that all proceedings to enforce the collection of the fine be stayed until the further order of the circuit court, on the giving of a specified bond, which bond was given. On the report of a master on the reference under the interlocutory decree, a final decree was entered that the plaintiffs recover against the defendants $24,578.91 as profits and $386.40 costs. From this decree the defendants have appealed.

The specification and claim and drawings of the Curtis and Worden patent are as follows:

"Be it known that we, Henry M. Curtis and Alva Worden, of Ypsilanti, in the County of Washtenaw and State of Michigan, have invented a new and useful machine for holding carriage whips, which we denominate 'Curtis and Worden's Self-Adjusting Whip-Holder;' and we do hereby declare that the following is a full, clear and exact description of the construction and operation of the same, reference being had to the annexed drawings, making a part of this specification, in which Figure 1 is a sectional view. Fig. 2 is a perspective view of the whip holder complete, and ready for use, without the whip. Fig. 3 is a perspective view of the whip holder complete, closed upon the whip handle.

The whip holder is formed of metal, cast or pressed to the desired shape, and is composed of two pieces only, Fig. 1 representing one sectional half and the other sectional half being formed exactly like it, with the exception of the loops A A, used for the purpose of attaching the same to the carriage seat or dashboard. Each section of the whip holder is a cone shaped half cylinder, the cone being reversed near the bottom of the whip holder, forming each half section bilged or barrel shaped, and connected together at the bilge by an ear shaped hinge, B, on each half section, the ears being connected together by a rivet, forming the hinge. The edge or face of each cylinder section is formed by an obtuse angle at the hinge, so constructed that when the two sections are connected together at the hinge B the whip holder above the joints or hinge is open, and shut or closed below from its own weight as in [21] Fig 2. When the whip is inserted the holder opens at the bottom, below the joints or hinge, by the pressure of the whip upon the convex conical sides of the holder, and closes at the top of the holder around the whip, thus clasping the whip firmly at the top and bottom of the holder, and holding it steady and firmly in its place. The whip may be easily drawn out by a perpendicular motion, the holder opening at the top and closing at the bottom, so that the whip is readily detached.

What we claim as our invention, and desire to secure by letters patent is:

The shape and construction of the whip holder, and the connection of the two sectional halves by hinges or joints, in such a manner as to hold the whip, when inserted, closely and firmly, by clasping the same at the top and bottom of the holder at the same time, the holder being formed of metal, cast or pressed into proper shape, substantially as and for the purpose set forth and described."

The circuit court, in deciding the case (11 Fed. Rep. 501, and 21 Off. Gaz. 1955), said: "A glance at the drawings and specifications will show that the patents" (the original and the reissue) "are for the same invention; viz., a whip [22] socket arranged with a lever swung upon a central pivot, and operating so as to admit the whip without difficulty, and hold it firmly in position, and at the same time not preventing its easy withdrawal. So far from there being any attempt in the reissue to expand the claim of the original patent, and embrace devices which might have come into use since the original patent was granted, its purpose was evidently only to make that definite which had before been obscure, and to set forth in more precise and accurate terms the details of the invention. I regard the reissue in this case as a perfectly legitimate use of the privileges conferred by the Act upon that subject."

As we are of opinion that the defendants' whip socket did not infringe the claim of the original Scott patent, and that the reissue was, in its claims, an unlawful expansion of the original, designed to cover the defendants' structure, it is not necessary to consider any other matter of defense.

The application for the original Scott patent and the application for the Curtis and Worden patent were before the Patent Office at the same time. The application for the Scott patent was filed August 23, 1867. It was issued November 5, 1867. The Curtis and Worden patent was issued October 22, 1867. The date it was applied for is not shown. Although the date of the Scott invention may be earlier than that of the Curtis and Worden invention, each patent was evidently granted for the specific apparatus covered by its claim. There was no conflict or interference between them, and no interference between their claims was declared. Their claims, as granted, placed side by side, were as follows:

Curtis and Worden.	Scott.
"The shape and construction of the whip holder, and the connection of the two sectional halves by hinges or joints, in such a manner as to hold the whip, when inserted, closely and firmly, by clasping the same at the top and bottom of the holder at the	"A whip socket provided with a fastening composed of a lever, arranged or applied substantially as shown and described, to hold the whip steady or firm in its socket, as set forth." [23] same time, the holder being formed of metal, cast or pressed into proper shape, substantially as and for the purpose set forth and described."

The specification of the original Scott patent stated the invention to be "a new and improved fastening applied to a whip socket." The socket is described as a complete whip socket, complete in itself without the fastening, and having in its side an opening or slot, extending nearly its whole height or length, in which slot is inserted a lever. The claim is for "a whip socket," that is, a complete whip socket, "provided with a fastening composed of a lever, arranged or applied substantially as shown and described," that is, inserted in the slot in the socket. The defendants' structure consists only of two sectional halves, each like the other, and each a cone shaped half cylinder, and bilged, with an ear shaped hinge on each half section, a rivet connecting the two forming the hinge. This arrangement does not infringe the claim of the Scott original patent. It is not a complete whip socket provided with a lever arranged or applied substantially as in Scott's apparatus, that is, pivoted in a slot in the socket. It is true that the result in each arrangement is to hold the whip steady or firm in a socket, but the mechanisms are different.

That the specification and claims of the reissue were designedly so worded as to cover a structure which the claim of the original patent would not cover is manifest. Thus, the original specification says that the invention relates to a "fastening applied to a whip socket in such a manner as to hold the whip firmly therein." This means that you have a complete whip socket and you apply a fastening to it, which fastening is so arranged as to hold the whip [24] firmly in the socket in which the whip is placed. The description in the original specification describes a complete whip socket with an opening or slot in the side of the socket, extending nearly its whole height or length, with a fastening lever secured in the slot by a fulcrum pin rather below the center of the lever, the lever having near the fulcrum pin a weighting projection, b'. The reissued specification says that the "improvements consist in the use of a lever with the stationary or upright portion of the socket." The socket is referred to as if it had a part which is not stationary. The first and second claims carry out the same idea, by making the "stationary part" of the socket an element in each of those claims. The defendants' holder is not a complete holder with its stationary part alone, and without its movable part, while the plaintiff's is. Moreover, all mention of the weighting projection b' is omitted in the reissued specification. The design manifest in it is to cover such a structure as that of the defendants, and the evidence tends to the conclusion that that was the object of obtaining the reissue. The description and claim of the original specification were entirely adequate to cover the Scott device. No inadvertence, accident or mistake is shown.

The reissue is sought to be sustained, by the counsel for the appellee, on the ground that the invention described in each of the two specifications is "the combination with a whip socket of a lever which operates to hold the whip firmly therein and prevent it from moving or shaking laterally." Even if such a claim would be valid, it is not the claim made in the original patent. And even if it were the claim made by that patent, the reissue purports to claim, not a combination of a whip socket and a lever, but the combination of the stationary part of a whip socket and a lever.

We are, therefore, of opinion that this reissued patent is invalid.

The appellants ask for a review and reversal of the orders imposing fines for a violation of the preliminary injunction. The appellee contends that this court cannot review the action of the circuit court in punishing a contempt committed by a violation of such injunction, (1) because the proceedings were criminal in [25] their character; (2) because the action of the circuit court is, by section 725 of the Revised Statutes, expressly made discretionary

All the proceedings which resulted in the imposition of the fines were taken and entitled in the suit. The order of March 6, 1882, is entitled in the suit, and adjudges "that the said defendants are guilty of the contempt charged against them for a violation of the injunction issued in this cause, and that said defendants, Alva Worden and John S. Worden, pay to said complainant, Anson Searls, the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, as a fine for said violation, together with costs of said proceedings, to be taxed, and that said defendants stand committed until the same is paid." The order of October 9, 1882, is entitled in the suit, and orders "that said defendants, Alva Worden and John S. Worden, do pay a fine of eleven hundred and eighty-two dollars to the clerk of this court, to be paid over by said clerk to complainant for damages and costs, and that said defendants do stand committed until the same is paid." It appears that the $1,182 was made up of $682, the profits of the defendants on 62 gross of whip sockets sold, and $500, expenses of the plaintiff in the contempt proceedings.

We have jurisdiction to review the final decree in the suit and all interlocutory decrees and orders. These fines were directed to be paid to the plaintiff. We say nothing as to the lawfulness or propriety of this direction. But the fines were, in fact, measured by the damages the plaintiff had sustained and the expenses he had incurred. They were incidents of his claims in the suit. His right to them was, if it existed at all, founded on his right to the injunction, and that was founded on the validity of his patent. The case differs, therefore, from that of Ex parte Kearney, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 39 [5:391]. That was an application to this court for a writ of habeas corpus where a person was imprisoned by the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, for a contempt in refusing, as a witness, to answer a question on the trial of an indictment. The application was denied, on the ground that this court had no appellate jurisdiction in a criminal case.

So, the fact in the present case (that though [26] the proceedings were nominally those of contempt, they were really proceedings to award damages to the plaintiff, and to reimburse to him his expenses) distinguishes the case from that of New Orleans v. Steamship Co. 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 387 [22:354]. There, in a suit in equity, a Circuit Court of the United States imposed a fine on a defendant for obtaining, during the pendency of the suit, from a state court, an injunction against the plaintiffs, as to a matter within the scope of the litigation. On appeal from the final decree, it was sought to review the order imposing the fine, but this court said that the fine was beyond its jurisdiction, and added: "Contempt of court is a specific criminal offense. The imposition of the fine was a judgment in a criminal case. That part of the decree is as distinct from the residue as if it were a judgment upon an indictment for perjury committed in a deposition read at the hearing. This court can take cognizance of a criminal case only upon a certificate of division in opinion."

Section 725 of the Revised Statutes provides that the courts of the United States shall have power to punish, "by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, contempts of their authority," provided that such power "shall not be construed to extend to any cases except * * * the disobedience by * * * any party, juror, witness, or other person, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts." We do not think this provision makes the action of the circuit court in this case such a matter of discretion that the orders imposing the fines are not reviewable. They were, to all intents and purposes, orders in the course of the cause, based on the questions involved as to the legal rights of the parties.

Although the court had jurisdiction of the suit and of the parties, the order for the preliminary injunction was unwarranted as a matter of law, and the orders imposing the fines must, so far as they have not been executed, be held, under the special circumstances of this case, to be reviewable by this court, under the appeal from the final decree. The result is that they cannot be upheld.

[27] The final decree of the Circuit Court, and the orders of March 6, 1882, and October 9, 1882, are reversed, and the case is remanded to that court, with a direction to dismiss the bill, with costs, but without prejudice to the power and right of the Circuit Court to punish the contempt referred to in those orders, by a proper proceeding.

The preliminary injunction was in force until set aside. See Re Chiles, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 157 [22: 819].

SILAS WEEKS.

Marine insurance—ship to navigate Atlantic Ocean—Gulf of Mexico included—seaworthiness—practice on appeal.

1. An insurance on a New Orleans ship "to navigate the Atlantic Ocean between Europe and America, and to be covered in port and at sea," certain ports excepted, the policy being issued when the ship was at sea, bound on a voyage from Liverpool to New Orleans, is held to cover the ship while in the Gulf of Mexico.

2. Where the court below has found the ultimate facts, the appellant is not entitled to have incorporated in the bill of exceptions mere incidental facts which only amount to evidence bearing on the ultimate facts of the case, as this court, since the Act of 1875, cannot retry the case on all the evidence.

3. This court, while declining to decide whether, since the Act of February 16, 1875, new testimony can, under any circumstances, be taken after an appeal in admiralty, or amendments to the pleadings allowed, denies a motion for that purpose, the depositions filed as to over insurance of the cargo failing to make out such a case as would tend to establish a fraudulent loss of the vessel.

[Nos. 77, 78.]

Argued March 17, 18, 1887. Decided March 28, 1887.

APPEALS from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Opinion below, 16 Fed. Rep. 916. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the cases appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Joseph P. Hornor, Charles W. Hornor and Francis W. Baker, for appellant:

A mere reference to the map will show that no part of the Gulf of Mexico is between Europe and America. The most southern point of Europe is in about 36° north latitude; the most northern of the Gulf of Mexico is in about 30°.

The moment therefore The Orient entered the Gulf of Mexico, the policy sued on was forfeited; the waiver of this forfeiture must of course be voluntary and with knowledge.

As regards this question of deviation, all courts have ever construed such clauses strictly, and in favor of the insurers as against the assured, for the reason that the insurer has a right to specify what risks he takes, and that the assured has no right to attempt to impose upon him a different one, no matter whether the risk be really either increased or diminished.

All the American authorities concur that in time policies, as well as in voyage policies, the vessel must be kept by the insured in a seaworthy condition when it is in their power to make her so.

Mr. J. R. Beckwith, for George D. Allen, appellee.

Messrs. Richard H. Browne, Charles R. Singleton and O. B. Sansum, for Silas Weeks, appellee. [68]

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

These appeals present the same questions, and may be considered together. The suits were brought on two policies of insurance, one insuring the interest of George D. Allen and the other that of Silas Weeks, in the ship Orient, from April 15, 1882, to April 15, 1883, "to navigate the Atlantic Ocean between Europe and America, and to be covered in port and at sea." At the time the policy was issued the ship was on the Atlantic Ocean, bound on a voyage from Liverpool, England, to New Orleans, Louisiana, laden with a general cargo. The Company knew of this when it executed and delivered the policy, and insured the vessel, lost or not lost. New Orleans was the home port of the ship, and there the home office of the Company was situated. All parties knew that the ship was sailing to and from that port. The policy also contained this clause:

"Warranted by the assured not to use port or ports in Eastern Mexico, Texas, nor Yucatan, nor anchorage thereof, during the continuance of this insurance, nor ports in West India Islands between July 15 and October 15; nor ports on the northeast coast of Great Britain beyond the Thames, nor ports on the continent of Europe, north of Antwerp, between November 1 and March 1."

This warranty is part of the printed portion of the policy, but the portion describing what the insurance covered is in writing.

The ship arrived safely in New Orleans on her voyage from Liverpool, and, after unloading, proceeded to Ship Island, where she took on a cargo of timber for Liverpool, and while on her voyage to that port she was struck by a cyclone about one hundred miles out in the Gulf of Mexico and wrecked.

The first question presented by the appellants is whether the insurance covered the ship while in the Gulf of Mexico. This depends on the meaning of the language of the policy, con- [69] strued in the light of the circumstances which surrounded the parties at the time of its execution. The evident purpose was to insure a New Orleans ship engaged in the Atlantic trade between Europe and America for a year, both at sea and in port. At the time the insurance was effected she was on a voyage between Liverpool and New Orleans, and all parties knew that the business in which she was engaged took her in and out of the last named port. That was her home port, and that was where the Insurance Company had its own office. That the navigation of the Gulf was contemplated during the life of the policy is shown by the fact that certain of its ports were excluded from the risks the Company assumed. This fairly implies that all others might be used, and as the ship was to be insured all the time during the year if she was employed in navigating the Atlantic between Europe and America, whether at sea or in port, it is evident the parties intended to cover her by the policy while sailing from port to port in that general trade. New Orleans is a leading American port in that trade. To get to and from it ships must navigate the Gulf of Mexico.

No one can doubt that the policy would cover at all times during the year a voyage to all the ports of Great Britain except those northeast of the Thames, and to all ports on the Continent of Europe north of the Mediterranean as far as Antwerp, and elsewhere on the northern coast between March and November. Yet in doing so the ship would have to sail in waters other than those of the Atlantic Ocean. Taking the whole policy together, we cannot doubt it was the intention of the Company to cover the ship while engaged in the Atlantic trade between ports in Europe and America other than those specially warranted against. Whether this would include ports east of Gibraltar it is unnecessary now to decide.

It is true that if there is a conflict between the written words of a policy and those that are printed, the writing will prevail, but, if possible, the writing and the print are to be construed so that both can stand. Here we think it clear that the written clauses, when construed in connection with those that are in print, have [70] the effect of describing the trade in which the vessel was to be employed rather than confining her navigation exclusively to the waters of the Atlantic Ocean. If it were otherwise, while the ship would be insured in port and on the ocean, she would be uninsured while performing that part of her voyage from the ocean to the port and from the port to the ocean. Such a condition of things will never be presumed in the absence of the most convincing proof to the contrary.

We have no hesitation in deciding that the insurance covered the ship at the time of her loss.

This disposes of all the questions which arise on the finding of facts.

The principal controversy in the case was as to the seaworthiness of the vessel. The court has found as a fact that she was seaworthy when she left Liverpool on the voyage during which the policies were issued, and also when she sailed from Ship Island on the voyage in which she was lost. To these questions the testimony was largely directed, and it was to some extent conflicting. At the trial the court was asked to find as follows:

"The ship Orient, prior to her departure on her last voyage, on 1st August, 1882, was run aground on Ship Island Bar, where she remained for three days and two nights in bad and squally weather, 'rolling and pounding heavily,' and while on the bar, and after coming off, drew and continued to draw four inches of water per hour until the final wreck, and that when she was thrown upon her beam ends by the force of the storm she was prevented from righting herself by the large amount of water which had leaked into her hold; and hence the cutting away of her masts was of no avail, and the said leak was the direct cause of her loss, and she was unseaworthy when she started on her last voyage;" and "that when the ship Orient was hauled off the bar at Ship Island where she had been aground as aforesaid, she leaked four inches of water per hour, and said leak did not diminish from said time, 3d August, 1882, until 5th September, 1882, when she went to sea on her last voyage, nor until she was finally [71] wrecked, and said leak could have been discovered only by unloading said vessel and taking her to New Orleans and putting her in the dry dock, which was not done; and no other precaution was taken to ascertain whether said ves sel was injured by having been aground, or to ascertain the leak or leaks, save by a cursory examination of her bottom by a diver, without taking her out of the water;" and "that the ship Orient was knowingly sent to sea by the assured in an unseaworthy state and in an unfit condition, which necessarily increased the danger which led to her loss."

This was refused, and an exception taken. To present the question of the propriety of that refusal to this court, a bill of exceptions was prepared, containing the entire evidence in the cause, which was signed by the circuit judge with the remark that "this bill is claimed by the respondent under the authority of The Francis Wright, 105 U. S. 381 [26: 1100], considering which case the court does not feel at liberty to deny the bill.

In the case of The Francis Wright, it was ruled, p. 387 [1101], and, as we are satisfied, correctly, "that if the circuit court neglects or refuses, on request, to make a finding one way or the other, on a question of fact material to the determination of the cause, when evidence has been adduced on the subject, an exception to such refusal, taken in time and properly presented by a bill of exceptions, may be considered here on appeal. So, too, if the court, against remonstrance, finds a material fact which is not supported by any evidence whatever, and an exception is taken, a bill of exceptions may be used to bring up for review the ruling in that particular. In the one case, a refusal to find would be equivalent to a ruling that the fact was immaterial; and in the other, that there was some evidence to prove what is found, when in truth there was none." "But," it was added, "this rule does not apply to mere incidental facts which only amount to evidence bearing on the ultimate facts of the case. Questions depending on the weight of evidence are, under the law as it now stands, to be conclusively settled below; and the fact in respect to which such an exception may be taken must be one of the material and ultimate facts on which the correct determination of the cause depends."

[72] In the present case, the ultimate fact to be proved was the seaworthiness of the vessel. That ultimate fact has been found. What the Company wanted to have incorporated in the findings were the "mere incidental facts" which only amounted to evidence from which the material fact of seaworthiness or unseaworthiness was to be ascertained. This was properly refused.

Another bill of exceptions was taken, because the court made the following findings, when there was no evidence whatever to support them:

"Fourth. That when said risk was taken by the said defendant and said policy executed and delivered, the said ship Orient was on the Atlantic Ocean, bound on a voyage from the Port of Liverpool to the Port of New Orleans, in the United States, laden with a general cargo; that the defendant at the time of the execution and delivery of the policy of insurance was well aware of the fact, and had notice and knowledge that the said vessel was prosecuting said voyage, bound to the Port of New Orleans, and insured the vessel, lost or not lost.

"Fifth. That the Port of New Orleans was the home port of the said Orient and was the domicil of the underwriting Company; and that all parties knew that the ship was sailing to and from that port, and when the policy sued on was issued it was the intention of the assured and the underwriters that the said policy was to cover risks while said ship was navigating the Gulf of Mexico, except excluded ports.

"Twenty-first. That at the time said ship Orient was wrecked and destroyed she was under the protection of said policy of insurance, and was lost and wrecked by a peril of the sea insured against."

So far from there being no evidence to support these findings, the record is full of facts from which the conclusions reached by the court might be drawn. The apparent purpose of counsel in preparing the bills of exceptions was to have the whole case retried here on all the evidence. That this cannot be done, since the Act of 1875, has long been settled. The Abbotsford, 98 U. S. 440 [25: 168]; The Benefactor, 102 U. S. 214 [26: 157]; The Adriatic, 103 U. S. 730 [26: 605]; The Annie Lindsley, 104 U. S. 187 [26: 717].

The case as tried below is reported as Baker [73] v. Merchants Mut. Ins. Co. 16 Fed. Rep. 916, where the discussion upon the effect of the evidence will be found

It only remains to consider an application which has been made in this court for leave to amend the pleadings and introduce new testimony. At an early day in the present term leave was granted the appellants on their motion to take additional testimony. Under this leave depositions have been taken which are now on file. Their purpose is to show an over insurance by the owners of the vessel on the cargo, which was also owned by them in whole or in part. The pleadings, as they stood in the court below, present no issue to which such testimony is applicable; and the appellants now ask leave to amend their answers so as to let it in.

Without determining whether, since the Act of February 16, 1875, "to facilitate the disposition of cases in the supreme court, and for other purposes, ch. 77, 18 Stat. at L. 315, new testimony can, under any circumstances, be taken after an appeal in admiralty to this court, or amendments to the pleadings allowed, and, if so, what would be the proper practice to give effect to an application for that purpose, we deny this motion. An over insurance of the cargo is not a breach of a warranty by the owner of the vessel not to insure his interest in the vessel beyond a certain amount, and the new testimony, standing by itself, fails to make out such a case of over insurance on the cargo as would tend to establish a fraudulent loss of the vessel. The over insurance of the cargo, if any there was, grew out of an insurance by Barings Brothers & Co., in London, for their protection as acceptors of drafts drawn by the captain on them to meet disbursements in the purchase of the timber which composed the cargo; at least that is the fair inference from the testimony.

The decree in each of the cases is affirmed.

Design patents—infringement—practice—affirmance without opinion.

This court affirms without an opinion, the decrees of the court below, granting relief for the infringement of design patents Nos. 10388 and 10448 on comparison of the manufactured article with the designs of the patents.

[Nos. 152, 153.]

Argued March 21, 1887. Decided March 28, 1887.

APPEALS from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

The bills in these cases were filed by the appellees to recover damages for the infringement of design patents Nos. 10388 and 10448, for designs for lace fabrics.

The answer denies the infringement, and sets up various defenses to both patents. In taking proofs for final hearing, the counsel for the defendants being present, the plaintiffs put in evidence the two patents and assignments to the plaintiffs and a nubia. The counsel for the defendants admitted, on the record of proofs, that the said nubia was purchased from the defendants prior to the commencement of these suits. The plaintiffs then rested their case. The defendants took no testimony. The plaintiffs introduced no witness to show the identity of design between what was found in said nubia and in the plaintiffs' patent. The defendants contend that it is not sufficient for the plaintiffs to show merely the sale of the nubia by the defendants, and to leave the court to inspect the nubia and compare it with the patents, but that the plaintiffs must produce a witness to testify to identity of design. But the court held under the authority of Gorham Mfg. Co. v. White, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 511 (20: 731), that the true test of identity of design is sameness of appearance; in other words, sameness of effect upon the eye; that it is not necessary that the appearance should be the same to the eye of an expert, and that the test is the eye of an ordinary observer—the eyes of men generally—of observers of ordinary acuteness, bringing to the examination of the article upon which the design has been placed that degree of observation, which men of ordinary intelligence give. The court further held that, in view of this test or identity and of the simple character of designs in the present case, and of the absence of any testimony on the part of the defendants, the absence of testimony as to identity did not make it improper for the court to compare the defendants' nubia with the patents as to design and to determine the question of identity from such comparison. On such comparison it was found that the defendants' nubia infringes both of the patents, and decrees were entered accordingly.

UNITED STATES, Appt.,

v.

JOHN PAUL JONES, Admr. of GEORGE McDOUGALL, Deceased.

(See S. C. as "U. S. v. McD's Admr.," Reporter's ed. 89-102.

Claim, arising on contract with an Indian agent, for cattle furnished—the United States, not legally liable—statute—treaties—allowance of claim by Congress, not a recognition of similar claims.

1. There is no principle of law that would justify a court in treating the allowance of particular claims by Congress as a recognition by the Government of its liability, upon other demands of like character in the hands of claimants.

2. The agreement of April 5, 1852, between George McDougall and O. M. Wozencraft, an agent and commissioner of the United States to negotiate treaties with the Indians of California, for cattle delivered by the former for the use of the Indians, imposed no legal obligation upon the United States.

3. By the Act of June 30, 1834, Congress did not invest the President, the head of the department, nor any officer of the Government, with unrestricted authority in the making of treaties with the Indians, nor in regulating intercourse with them; to purchase merchandise for them, nor to make payments of money or goods to them.

Submitted Jan. 7, 1887. Decided Mar. 28, 1887.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., and Heber J. May, Assist. Atty., for appellant.

Messrs. James W. Denver and John Paul Jones, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion [96] of the court:

The only question discussed by counsel is as to the liability of the United States, under the written agreement between McDougall and Wozencraft of April 5, 1852, for the cattle delivered by the former. The argument in support of the judgment below proceeds mainly, if not altogether, upon the ground that the allowance by special Acts of Congress of claims similar to the one here in suit, in connection with the failure or refusal of the proper officers to prosecute appeals from judgments in the court of claims against the United States upon contracts like the one in suit, constitute a sufficient basis, in law, for a recovery in this case.

Tracing the history of the claims referred to, we find that, by an Act approved July 29, 1854, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, to pay to John C. Fremont the sum of $183,825, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum from June 1, 1853, "in full of his account for beef delivered to Commissioner Barbour for the use of the Indians of California in 1851 and 1852." 10 Stat. at L. 804.

In Hensley's Case the court of claims delivered an opinion, which was transmitted to Congress February 2, 1850. H. R. 35th Cong. 2d Sess. R. C. Cls. No. 189. It is immaterial to the present inquiry that that court had no power at that time to give a judgment for money against the United States; for, if it had been then invested with all the jurisdiction it now has, the Government would have succeeded. Its conclusion, upon the whole case, was that "the United States are not legally liable upon the contract claimed upon, because it was not made by their authority." At the same time the court disposed of McDougall's case—involving the identical claim presented [97] in this case—and held, upon the grounds stated in Hensley's suit, that the United States came under no legal liability to McDougall by reason of his agreement with Wozencraft, or of anything done under it. Congress, nevertheless, made provision, by special Act of June 9, 1860, to pay Hensley's claim (12 Stat. at L. 847), but failed or refused to make an appropriation to pay McDougall.

Norris also sued upon a similar contract; but, for the reasons given in Hensley's Case, his claim was also rejected. Congress, however, by Joint Resolution of June 22, 1866, referred that claim back to the court of claims "for examination and allowance," and directed "that in fixing the amount to be paid the claimant, the rule shall be the actual value of the supplies furnished at the times and places of delivery, of which due proof shall be made by the claimant." 14 Stat. at L. 608. In obedience to that resolution, and not because of any change of opinion in the court as to the legal rights of Norris under his written agreement with Wozencraft, the court of claims gave judgment against the United States, at its December Term, 1866, for $69,900. Norris v. U. S. 2 Ct. Cl. 155.

Subsequently, in Fremont v. U. S. 2 Ct. Cl. 462, judgment was given against the United States upon one of this class of claims. That judgment did not proceed upon the ground that the claimant was entitled to recover if the case stood on the contract there in question—a contract similar to McDougall's—but upon the ground that the foregoing Acts of Congress constituted a clear and distinct legislative recognition of the obligation of the United States to pay the fair value of the subsistence furnished for the Indians, as well under the contracts with Fremont, Hensley and Norris, as under similar contracts with other parties. This decision was followed in Fremont v. U. S. 4 Ct. Cl. 252. Finally, in Belt v. U. S. 15 Ct. Cl. 106, upon a review of the circumstances connected with this class of claims, the court below adjudged that the United States were in law liable for the value of the subsistence furnished to Indians in California under the agreement there in suit, and which was similar to [98] the one of April 5, 1852, with McDougall. In none of the cases, in which judgments were rendered against the United States, were appeals prosecuted to this court.

The judgment in the present case was not accompanied by an opinion of the court below, for the reason perhaps, that the claim of McDougall's administrator is covered by the decision in Belt's Case. After a careful examination of the opinion in the latter case we are unable to find any solid ground upon which to hold the United States legally liable upon the agreement between Wozencraft and McDougall, or for the value of the cattle delivered under it. That Congress, by special Acts, made provision for the payment of particular claims of the same class furnishes no ground whatever for the assumption that the Government recognized its legal liability for the amount of such claims, much less for the amount of all other claims of like character. Such legislation may well furnish the basis for an appeal to the legislative department of the Government to place all claimants, of the same class, upon an equality. But we are aware of no principle of law that would justify a court in treating the allowance by Congress of particular claims as a recognition by the Government of its liability upon every demand of like character in the hands of claimants. We may properly take judicial notice of the fact that many claims against the United States cannot be enforced by suit, but provision for which may, and upon grounds of equity and justice ought to be, made by special legislation. But the discretion which Congress has in such matters would be very seriously trammeled, if the doctrine should be established that it cannot appropriate money to pay particular claims, except at the risk of thereby recognizing the legal liability of the United States for the amount of other claims of the same general class.

The same considerations apply to the suggestion that the liability of the United States to McDougall's administrator, as upon contract, may arise from the failure or refusal of their law officers to prosecute appeals from judgments against the Government in suits brought by other parties, holding similar claims. The question to be determined is not whether the representatives of the Government [99] have heretofore been guilty of neglect in not prosecuting such appeals, but whether, in the case in hand, the plaintiff has a valid claim in law against the United States.

Coming then to the inquiry whether the United States is legally liable on the contract between Wozencraft and McDougall, we are met at the threshold by the fact, found by the court below, that, although the instructions to Wozencraft and his colleagues did not extend to or embrace contracts for the subsistence of the Indian Tribes in California, they yet pursued the policy of providing for such subsistence in advance of the ratification by the Senate of treaties made with those tribes. That such a policy was, under all the circumstances, vital to the ends which those in charge of Indian affairs desired to accomplish, may be conceded under the facts found by the court of claims; and it may be that information of the proceedings of Wozencraft and his colleagues in making contracts for the supply of the Indians with provisions, beef, etc., and in all other respects, was given to the proper department at Washington, and that what they did was either approved or was not repudiated.

While all this may be admitted, the question comes back upon us, what statute, in express words or by necessary implication, invested Wozencraft with power to bind the United States by such a contract as that made with McDougall, even had he been previously directed or authorized by the Interior Department to make contracts of that character in holding treaties with the Indians?

It is suggested that such authority may be found in the Act of June 30, 1834, 4 Stat at L. 735, chap. 162, the thirteenth section of which provided that "All merchandise required by any Indian treaty for the Indians, payable after making such treaty, shall be purchased under the direction of the Secretary of War [afterwards changed to Secretary of the Interior, 9 Stat. at L. 395, chap. 108, § 5], upon proposals to be received, to be based on notices previously to be given, and all merchandise required to the making of any Indian treaty shall be purchased under the orders of the commissioners, by such persons as they shall appoint, or by such persons as shall be designated by the [100] President for that purpose; and all other purchases on account of the Indians, and all payments to them of money or goods, shall be made by such person as the President shall designate for that purpose. And the superintendent, agent or subagent, together with such military officers as the President may direct, shall be present and certify to the delivery of all goods and money required to be paid or delivered to the Indians." The seventh section of the same Act provides that "it shall be the general duty of Indian agents and subagents to manage and superintend the intercourse with the Indians within their respective agencies agreeably to law; to obey all legal instructions given to them by the Secretary of War [afterwards changed to Secretary of the Interior], the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and to carry into effect such regulations as may be prescribed by the President." These statutory provisions, it is argued, conferred authority upon officers of the Executive Department to purchase, without limit as to amount, "merchandise required to the making of any Indian treaty," and invested the President, through others, with power as well to make "other purchases on account of the Indians," as to make "payments to them of money or goods."

This, in our judgment, is too broad a construction of the statute. Congress did not intend to invest the President or the head of a department, or any officer of the Government, with unrestricted authority in the making of treaties with Indians, or in regulating intercourse with them, to purchase merchandise for them, or to make payments of money or goods to them. It appropriated certain sums to enable the President to hold treaties with the various Indian Tribes in California. To the extent of such appropriations the President, through persons designated by him, could purchase merchandise, required in the making of a treaty, and could make payment of money or goods on account of the Indians. But no officer of the Government was authorized to bind the United States by any contract for the subsistence of Indians not based upon appropriations made by Congress. It is not claimed that the agreement between Wozencraft and McDougall was made with reference to such appropriations. On the contrary, Wozencraft [101] and his colleagues were informed by a communication from the Indian office, under date of June 27, 1851, that "when the appropriation of $25,000 for holding treaties was exhausted, they should close their negotiations and proceed with the discharge of their duties as agents simply, as the department could not feel itself justified in authorizing anticipated expenditures beyond the amount of the appropriation made by Congress." The findings show that when the written agreement with McDougall was made, Wozencraft and his colleagues knew that the appropriations had been exhausted. Besides, the contract on its face shows that it was made with reference to appropriations to be thereafter made. The parties evidently relied upon Congress recognizing the wisdom and necessity of the policy adopted for the pacification of the Indians in California, and, by legislation, supplying the want of authority upon the part of Wozencraft and his colleagues to contract, in behalf of the United States, for the subsistence of the Indians in advance of the ratification of the treaties negotiated with them. That the policy pursued by Wozencraft and his colleagues was the only one that would have given peace to the inhabitants of California; that the Indians were induced by the promises of subsistence held out to them to abandon their lands to the whites, and settle upon reservations selected for them; and that the United States thereby acquired title to the lands so abandoned, are considerations to be addressed to Congress in support of a special appropriation to pay the claim of McDougall's administrator. They do not, in our judgment, establish or tend to establish, a claim against the United States enforcible by suit.

It appears, from the finding of facts, that McDougall did not die until after the expiration of nearly twenty years from the time his claim accrued, nor until after more than nine years from the passage of the Act giving jurisdiction to the court of claims of suits against the United States founded upon contract, express or implied. It is stated that McDougall's claim was pending in the Interior Department at the time of his death in 1872. When it was presented to that department is not stated. It may not [102] have been so presented until after the expiration of the period within which it would have been cognizable by the court of claims, had suit been brought thereon without first filing the claim in the department. Whether, in that event, the bar of limitation was removed by the mere fact that the claim was transmitted to the court below by the Interior Department, is a matter upon which we express no opinion. No such question is formally raised, and, in view of the conclusion reached, it is not necessary to determine it. We rest our decision solely upon the ground that the contract of April 5, 1882, imposed no legal obligation upon the United States.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to dismiss the petition.

AGNES F. IRONS AND ANDREW H. FOSKETT, Exrx. and Exr. of JAMES IRONS, Deceased, ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 27-66.)

National banks—voluntary liquidation—bill to reach assets and enforce liability of stockholders—amendments—discretion of court—extent of liability of stockholders—transfer of stock of director on day of suspension, fraudulent as to creditors—Statute of Limitations—relation.

I. Upon a bill filed February 3, 1875, by a judgment creditor of the Manufacturers' National Bank of Chicago, then in voluntary liquidation, against the bank and its president, various other creditors and stockholders of the bank having since become parties, it is held:

1. That the original bill was not strictly a creditors' bill for the purpose of subjecting equitable assets to the payment of the complainant's judgment, but was necessarily, though not in form, for the benefit of all the creditors.
2. That the court below properly permitted the complainant to file the amended bill of October 5, 1876, and the amendment at the hearing, making it a bill to reach the assets of the bank and to enforce the statutory liability of the stockholders for the benefit of all the creditors.
3. That the Act of June 30, 1876, authorizing any creditor of the banking association in voluntary liquidation to file a bill in equity on behalf of himself and all other creditors to enforce the statutory liability of the stockholders, warranted the court in permitting the complainant to file said amended bill without regard to whether said Act was merely declaratory of the law as it stood under the original Banking Act, or as providing a new remedy.
4. That, as said amended bill was for the benefit of all the creditors, when any creditor appeared and established his claim he became by relation a complainant from the beginning; and that the Illinois Statute of Limitation, if applicable, ceased to run against creditors at the date of said amended bill.
5. That a stockholder's liability survives against his personal representatives.
6. That a transfer of the stock of a director on the books of the association, on the day of the suspension, is fraudulent as against creditors, although the stock was previously sold and delivered to the president of the bank.
7. That the stockholders, are not liable on account of the claims of creditors who made settlements with the president of the bank after it went into liquidation, the presumption being that they received its assets in settlement of their claims.
8. That interest upon the debts of the bank should be allowed as against the stockholders from the date of the suspension.
9. That the stockholders are not liable for the expenses of the receiver appointed under the original bill.
10. That no creditor is entitled to recover, who does not come forward to present his claim.

II. The allowance of amendments of equity pleadings must, at every stage of the case, rest in the discretion of the court, governed largely by the special circumstances of the case presented.

Submitted Jan. 7, 1887. Decided Mar. 28, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Henry G. Miller, Melville W. Fuller and H. B. Hurd, for appellants:

The circuit court erred in allowing the amendment of July 28, 1883, by which it was attempted to turn a creditor's bill into an original bill for the enforcement of a statutory stock liability under the Act of Congress of June 30, 1876.

The cause of action, under the Act of Congress of June 30, 1876, is between the creditors and stockholders. The cause of action under these creditors' bills is by way of subrogation through the corporation for the recovery of assets and debts. The two causes of action are distinct and independent, and could not be properly joined in one bill.

Story, Eq. Pl. § 271; Walker v. Powers, 104 U. S. 245 (26: 729).

Upon the hearing the court allowed the bill to be so amended as to be turned into a bill filed by the complainant on behalf of himself and other creditors, and to amend the prayer so as to ask a pro rata distribution instead of the payment of the complainant in full. This made a new bill of it, and is directly condemned in Shields v. Barrow, 58 U. S. 17 How. 144 (15: 162).

See also Snead v. M'Coull, 53 U. S. 12 How. 407, 422 (13: 1043, 1049); Walden v. Bodley, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 156 (10: 398).

The court will not permit a bill to be so amended on hearing as to make an entirely new case.

Smith v. Woolfolk, 115 U. S. 148 (29: 359); Goodwin v. Goodwin, 3 Atk. 370; Milward v. Oldfield, 4 Price, 325; Deniston v. Little, 2 Sch. & Lef., 11 n.; Busby v. Seymour, 1 Jones & L. 527.

The court erred in holding that the amended bill of October 5, 1876, was a supplemental bill, and as such sustainable under the Act of Congress of June 30, 1876. A plaintiff cannot file a supplemental bill to introduce facts which have occurred since the filing of the original bill, and upon which a decree can be had without reference to the original bill. The plaintiff must dismiss his original bill and file an entirely new one.

Milner v. Milner, 2 Edw. Ch. 114; Pinch v. Anthony, 10 Allen, 477.

The amended bill of October 5, 1876, was not a bill on behalf of the complainant and all other creditors. Even as amended, it was a bill under which the complainant sought priority of payment by reason of superior diligence. Nor does it purport to be on behalf of the other creditors. "The bill must state the fact that it is filed in behalf of the complainant and all others."

Fish v. Howland, 1 Paige, 20.

The statutory stock liability is not part of the assets of the bank.

See Irons v. Manufacturers Nat. Bank, 6 Biss. 301; Godfrey v. Terry, 97 U. S. 171 (24: 944); Terry v. Tubman, 92 U. S. 156 (23: 537); Carrol v. Green, 92 U. S. 509 (23: 788); Jacobson v. Allen, 12 Fed. Rep. 454; Story v. Furman, 25 N. Y. 214: Farnsworth v. Wood, 91 N. Y. 308; Hanson v. Donkersley, 37 Mich. 184; Wright v. McCormack, 17 Ohio St. 86; Hewett v. Adams, 50 Me. 271.

The cause of action against defendants as having property of the bank cannot be joined with the cause of action based on the personal liability.

Cambridge Water Works v. Dyeing & Bl. Co.

14 Gray, 193; Pope v. Leonard, 115 Mass. 286; Walker v. Powers, supra.

Under the Statute of Illinois all civil actions not otherwise provided for must be commenced within five years after the cause of action accrued.

The lapse of five years bars the implied promise of the stockholders to fulfill the engagements of the corporation, arising from the acceptance of the Act creating it.

Carrol v. Green, 92 U. S. 510 (23: 788).

The statute begins to run from the date when the liability of the shareholders becomes fixed in the sense that the creditor may, without obstruction, proceed against them.

Baker v. Atlas Bank, 9 Met. 182; Thompson, Liability Stockholders, § 290.

The theory of the original bill, as amended October 5, 1876, was that the personal liability was to the corporation and to be reached by subrogating the creditor to the place of the corporation.

In this view no privity exists between the stockholders and any creditor of the corporation. He can only be reached by the creditor through the corporation; and if the debt due from the stockholder is barred by the Statute of Limitations against the corporation, the creditor of the corporation cannot enforce its payment in equity.

Cherry v. Lamar, 58 Ga. 541; Branch v. Knapp, 61 Ga. 615; Mfg. Co. v. Bank, 6 Rich. Eq. (S. C.), 284; Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S 635 (24: 367); Bassett v. Hotel Co. 47 Vt. 313.

The running of the Statute of Limitations between the corporation and the stockholder cannot be suspended by the recovery of judgment against the corporation or by any note or written obligation of the latter, given by the officers after it has gone into liquidation.

Stilphen v. Ware, 45 Cal. 110.

The bank was in voluntary liquidation and therefore in the condition of a dissolved copartnership.

National Bk. v. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 74 (26:701).

No new debt can be made after insolvency declared by involuntary liquidation.

White v. Knox, 111 U. S. 784 (28: 603).

After a copartnership is dissolved, neither of the former parties has authority to bind the firm by new contracts, not even a partner authorized to settle.

Shaw, C. J., Parker v. Macomber, 18 Pick. 505.

Stock liability cannot be renewed or extended by any renewal or extension made by the creditor with the corporation.

Parrott v. Colby, 6 Hun, 55; S. C. 71 N. Y. 597.

If the amendment of July 23, 1883, changing the bill into one on behalf of all the creditors, had been properly allowed, which we deny, it simply amounted to a new suit as to all creditors then made parties, and the statute ran as to them up to that date.

Busby v. Seymore, 1 Jones & L. 527; Allen v. Link, 5 Lea (Tenn), 454; Christmas v. Mitchell, 3 Ired. Eq. 535; Holmes v. Trout, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 181 (8: 651); S. C. 1 McLean, 1; Miller's Heirs v. M'Intyre, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 61 (8: 320), Sicard v. Davis, Id. 124 (8: 342); Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Cobb, 64 Ill. 141; Phelps v. Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. 94 Ill. 548.

Where a claim is in the nature of a legal claim, though enforcible in equity, the Statute of Limitations applies directly and furnishes a complete bar to the prosecution of the suit.

The bank went into voluntary liquidation September 26, 1873. The cause of action then accrued, and suit might have been brought by any or all the creditors whose demands were due; they were then in the shape of credit balances on deposit.

Messrs. D. J. Schuyler and Edward G. Mason, for appellees:

There was no error in allowing the original bill to be amended for the purpose of enforcing the liability of the stockholders or in allowing the subsequent amendment thereto, nor was the bill as amended multifarious.

In this case an accounting was necessary, as the recovery was for an amount less than the par value of the stock, and the proceedings therefore necessarily in equity.

Carrol v. Green, 92 U. S. 512 (23: 789); Pollard v. Bailey, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 521 (22: 376), Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. § 1, 235; Hornor v. Henning, 93 U. S. 228 (23: 879); Patterson v. Lynde, 112 Ill. 196.

The liability of stockholders, in associations organized under the National Banking Act, is conditional only for the payment of the debts after all the ordinary resources of the bank have been exhausted.

Bank v. Kennedy, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 19 (21: 554); Casey v. Galli, 94 U. S. 673 (24: 168).

When it was ascertained that the bank had no resources with which to meet the outstanding debts, the liability of the stockholders at once attached, and by operation of law became a trust fund, from which payment could be made, but unavailable until the amount of the bank's indebtedness had been ascertained and the amount of the assessments to be made on the stockholders determined.

There can be no question about the power of the court to allow amendments to the bill by making new parties and allegations, and inserting new matter for the purpose of showing the necessity for the amendment and to advise the parties in the case what they were required to meet.

Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. §§ 8, 401, 245; Morgan v.

N. Y. & A. R. R. Co. 10 Paige, Ch. 291; McDougald v. Dougherty, 14 Ga. 674; Hewett v. Adams, 50 Me. 271.

The form of the pleadings is immaterial if the case made by the proofs justify the relief prayed; and so it has been held that upon an ordinary creditor's bill, filed by two judgment creditors of an insolvent insurance company to collect their debt, an assessment might be made on the stockholders of the company sufficient to pay its debts; and that such fund, after paying the complainants, inured to the benefit of all the creditors.

Pennell v. Lamar Ins. Co. 78 Ill. 808; Derrick v. Lamar Ins. Co. 74 Ill. 404.

In courts of equity the pleadings are made to conform to the case made by the proofs, even to the substitution of an entirely new set of pleadings.

Neale v. Neale, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 1, 8 (19:590, 591); Battle v. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 10 Blatchf. 417.

Interest runs on debts of the bank. The Illinois Statute allows interest on a balance struck and for unreasonable and vexatious delay of payment.

Ill. Rev. Stat. Cap. 74, § 2. See also National Bank v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 94 U. S. 437, 439 (24: 176, 178); Chemical Nat. Bank v. Bailey, 12 Blatchf. 480.

The Statute of Limitations is not a bar.

A liability of any kind cannot be barred until it comes due. It would seem that stock liability does not become due until an assessment is ordered, for then only is the amount ascertained and drawing interest. Where the Comptroller of the Currency imposes the assessment, stock liability bears interest from the date of his letter ordering the assessment.

Mr. James H. Roberts, for certain bankrupt defendants.

[28] Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

The original bill in this case was filed February 3, 1875, by James Irons, the defendants being the Manufacturers' National Bank of Chicago, organized under the National Banking Act, and Ira Holmes, its president. The bill alleged that the complainant had recovered a judgment against the bank for the sum of $12,408.51 damages, besides costs, an execution on which had been returned unsatisfied; that on or about October 11, 1873, the bank had [29] suspended payment and business, and, in pursuance of section 44 of the Banking Law, had gone into voluntary liquidation, its affairs having been put into the hands of the defendant Holmes, its president, for that purpose; that the defendant Holmes had thereafter settled a large amount of the indebtedness of the bank by giving notes made by him as president of the bank and guaranteed by him as such, and by using the assets of the bank in payment of its indebtedness; that he had also converted and appropriated to his own use an amount of the assets of the bank charged to be not less than $250,000; that he also had in his possession and control a large amount of the personal and real property purchased with the funds and moneys of the bank, but which he had fraudulently withheld and disposed of for his own use; "that the said voluntary liquidation aforesaid, and the proceedings thereunder by the said defendant Holmes, were a pretense and sham, and were suggested, instituted, and carried on for the sole and only purpose of concealing and covering up the transactions of the said bank, and of dissipating and disposing of its assets in such a way and manner most agreeable to the wishes and interests of the said defendant Holmes and those in his interest, and in fraud of the rights of your orator and the other creditors of the said bank;" that the capital stock of the bank actually paid in amounted to the sum of $500,000, owned by twenty-four stockholders, a schedule of the names of whom, with their respective places of residence, and the number of shares owned by each, are set out in an exhibit to the bill.

The bill prays for a discovery under oath of "what moneys, cash, notes, bills receivable, United States bonds, and other property and effects the said bank had in its possession and was the owner of at the time of the said suspension thereof, and at the time the same went into voluntary liquidation in the manner as aforesaid, or what moneys, cash, notes, bills receivable, United States bonds, and other property the said bank has since had in its possession or control, or been the owner of, or the said Holmes, as president thereof, or otherwise, has since had in his possession or control be- [30] longing to the said bank, and what disposition, payment, sale, or transfer has been made of the property and effects of the same and every part thereof." It also prays that all sales and conveyances made by the bank or by the defendant Holmes of property belonging to the bank may be set aside as fraudulent, and that all the property and effects of the bank in its possession, or in the possession of Holmes, may be delivered up into the possession and control of the court, and applied, so far as necessary, to the payment of the complainant's judgment; that the defendants may be enjoined from making any further transfers of the property of the bank; that a receiver may be appointed of all the property and effects of the bank; and for general relief.

At various times subsequent to the filing of the bill other judgment creditors of the bank filed petitions for leave to be made parties, and were allowed to join in the bill as cocomplainants. On the 12th of February, 1875, the defendants interposed a demurrer to the bill. The grounds of the demurrer were, among others, that a creditor's bill in behalf of one or more creditors would not lie, because the assets must be equally distributed among all; that a receiver of a national bank could only be appointed and the assets distributed by the Comptroller of the Currency under the Act of Congress, and that the court had no power to enjoin a national bank from disposing of its assets in voluntary liquidation.

On the 26th of February, 1875, the demurrer was overruled, and Joel D. Harvey was appointed a receiver with full power and authority to take and receive possession and control of all the property of the bank, with directions to collect and convert the same into money, to be applied according to the order and direction of the court.

On the first of April, 1875, the defendants [31] filed a joint and several answer to the bill. They admit that the bank went into voluntary liquidation on September 26, 1873, and between that time and the time of filing the bill that it settled a large amount of its indebtedness, so that there remained due to its depositors only $39,000; and alleges that these settlements were made mainly by paying out to creditors the assets of the bank, in some cases the defendant Holmes giving his personal obligations, which in a few instances were indorsed by him as president of the bank. The defendant Holmes denies all the fraud charged in the bill, and particularly that he had converted and appropriated to his own use any of the assets of the bank, and denies that he has any of such assets in his possession or under his control; and alleges, on the other hand, that he had given his private obligations in payment of the debts of the bank, which had more than exhausted all his resources and brought him into a state of bankruptcy.

The said Holmes, as president, and for himself personally, also avers in the answer, "that at the time said bank went into voluntary liquidation as aforesaid he verily believed that said bank and himself were solvent, and would be able to pay their debts in full by making settlements with the creditors to their satisfaction, and they, these defendants, so believed, while making said settlements, and he was advised by his attorneys, and so believed himself, that all settlements made with the creditors of said bank in the manner aforesaid, pursuant to said 42d section of the National Banking Act, would be valid, and that both said bank and its creditors so settled with would be protected, and that said settlements could not be set aside or in any manner interfered with; that, acting upon this advice, and what he believed to be the unquestioned law in the premises, said bank and its creditors, believing that they were within the letter and spirit of said section of the Banking Act, effected settlements to the amount of about $900,000, aside from reducing its capital stock to $178,000, and these defendants now claim that said settlements are all valid, and cannot be inquired into."

On October 5, 1876, leave was given the complainant to file an amended bill making additional defendants, and it was filed on the same day. The amended bill alleges that the bank suspended payment on September 22, 1873; that it had been previously and ever since has continued to be insolvent; that the complainant was a creditor by judgment, as stated in the original bill, on which execution had been returned unsatisfied; that the bank, after suspending payment, went into voluntary liquidation under the management of the defendant Holmes, who settled a large amount of the indebtedness of the bank, so as to reduce it to about $40,000. The amended bill then sets out the names of the various stockholders of the bank, with the amount of shares owned by each, and alleges that while the bank was contemplating insolvency, and was in fact insolvent, [32] and after the suspension of payment, certain of the persons named as stockholders, and who were also made defendants, combining and confederating with the defendant Holmes, surrendered and delivered up to him, the said Holmes, the certificates of shares of stock held by them respectively, on some pretended contract of purchase, the same having been purchased with the money and assets of the bank, and canceled at the request and by the direction of the said stockholders for the avowed purpose of releasing them, and each of them, from any personal liability on account thereof to the creditors of the said bank; but that, nevertheless, the same were never in fact canceled or transferred on the books of the bank, but now stand on said books in the names of the said defendants; and it is charged that the said pretended purchase and attempt at cancellation of the said stock was a fraud upon the complainant and the other creditors of the said bank, and should be set aside.

The bill accordingly prays for a discovery from the defendants of the facts in relation to the said transactions, and that the same may be set aside and decreed to have been made in fraud of the rights of the complainant and the other creditors of the bank; and "that the said stockholders, and each of them, he subjected to the liability created by the statute thereon in the same manner and to the same extent as though such sales, transfers or surrenders had never been made; and that the said stockholders, or such of them as have sold, transferred or surrendered, or pretended to sell, transfer or surrender, etc., the shares of stock so as aforesaid held and owned by them at the time the said bank suspended payment, in the manner as aforesaid, may be decreed to hold the moneys, property and effects received by them for said stock, in the manner as aforesaid, in trust for [33] the creditors of the said bank, and, upon the respective amounts being ascertained, that they be decreed to pay the same to creditors thereof, or to such person or persons as your honors shall order and direct."

The bill also prays "that an account be taken of the amounts due from each of the said defendants to your orator and the judgment and other creditors of the said bank as stockholders thereof, upon the basis of the number of shares of stock held by them at the time the said bank suspended payment in the manner as aforesaid, in pursuance of the provisions of the Act under which the said bank was organized, and by which the liability of the stockholders thereof is fixed and determined. That a full and complete and accurate account be taken of all the sales, transfers or surrenders, or pretended sales, transfers, etc., of stock made by the said stockholders of the said bank, or any of them, after the same suspended payment in the manner as aforesaid, and to the amounts received by them respectively for any such sales, transfers, etc., and that they may be decreed to hold the same in trust for the creditors of said bank in the manner as hereinbefore prayed, and that upon such accounts being taken the said defendants, or such of them as shall be found liable to your orator and the judgment and other creditors of the said bank upon the said stock liability created by the said Banking Act, and such of them as shall be liable for the amounts received by them for the sales and transfers of stock so made by them in the manner as aforesaid, be decreed to pay whatever amount shall be due from them, and each of them respectively, into court or to the receiver duly appointed by said court, and that out of the fund so created your orator's judgment be paid in full, and the balance thereof be distributed among the other creditors of said bank in such way and manner as your honors shall direct."

All of the defendants named in the amended bill within its jurisdiction were served with process and appeared. On behalf of certain of these defendants a motion was made to strike the amended bill from the files, and others [34] filed demurrers, for the reason, in substance, that it made a new case, different from that set out in the original bill, and inconsistent with it, containing matters and asking relief that could only be properly obtained by an original bill.

On the 9th of May, 1877, the complainant, James Irons, having died, a bill of revivor was filed in the name of his personal representatives.

On October 1, 1878, the motion to strike from the files and the demurrers interposed to the amended bill were overruled, and the defendants required to answer. Subsequently, answers were filed at various times by the several defendants who appeared, the contents of which it is not necessary here particularly to notice, except to say that issue was joined by replication duly filed. On July 23, 1883, on the final hearing the complainant had leave to amend, and did amend, the amended bill of complaint so as to allege expressly that it was filed on behalf of himself and all other creditors of the Manufacturers' National Bank of Chicago; the prayer being amended so as to require an account to be taken of the amount due the complainant and other creditors of the defendant; striking out those parts which asked that the complainant's judgment be decreed to be a first lien on the property of the bank, and paid first in full out of the fund for distribution; and adding a prayer that the fund so created might be distributed among all the creditors of said bank pro rata, in such a way and manner as should be directed. To this amended bill, as finally amended, various defendants filed several answers instanter, setting up by way of a bar to the relief prayed for against the defendants, as holders of the shares of stock in the banking association, the statute of limitations of five years of the State of Illinois; and also insisting that the bill as amended was multifarious and inconsistent, because it prayed for further and different relief from that authorized by the Act of Congress approved June 30, 1876. On the same day a decree was entered in the cause, which finds, among other things, as follows: That the Manufacturers' National Bank of Chicago became insolvent and suspended payment September 22, 1873, and, in pursuance of the Act of Congress, went into voluntary liquidation on September 26, 1873; that debts of the bank are still due [35] and unpaid; that at the time of the bank's insolvency and suspension of payment, the capital stock of the bank consisted of 5,000 shares, of the par value of $100 each, setting out the names of the owners thereof, with the number of shares owned by each; that after the said bank had become insolvent and suspended payment, certain shareholders of said bank transferred the stock held by them, but that all and each of such transfers were and are in derogation of the rights of creditors, and were and are invalid; and that certain named defendants, shareholders of said bank, setting out their names, are individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for the other, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of the bank to the extent of the amount of stock standing in their names respectively, on the 23d of September, 1873, and before any transfers were made that day, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such bank.

The death of the defendant, William H. Adams, on the 5th of June, 1882, was suggested, and Elizabeth Adams, his executrix, made a party defendant in his stead.

By an order entered May 7, 1879, the case was referred to Henry W. Bishop, Esquire, a Master in Chancery, to take proof and report, first, the amount of the debts of said bank still unpaid and the amount due each creditor thereof; second, the value of the assets, if any, of the bank; third, the amount of assessment necessary to be made on each share of the capital stock of said bank in order to fully pay the indebtedness of the bank, and the amount due and payable from each shareholder upon such assessment.

On the 6th of January, 1885, the master reported his findings under the decree of July 23, 1883. He reported the amount of the debts of the bank unpaid as of the 1st of November, 1884, to be $368,971.50, the name of each creditor and the amount due him being set out in a schedule. The claims of these creditors are also classified by the master as follows: 1, for clerical services to the bank, $183.31; 2, for past services of the receiver and his attorneys, $4,437.04; 3, claims arising before the failure of [36] the bank, upon which no collaterals were taken, $179,231.81; 4, claims arising before the failure of the bank, on account of which worthless collaterals had been subsequently received, $185,119.84. The master further reported that there were no assets of the bank outside of the stockholders' liability, and that the amount of assessment necessary to be made upon each share of the capital stock of the bank, in order to fully pay the indebtedness, was 90 per cent. A schedule attached to the report gives the name of each stockholder, and opposite his name the number of his shares of stock in the bank, the par value thereof, the per cent of assessment to be levied thereon, and the amount due and payable from him upon such assessment. These stockholders were also classified as embracing, 1, stockholders who had been duly served with process or entered their appearance in the cause; 2, stockholders who had obtained a discharge in bankruptcy and were not liable to stock assessments on that account; and, 3, stockholders who reside outside the jurisdiction of the court and have not been found within the district.

On February 2, 1885, various exceptions were filed on behalf of the defendant stockholders to this report of the master. An exception thereto was also filed on behalf of the receiver and creditors so far as it reported in favor of certain stockholders claiming to have been discharged from their liability by their certificates in bankruptcy. Upon the hearing of these exceptions, the court referred the cause again to the master to compute from the proofs already taken in the cause, 1, the indebtedness of the bank at the time of the failure; 2, subsequent actual payments upon indebtedness; 3, net amount of indebtedness, with interest on same at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the time of the failure of the bank; and, 4, the necessary assessment upon the stockholders to pay said indebtedness, including the expenses of the receivership.

In pursuance of this direction, on the 25th of May, 1886, the master made a supplemental report, in which he finds that the indebtedness of the bank at the time of the failure thereof, to wit, the 23d day of September, 1878, amounted in the aggregate to the sum of $410,064.10; [37] that the subsequent actual payments upon said indebtedness amounted to the sum of $213,018.46; that the net amount of the indebtedness was the sum of $197,045.64; that the interest upon said last mentioned sum from the 23d of September, 1878, when the bank failed, down to May 21st, 1886, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, is the sum of $149,686.98, making the total unpaid indebtedness of said bank on the last mentioned date the sum of $346,732.62; that 20 per cent upon said last mentioned sum, amounting to the sum of $69,346.52, is necessary to be added thereto for the expenses of the receivership, making a total sum of $416,079.11; and that the necessary assessment upon the stockholders to pay said indebtedness, including the expenses of the receivership, is 83.2 per cent upon the capital stock of $500,000.

In addition to those filed to the original report, exceptions were filed to the supplemental report, objecting to the allowance of interest upon the claims of the creditors, and to the addition of 20 per cent to the amount of the indebtedness, for the purpose of providing for the payment of the expenses of the receivership. All the exceptions to the master's reports were overruled, and a final decree was entered against the defendants according to its findings; a decree being entered against each stockholder defendant severally for the amount computed to be due from him upon the assessment of the stock ascertained to be standing in his name on the books of the bank at the date of its suspension, at the rate of assessment fixed in the report of the master. From this decree Alonzo Richmond, Charles Comstock, Thomas Lord, and William Henri Adams, administrator de bonis non of the estate of William H. Adams, deceased, severally appealed.

Some of the questions raised by the assignments of error are common to all the appellants, and others are peculiar to the individual cases. So far as necessary to the disposition of the case, they will be considered in their order.

The first assignment of error relates to the pleadings. It is objected that the court erred in permitting the complainant to file the amended bill of October 5, 1876, and also in permitting the amendment made at the hearing on July 23, 1883; and we are asked to reverse the decree on that account, and on remanding the cause to direct that the amended bill as amended be dismissed. The grounds of objection to the amendments as made are: 1, that the amended bill stated a case entirely different from that contained in the original bill; and 2, that it made the bill as amended multifarious. The changes made in the case as originally stated in the bill are alleged to be: 1, that it converted a creditor's bill, the object of which was to subject to the payment of the complainant's judgment assets of the corporation which could not be reached at law, into a bill for the additional purpose of enforcing the statutory liability of the stockholders of the bank to answer for its contracts, debts, and engagements; and 2, that it converted the bill filed by the complainant in his own right into a bill on behalf of himself and all other creditors of the corporation.

It is a mistake, however, to assume that the bill as originally filed was strictly and technically a creditor's bill merely, for the purpose of subjecting equitable assets to the payment of the complainant's judgment. That undoubtedly was a part of its purpose and prayer, and in pursuance of it a small amount of the assets of the bank were recovered by the receiver, converted into money, and applied to the payment of the costs in the cause, but the whole of this recovery amounted only to $3,346.96, and it was not until after this result became manifest that application was made and leave given to file the amended bill. But the main purpose of the bill as originally framed was to [44] obtain a judicial administration of the affairs of the bank on the ground that its capital stock and property was a trust fund for the benefit of its creditors, the company being insolvent and in liquidation, and that under the management of its officers and directors this trust was being violated and perverted. The bill contained allegations that Holmes, the president and manager of the bank, had converted its assets to his own use and to the use of others, in violation of his trust and in fraud of creditors, applying the assets of the bank so as to prefer some creditors over others, and otherwise dissipating and squandering them. It accordingly prayed for a full discovery of all the transactions on the part of Holmes, in reference to the affairs of the bank since its suspension; for an injunction prohibiting any further transfers of its assets; for the appointment of a receiver with the general powers of receivers in like cases, and for general relief.

If this bill had been prosecuted, as originally framed, to final decree, and had resulted in the recovery of assets of the bank applicable to its purposes, it would necessarily have been made to appear during the progress of the suit that there were other creditors of the bank equally entitled with the complainant to share in the fruits of the litigation. The relief that would have been granted in such circumstances would have been by means of a decree distributing the assets obtained, equally among all the creditors, including the complainant, who, in respect to such assets, would have been entitled to no priority, either by virtue of having reduced his claim to judgment or by reason of having first filed a bill to enforce the trust. In the case of an insolvent incorporation thus brought into liquidation, and wound up by judicial process at the suit of a creditor, whether he sues in his own right, or on behalf of himself and other creditors, the rule of distribution is the same, and is founded upon the principle of equality in which equity delights; unless a claimant or some other judgment creditor had, previously to the filing of the bill, obtained a lien at law upon some portion of the property distributed, or could establish a superior equity, [45] existing at the time of the filing of the bill. Curran v. Arkansas, 56 U. S. 15 How. 304 [14: 705]; Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 308; Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co. 63 U. S. 22 How. 387 [16: 351]; Sawyer v. Hoag, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 610 [21: 731].

When the amended bill was filed, the resources of the bank, discovered and delivered to the receiver, had been exhausted. The amended bill set out the names of all the stockholders, and all of those claimed to have been stockholders at the date of the suspension, by name, with the number of shares belonging to each. It charged that certain of them combined and confederated with the defendant Holmes for the purpose of committing a fraud upon the creditors of the bank, by surrendering and transferring their shares of stock, receiving in exchange therefor a portion of the assets of the bank applicable to the payment of its debts. It accordingly prays, as a part of the relief, that these transactions may be inquired into and set aside; that the assets of the bank so received by any of these stockholders may be decreed to be delivered up and applied to the payment of the debts of the bank; and that, in addition thereto, an account be taken of all the present indebtedness of the bank and of the amounts due from each of the defendants "to your orator and the judgment and other creditors of the said bank as stockholders thereof, upon the basis of the number of shares of stock held by them at the time the said bank suspended payment in the manner as aforesaid, in pursuance of the provisions of the Act under which the said bank was organized and by which the liability of the stockholders thereof is fixed and determined."

In some respects it is quite true that this amended bill is a departure from the case as stated in the original bill. It was, however, germane to the original bill to have included in it the statements of the amended bill in respect to such of the stockholders as were charged by name with having, in combination with the president of the company sold their stock, receiving assets of the bank in payment therefor after it had gone into liquidation, or in contemplation of insolvency, and in fraud of the creditors. Assets of the bank received by any of them in such circumstances were such as were clearly within the purview of the bill as originally framed, and those allegations were [46] certainly the subject of a proper amendment. Having thus brought in a number of the stockholders properly as defendants, to subject them to a decree to account for assets of the bank received by them in breach of trust and in fraud of creditors, it does not seem inappropriate or foreign to the general purposes of the bill for the court, having jurisdiction over them in behalf of the complainant, who, as we have seen, necessarily represented all creditors entitled to share in the results of the suit, to proceed upon the basis of granting the additional and complete relief prayed against them as stockholders, requiring them to answer under the statute for all the contracts, debts, and engagements of the bank. But to do this made it necessary to bring in all other stockholders of the bank within the reach of the process of the court, although they may not have been charged as participating in the alleged breaches of trust and fraud. The various matters, therefore, contained in the amended bill and the original bill were thus connected with each other in such a way as fairly to bring the question of granting leave to file the amended bill within the discretion of the court below. In reviewing the exercise of that discretion on this appeal, we should not feel justified in any case in reversing the action of the circuit court, if it appeared that the appellants were not put to any serious disadvantage or materially prejudiced thereby. The amendment made at the hearing, whereby the amended bill was changed so as to state that it was filed by the complainant on behalf of himself and all other creditors, we regard as purely formal and properly permitted for the purpose of making the bill explicitly to conform to all that had taken place previously in the progress of the cause. The litigation had been conducted, from the time of the filing of the first amended bill, upon the supposition and theory that it included in its scope all creditors of the bank alike. The defendants, therefore, could not have been taken by surprise by the amendment, and would not be deprived of the benefit of any defense or put to any disadvantage on account thereof.

The action of the circuit court in permitting these amendments we think is justified by the rules on that subject as stated by this court in [47] the case of Neale v. Neale, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 1 [19: 590]; in The Tremolo Patent, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 518 [23: 97]; and Hardin v. Boyd, 113 U. S. 756 [28: 1141]. In the last mentioned case it was said, p. 761 [1142]: "In reference to amendments of equity pleadings the courts have found it impracticable to lay down a rule that would govern all cases. Their allowance must, at every stage of the cause, rest in the discretion of the court; and that discretion must depend largely on the special circumstances of each case. It may be said, generally, that, in passing upon applications to amend, the ends of justice should never be sacrificed to mere form, or by too rigid an adherence to technical rules of practice. Undoubtedly great caution should be exercised when the application comes after the litigation has continued for some time, or when the granting of it would cause serious inconvenience or expense to the opposite side. And an amendment should rarely, if ever, be permitted when it would materially change the very substance of the case made by the bill, and to which the parties have directed their proofs."

By the original National Banking Act, section 5151 of the Revised Statutes, it was declared that "The shareholders of every national banking association shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of such association, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares." By section 5220, it was also provided that "Any association may go into liquidation and be closed by the vote of its shareholders owning two thirds of its stock." But no provision is contained in the original Act specifying what course may or shall be taken, in case of voluntary liquidation, to enforce the individual liability of the shareholders. It is provided by section 5234 that when the Comptroller of the Currency has become satisfied of the default of the association under sections 5226 and 5227 to redeem any of its circulating notes, he may forthwith appoint a receiver who, under his direction, shall take possession of the books, records, and assets of the association, collect all debts, dues, and claims belonging to it, "and may, if necessary to pay the debts of such association, enforce the individual liability of the stockholders. Such receiver shall pay over all money so made to the Treasurer of the United States, subject to the order of the Comptroller, and also make report to the Comptroller of all his [48] acts and proceedings."

It thus appears that in the case of an involuntary liquidation under this section, the business of liquidation, as defined and required by the law, involved the appointment of the receiver, who should, in addition to the collection of the ordinary assets of the bank, also enforce against the stockholders their individual liability, so far as necessary to create a fund sufficient to pay all the debts of the association. It can hardly be supposed that the omission of the statute to provide an express and specific course of proceeding, by way of judicial remedy, in case of voluntary liquidation, left the creditors of such an association in such circumstances without remedy against either a deficiency of assets or the results of a fraudulent maladministration. Section 5151 imposes upon the shareholders of every national banking association an individual responsibility for all its contracts, debts, and engagements, and the terms in which the obligation is created are unconditional and unqualified, except that the liability shall be equal and ratable as among the shareholders.

As all the shareholders are bound in that way to all the creditors, any proceeding to enforce this liability must be such as from its nature would enable the court to ascertain for what the stockholders ought to be made liable, to whom, and in what proportion as respects each other. This can only be done by the methods and machinery of a court of equity. Besides this, it must, we think, be admitted that a court of equity would be entitled, upon the general principles of its jurisdiction, to entertain a bill by one or more creditors whose suit would necessarily be for the benefit of all against the association and its officers and managers, and all those participating in its voluntary liquidation for the purpose of preventing and redressing any maladministration or fraud against creditors contemplated or executed. In the liquidation of such an association, those entrusted with its management occupy the relation of trustees, first for creditors, and the terms of that trust, implied [49] by law, require them to reduce the assets of the association to money or its equivalent, and to pay out those assets or their proceeds equally among creditors.

The omission in the original Banking Act of 1864, to provide expressly similar remedies in case of voluntary liquidation to those specified in case of involuntary liquidation was supplied by the Act of June 30, 1876, 19 Stat. at L. 63; Supp. Rev. Stat. 216. The first section of that Act provides for the appointment of a receiver by the Comptroller of the Currency, as provided in section 5234 of the Revised Statutes, whenever any national bank shall be dissolved and its charter forfeited as prescribed in section 5239 of the Revised Statutes, or whenever any creditor shall have obtained a judgment against it which has remained unpaid for a space of thirty days, or whenever the Comptroller shall become satisfied of its insolvency after due examination. This receiver, it is declared, shall proceed to close up such association and enforce the personal liability of the shareholders. Section 2 of the Act of June 30, 1876, is as follows: "That when any national banking association shall have gone into liquidation, under the provisions of section 5220 of said statutes, the individual liability of the shareholders, provided for by section 5151 of said statutes, may be enforced by any creditor of such association by bill in equity, in the nature of a creditor's bill, brought by such creditor on behalf of himself and of all other creditors of the association, against the shareholders thereof, in any court of the United States having original jurisdiction in equity for the district in which such association may have been located or established." This section was in force when the first amended bill was filed in October, 1876. Whether we regard it as merely declaratory of the law as it stood under the original Banking Act, or as giving a new remedy which could not have been resorted to before, we think it warranted the court below in permitting the complainant to file his first amended bill.

In the case of involuntary liquidation under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency, the receiver appointed by him is authorized and required, not only to collect and apply the proper assets of the bank to the payment of its debts, but also, so far as may be necessary, to enforce the individual liability of the shareholders. It thus appears that the enforcement of this liability is a part of the liquidation of the affairs of the bank; at least, so closely connected with it as to constitute but one continuous transaction. When, in [50] case of voluntary liquidation, the proceeding is instituted by one or more creditors for the benefit of all, by means of the jurisdiction of a court of equity, there seems to be no reason why the nature of the proceeding should be considered as changed. The intention of Congress evidently was to provide ample and effective remedies in all the specified cases for the protection of the public and the payment of creditors, by the application of the assets of the bank and the enforcement of the liability of the stockholders. Admitting that this liability is not strictly an asset of the bank, because it could not be enforced for its benefit as a corporation nor in its name, yet it is treated as a means of creating a fund to be applied with and in aid of the assets of the bank towards the satisfaction of its obligations. The two subjects of applying the assets of the bank and enforcing the liability of the stockholders, however otherwise distinct, are by the statute made connected parts of the whole series of transactions which constitute the liquidation of the affairs of the bank. It was, therefore, proper to describe the bill to be filed by and on behalf of creditors as in the nature of a creditors' bill so as to enlarge the scope and purpose of a bill that might be more strictly limited as a creditors' bill merely.

We think, therefore, that if such a bill would have been objectionable without the statute, it is warranted by the statute. It is no objection that the original bill was filed prior to the passage of the Act of June 30, 1876. The bill as amended, being authorized by the statute in force at the time the amendment was filed, would justify such a proceeding in a pending suit to which it was made germane by the statute itself, as well as an original bill then for [51] the first time filed. Neither do we consider the objection valid that it does not purport to have been filed in pursuance of the Act of June 30, 1876, and is not filed by the complainant on behalf of all the creditors. The scope and prayer of the bill under the operation of the statute made it a bill for the benefit of all the creditors, notwithstanding it erroneously claimed priority on behalf of the complainant individually. The only proper decree that could have been rendered upon it would have been for the equal distribution of the fruits of the litigation among all the creditors of the bank who in the meantime had come in and proved their claims. The final amendment, as we have already seen, only had the effect to make the bill conform to the course of the proceeding which had actually been had under it, and was, therefore, purely formal. Its only effect was to make the bill profess to be what in law it was, and what in point of fact it had been considered to be.

Mr. Daniell (Ch. Pr. chap. 5, § 1, p. 245, 4th ed.) says: "The court will generally at the hearing allow a bill, which has been originally filed by one individual of a numerous class in his own right, to be amended so as to make such individual sue on behalf of himself and the rest of the class."

Our conclusion on this point is that the court below committed no error in permitting the amendments complained of to be made.

The assignment of error next to be considered arises upon the defense made on behalf of the defendants below, of the Statute of Limitations. The limitation relied upon is that prescribed by an Act of Illinois, which provides that "Actions on unwritten contracts, express or implied, or on awards of arbitration, or to recover damages for an injury to property, real or personal, or to recover the possession of personal property, or damages for the detention or conversion thereof, and all civil actions not otherwise provided for, shall be commenced within five years next after the cause of action accrued." Rev. Stat. Ill, 1881, 705.

It is not necessary to decide in this case whether the Statute of Illinois relied upon is applicable, because in the view which we have already taken of the nature of the amended [52] bill filed in October, 1876, the statute, if applicable, ceased to run against the creditors of the bank entitled to the benefit of the decree, at that date. That amended bill is to be considered from the date of its filing, as a bill on behalf of all the creditors of the bank who should come in under it and prove their claims. When any creditor appeared during the progress of the cause to set up and establish his claim, it was necessary for him to prove that at the time of filing the bill he was a creditor of the bank; any defense which existed at that time to his claim, either to diminish or defeat it, might be interposed either before the master, or on the hearing to the court. The creditor, having established his claim, became entitled to the benefit of the proceeding as virtually a party complainant from the beginning, and the time that had elapsed from the filing of the bill to the proof of his claim would not be counted as a part of the time relied on to bar the creditor's right to sue the stockholders. In other words, if he proves himself to be a creditor with a valid claim against the bank, he becomes a complainant by relation to the time of the filing of the bill. This being so, it is not disputed that in October, 1876, the bar of the statute had not taken effect, even on the supposition that the statute applied.

In the case of In Re General Rolling Stock Co., Joint Stock Discount Company's Claim, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 646, Mellish, L. J., stated that in a case where the assets of a debtor are to be divided amongst his creditors, whether in bankruptcy or in insolvency, or under a trust for creditors, or under a decree of the court of chancery in an administration suit, "the rule is that everybody who had a subsisting claim at the time of the adjudication, the insolvency, the creation of the trust for creditors, or the administration decree, as the case may be, is entitled to participate in the assets, and that the Statute of Limitations does not run against his claim, but as long as assets remain unadministered he is at liberty to come in and prove his claim, not disturbing any former dividend."

Mr. Daniell (1 Ch. Pr. chap. 15, par. 2, p. 643, 4th ed.) states that "a decree for the pay- [53] ment of debts under a creditor's bill for the administration of assets is also considered as a trust for the benefit of creditors, and will in like manner prevent the statute from barring the demand of any creditor coming in under the decree. The creditor's demand, however, must not have been barred at the time when the suit was instituted, for if the creditor's demand would have been barred by the statute before the commencement of the suit the statute may be set up. It is to be remarked upon this point, that it has been held that it was the decree only which created the trust, and that the mere circumstance of the bill having been filed, although it might have been pending six years, would not take the case out of the statute, but according to the later decisions, it seems that the filing of the bill will operate by itself to save the bar of the statute, though the plaintiff by delay in prosecuting the suit may disentitle himself to relief."

He also says (chap. 29, par. 1, p. 1210): "It may be observed here that where a person, not a party to the suit, carries in a claim before the master under the decree, the party representing the estate out of which the claim is made has the right to the benefit of any defense which he could have made if a bill had been filed by the claimant in equity or an action had been brought at law to establish such claim. Therefore, as we have seen, an executor may in the master's office set up the Statute of Limitations as a bar to a claim by a creditor under the decree, provided such claim was within the operation of the statute before the decree was pronounced."

The authorities abundantly sustain the proposition also that a creditor who comes in under and takes the benefit of a decree is entitled to contest the validity of the claim of any other creditor, except that of the plaintiff whose claim is the foundation of the decree. 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. chap. 29, § 1, p. 1210, note 4, and cases cited.

In Sterndale v. Hankinson, 1 Simons, 393, decided in 1827, it was stated by Vice Chancellor Leach, that "every creditor has to a certain extent an inchoate interest in a suit instituted [54] by one on behalf of himself and the rest, and it would be attended with mischievous consequences to estates of deceased debtors if the court were to lay down a rule by which every creditor would be obliged either to file his bill or bring his action."

It is supposed by counsel for the appellants that the authority of this case is shaken by what was said by Jessel, M. R., in his decision of Re Greaves, deceased, Bray v. Tofield, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 551. It is true that in this case the Master of the Rolls said that creditors had better not rely upon that decision for the future, but he points out as the reason that at the time he was speaking—in 1881—bills in equity had been abolished in England, and that wherever it is an action to recover a debt upon a contract the Statute of James was binding upon the High Court in every case in which it applies; and that it was no longer the practice, so far as personal estate was concerned, to bring an action by one creditor on behalf of others, because of a provision in the Act of 1852, since the passing of which the practice had been abandoned of suing by one creditor on behalf of all, except in cases relating to real estate, as to which the section of the statute does not apply, unless it has been ordered to be sold or there is a trust or power of sale, and that, therefore, there were no longer any suits brought by any creditor, except for the payment of his own debt. In the present case, the suit, although in the nature of a creditor's bill, is not a bill merely for the administration of the assets of an insolvent corporation. There is no fund formerly belonging to the corporation in court for distribution. It is a suit for the enforcement of a personal liability of the defendant stockholders to pay the debts of the corporation, in which the creditors are the complainants. Each creditor becomes a party to the suit, it is true, only when he appears to prove his claim. His right to proceed depends upon the fact of his being the owner of a valid claim against the corporation; but if he proves such a claim, then he does prove himself to be a creditor, and as such is entitled to come in under the decree, and has a right to be considered as a party complainant from the beginning by relation to the time of filing the bill. The be- [55] ginning of the suit as between the creditor and the stockholder is the date of the filing of the bill if during its progress and pendency he proves his right to be considered as a cocomplainant. It follows, therefore, that the statute sought to be applied in the present case ceased to run as against the complainants from the date when the bill was filed, in October, 1876, under which they subsequently established their right to come in as participants in the benefits of the decree. Whether or not the Statute of Limitations of Illinois would in any case operate to bar such a suit as the present, being a bill in equity in the Circuit Court of the United States, founded upon an obligation arising under an Act of Congress, is a question which we are, therefore, not called upon to consider or decide.

Another assignment of error is peculiar to the appeal of the administrator de bonis non of William H. Adams, deceased. William H. Adams in his lifetime was one of the defendants in the amended bill of 1876, and at the time of the suspension of the bank a stockholder to the extent of 240 shares. He died June 6, 1882, during the pendency of the suit, which stands revived as against his administrator de bonis non. The administrator contended that the personal liability of his intestate did not survive as against the administrator, and that, therefore, no decree could be rendered against him subjecting the estate of Adams in his hands for administration. The judicial decisions more directly relied upon by the appellant in support of this contention are those of Dane v. Dane Mfg. Co. 14 Gray, 488; Bacon v. Pomeroy, 104 Mass. 577; Ripley v. Sampson, 10 Pick. 370; Bangs v. Lincoln, 10 Gray, 600; Gray v. Coffin, 9 Cush. 192. These cases, however, so far as they are in point, are based upon the particular language of the Statutes of Massachusetts, materially differing from that contained in the National Banking Act. Under that Act the individual liability of the stockholders is an essential element in the contract by which the stockholders became members of the corporation. It is voluntarily entered into by subscribing for and ac- [56] cepting shares of stock. Its obligation becomes a part of every contract, debt, and engagement of the bank itself, as much so as if they were made directly by the stockholder instead of by the corporation. There is nothing in the statute to indicate that the obligation arising upon these undertakings and promises should not have the same force and effect, and be as binding in all respects, as any other contracts of the individual stockholder. We hold, therefore, that the obligation of the stockholder survives as against his personal representatives. Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. 371 [27: 966]; Hobart v. Johnson, 19 Blatchf. 359. In Massachusetts it was held, in Grew v. Breed, 10 Metc. 569, that administrators of deceased stockholders were chargeable in equity, as for other debts of their intestate, in their representative capacity.

The next assignment of error to be considered arises upon the separate appeal of Charles Comstock, who is charged by the decree with an assessment upon 150 shares of the capital stock of the bank standing in his name as owner at the time of its suspension. In his answer, which is under oath as called for, Comstock "admits that at the time of the said suspension he was the owner and holder of certain shares of capital stock thereof; that previous to—about in the year 1872 he was the owner of one hundred and fifty shares of said stock; that on or about the 8th day of February, 1873, this defendant sold, [57] assigned, and delivered fifty shares of the said stock to Ira Holmes, and on or about June, 1873, this defendant sold, assigned, and delivered fifty other shares of said stock to Preston C. Maynard; that he endeavored repeatedly to have said stock transferred on the books of the bank, but that said Maynard refused to allow said stock to be so transferred, although he had before promised to have the same transferred. That at the time of the said several sales of stock as aforesaid the said banking association was carrying on its regular business of banking, and was in fact solvent and fully able to pay its debts, and, as he is informed and believes, not indebted to any of the present creditors of said bank. That afterwards, on or about the 23d day of September, 1873, this defendant sold, assigned, and delivered to the said Ira Holmes his other fifty shares of stock in said bank, with other property, receiving in payment therefor, and for the other property sold to said Holmes at the same time, certain promissory notes of one Wm. Patrick, payable to the said Ira Holmes, and was secured with certain other notes by mortgage from said Wm. Patrick to said Ira Holmes, which said notes and mortgage have proven to be of little value to this defendant, and in consequence of the incumbrances and taxes upon said property, and the expense of foreclosing, and how much of the value of said notes and security should be attributable to the consideration of this sale of said stock, this defendant is unable to state, but he insists that at the time of said sale to said Holmes this defendant was informed and believed said bank was able to pay all its debts in full, and the consideration received by him was paid by said Holmes out of his individual property and not from the assets or property of said bank."

The stock books introduced on the part of the complainant show that fifty shares of this stock were transferred September 23, 1873; fifty more on September 24, 1873, and fifty more were canceled on the last date; and the testimony of Holmes is that, as to the last fifty shares, they must have been transferred at the said time. The transfers in each case were to Ira Holmes. It is found by the decree of July 23, 1883, that the bank became insolvent and suspended payment September 23, 1873, and went into voluntary liquidation on September 26, 1873. The resolutions of the shareholders of the bank, instructing the directors to put the bank into voluntary liquidation, were passed at a meeting held on September 25, 1873. One of the resolutions is as follows: "That this bank, in its endeavors to continue business through the existing panic, has substantially exhausted its cash resources and is unable to continue cash payments, and that we regard it for the best interests of the stockholders and depositors alike that its affairs be placed in voluntary liquidation in accordance with the 42d section of the National Currency Act in that [58] behalf provided." The directors, at a meeting held on the same day, resolved to go into voluntary liquidation and close up the affairs of the bank in pursuance of this resolution. The notice to the public, addressed to the creditors of the bank, was issued and advertised the next day. As to the fifty shares of stock sold by Comstock to Holmes on September 23, 1873, we think the conclusion cannot be resisted that the transaction was made in contemplation of the insolvency of the bank, and, although both parties may have believed that the bank would ultimately be able to pay all of its debts, notwithstanding this transaction, we think that, as against creditors, it was fraudulent in law, and to that extent Comstock is chargeable as a shareholder. The sale of fifty shares in February, 1873, and of the other fifty shares in June, 1873, there is no reason to suppose were not made in entire good faith, and without any expectation on the part of the parties of the insolvency of the bank. Notwithstanding that, Comstock continued to be upon the books of the bank the owner of these shares until September 23 and September 24, when they were respectively transferred.

By section 5139 of the Revised Statutes, those persons only have the rights and liabilities of stockholders who appear to be such as are registered on the books of the association, the stock being transferable only in that way. No person becomes a shareholder, subject to such liabilities and succeeding to such rights, except by such transfer; until such transfer the prior holder is the stockholder for all the purposes of the law. It follows, therefore, that Charles Comstock, in respect to the shares sold by him in February and June, 1873, was the statutory owner on the 23rd day of September, 1873. His liability as such stockholder is the same as if he had that day sold and transferred the stock to Ira Holmes, but such a sale and transfer could only have been made that day by Comstock, who was himself a director, in contemplation and actual knowledge of the suspension of the bank; it would operate as a fraud on the creditors, an effect which the law will not permit. The case is not within the rule laid down in Whitney v. Butler, 118 U. S. 655 [ante, 266]. Here there is no proof, as there was in that case, of the delivery of the certificate to the bank and a power of attorney authorizing its transfer, with a request to do so made at the time of the transaction. The [59] delivery was to Holmes, not as president, but as vendee. We are, therefore, constrained to hold that the decree below, in charging Comstock with liability as the owner of 150 shares, was not erroneous.

The next assignment of error is based upon that part of the decree which directs payment of the claims reported by the master under the denomination of Class D, amounting in the aggregate to $185,119.34. They are designated by the master as claims "arising before the failure of the bank, upon which worthless collaterals were subsequently received." It is averred by the appellees that they are claims arising for the most part, if not in all instances, upon indorsements and guarantees made in the name of the bank by Holmes, its president, after the suspension of the bank, and while it was in liquidation. It appears clearly from the evidence that, in many cases, parties having claims against the bank accepted from Holmes commercial paper held by the bank which it had received in the course of its business, and which constituted a part of its assets, running some of it several months and some of it several years, bearing interest, some at the rate of 8 and some at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, indorsed and guaranteed in the name of the bank by Holmes as president. The books of the bank show that in these cases the paper so received was charged against the account of the party receiving it, thus closing the account as settled. In these cases, it is testified by Holmes that the creditors gave their checks to the bank for the amount standing to their credit. In some cases, the creditors or their agents testifying to the transactions, without contradicting Holmes in respect to what was in fact done, nevertheless state that the paper accepted by them was received, not in payment, but as security. It is obvious, however, that in most, if not all instances, the witnesses are referring to the security which they supposed they had received and were entitled to rely upon, by means of the indorsement and guarantee of the paper thus received, made by Holmes as president in the name of the bank. They [60] certainly acted upon this belief, for in many instances they proceeded to obtain judgments against the bank, after the maturity and dishonor of the paper so received, upon these indorsements and guarantees, and in this proceeding proved their claims in that form by transcripts of such judgments. It is true that, in the final decree, the master was directed to correct his computation of interest so as to equalize the claims of the creditors by allowing interest at a uniform rate from the time of the suspension upon the amounts as they appeared to be due from the books of the bank, but all the claims in Class D, notwithstanding the settlements made, were included in the amounts found due and ordered to be paid. In this respect we are of the opinion that the decree is erroneous. Those creditors who made settlements after the bank was put into liquidation and received from the president in that settlement paper of the bank, or as in some cases the individual notes of Holmes himself, indorsed or guaranteed in the name of the bank, are not to be considered as creditors of the bank entitled to subject the stockholders to individual liability. The individual liability of the stockholders, as imposed by and expressed in the statute, is indeed for all the contracts, debts, and engagements of such association, but that must be restricted in its meaning to such contracts, debts, and engagements as have been duly contracted in the ordinary course of its business. That business ceased when the bank went into liquidation; after that there was no authority on the part of the officers of the bank to transact any business in the name of the bank so as to bind its shareholders, except that which is implied in the duty of liquidation, unless such authority had been expressly conferred by the shareholders. No such express authority appears in this case, and the power of the president or other officer of the bank to bind it by transactions after it was put into liquidation is that which results by implication from the duty to wind up and close its affairs. That duty consists in the collection and reduction to money of the assets of the bank, and the payment of creditors equally and ratably so far as the assets prove sufficient. Payments, of course, may be made in the bills receivable and other assets of the bank in specie, and the title [61] to such paper may be transferred by the president or cashier by an indorsement suitable to the purpose in the name of the bank, but such indorsement and use of the name of the bank is in liquidation and merely for the purpose of transferring title. It can have no other effect as against the shareholders by creating a new obligation. It does not constitute a liability, contract, or engagement of the bank for which they can be held to be individually responsible. Every creditor of the bank, receiving its assets under such circumstances, knows the fact of liquidation, and is chargeable with knowledge of its consequences; he takes the assets received at his own peril; he is dealing with officers of the bank only for the purpose of winding up its affairs. If he accepts something in lieu of an existing obligation looking to future payment, it must be from other parties. It is not within the power of the officers of the bank, without express authority, by such means to prolong indefinitely an obligation on the part of the shareholders, which is imposed by the statute only as a means of securing the payment of debts by an insolvent bank when it is no longer able to continue business, and for the purpose of effectually winding up its affairs. This is the very meaning of the word "liquidation." Mr. Justice Story said, in Fleckner v. Bank of U. S. 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 362 [5: 636]: "Its ordinary sense, as given by lexicographers, is to clear away, to lessen debt, and, in common parlance, especially among merchants, to liquidate the balance is to pay it." In White v. Knox, 111 U. S. 787 [28: 608], it was said: "The business of the bank must stop when insolvency is declared." In National Bank v. Insurance Co., 104 U. S. 54 [26: 693], the liquidation of such an association was said to be like that which follows the dissolution of a copartnership.

In this view, it is contended, on behalf of the creditors interested, that, as they relied upon the continuing liability of the bank and of its shareholders, by virtue of these indorsements and guarantees, if they are deprived of the benefit of the latter, the settlements themselves should be set aside, and they, the creditors, restored to the situation in which they were at the time of the suspension of the bank. But [62] this is clearly inadmissible; such a restoration cannot in fact be made. The circumstances of the situation have greatly changed by the lapse of time. The creditors who entered into these settlements have no ground of complaint against the bank as a corporation or as against its stockholders; they were not misled to their hurt by any fraudulent misrepresentations or concealments of any matters of fact. Whatever mistake was made was their own, and it was a mistake consisting merely in a misapprehension of their legal rights. They were bound to know, as well as Holmes, the limits of his authority, and ought to have acted on the presumption that he had no right to bind the bank or its shareholders in futuro by any new engagement. If they chose, in their eagerness to obtain a settlement in advance of other creditors equally entitled, to accept a part of the assets of the bank or the personal obligation of its president in settlement of their claims, they must abide by the election which was then made, and which cannot now be set aside. They made their settlements in view of their own estimate of the present advantage; they cannot now undo them to the disadvantage of other creditors, over whom they sought to obtain preferences, nor to the prejudice of the stockholders, who have a right to be exonerated from the payment of all contracts, debts, and engagements of the bank contracted since the date of its suspension.

In respect to these claims in Class D, Ira Holmes, the president, testified as follows:

"Q. In each case where you settled with the creditor of the bank and turned him out bills receivable of the bank, how was that settlement—was it a payment, or what was the transaction? A. It was a full payment of the demand. He gave me his check on the bank for the amount, the same as if we were doing a regular business and the parties should come in and buy so much bills receivable and give me a check on another bank.

"Q. Was there any case in which there was any other understanding than that he took these bills receivable in payment of his demand [63] against the bank? A. Not any."

On his cross examination he is asked:

"Q. If creditors agree to take paper in full payment, why would the bank guarantee it? A. I didn't say they agreed to take it in full; a great many people took the paper without guarantee, and others would not take it unless they had a guarantee; only when it got down to the last settlement, and they would not take it unless the bank would guarantee it."

The force of this testimony is, we think, that the party accepted the paper, with or without the guarantee, in settlement of the claim as it stood on the books of the bank on the day of the suspension. Those who insisted upon the guarantee or indorsement by the bank undoubtedly relied upon it as an obligation which they might thereafter enforce, but their reliance was upon that contract and not upon the original claim. It does not detract from the binding nature of the settlement that this guarantee was given and received and relied upon. The only mistake now asserted as a ground for going behind the settlement is, that the guarantee or indorsement is not effective as an obligation of the bank for which the stockholders are individually responsible. But this is not a mistake as to what the parties intended to do; it is only a mistake as to the effect of what they did. As the bank was in liquidation, and the officers were not authorized to enter into new contracts, the presumption is, in every case where the creditor accepted paper in settlement of his claim, that it was received in payment and operated as a satisfaction. If there was any other agreement by which that paper was received merely as collateral to the original debt and received as security and not in payment, it must be affirmatively shown.

We have carefully examined all the evidence contained in the record in respect to each of the claims embraced in Class D of the master's report. We are not able to find as to any one claim, that it is an exception from the general rule as to settlements established by the testimony of Holmes. In several instances, it is true that the witnesses with whom the settlements were made alleged that the notes with the indorsements or guarantees were not taken in payment and satisfaction, but as additional security for their claims; and that the transactions were made upon the faith that the remedy against the bank and against its stockholders was not thereby impaired. But it is quite evident, we think, that in each of these cases the reliance was not upon the liability arising upon [64] the claim as it stood prior to the settlement, but upon the indorsement or guaranty of the bank, and the belief that the liability of the stockholders remained unaffected by the transaction. The facts in each case are that the claim as it stood upon the books of the bank was settled between the parties by the creditor accepting bills receivable out of the assets of the bank, or the individual note of its president indorsed or guaranteed in the name of the bank; supposing that, in the event of default in payment by the other parties to the paper, the obligation of the bank itself was preserved by the indorsement or guaranty, and that for that contract the stockholders continued to be liable. Upon this view of the facts, the stockholders are by law exonerated from the obligation to contribute to the payment of any claims of this class. All those enumerated in Class D in the master's report, therefore, should have been excluded from the benefits of the decree.

Three other questions raised upon the record remain to be disposed of. The first is whether interest upon the debts of the bank should be allowed as against the stockholders from the date of the suspension. As the liability of the shareholder is for the contracts, debts, and engagements of the bank, we see no reason to deny to the creditor as against the shareholder the same right to recover interest which, according to the nature of the contract or debt, would exist as against the bank itself; of course, not in excess of the maximum liability as fixed by the statute. In the case of book accounts in favor of depositors, which was the nature of the claims in this case, interest would begin to accrue as against the bank from the date of its suspension. The act of going into liquidation dispenses with the necessity of any demand on the part of the creditors, and it follows that interest should be computed upon the amounts then due as against the shareholders to the time of payment.

The next question arises upon the objection [65] of the appellants to the allowance made by the decree of 20 per cent of the amount of the debts of the bank due at the date of the suspension, in addition thereto, to cover the expenses of the receivership. This sum, we think, ought not to have been allowed. The ordinary costs of the cause are, of course, taxable as against the defendants as in other cases, but we see no reason why the stockholders should be required to contribute, as a debt due from the bank or themselves, to a fund for the payment of the expenses of the receivership. The receiver in this case was appointed under the original bill, before any claim was set up on behalf of the complainant and the other creditors against the stockholders upon their individual liability. The purpose for which the receiver was appointed was to collect the proper assets of the bank and reduce them to money, so that they might be applied to the payment of its creditors. This office he performed, and the fund so realized may be and was properly charged with the expenses of its collection, but the receiver was not necessary to the enforcement of the liability of the stockholders in this suit. That liability was in progress of enforcement by the creditors themselves. Nothing was necessary to that end except the ordinary procedure by means of a master to ascertain what amount of debts was due, to what creditors, with the names of the stockholders who were such on the books of the bank at the date of its suspension, and the number of shares held by each. The case differs in this respect from that of an involuntary liquidation under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency. The receiver appointed by him is the only person authorized to enforce the liability of the stockholders, as well as to collect and distribute the assets of the bank; everything to be done must be done by and through him, and in his name; he is the only person charged with all the active duties and responsibilities of the liquidation of the bank, including the enforcement of the individual liability of the stockholders. The fund realized for distribution must, of course, include the costs and expenses necessarily incurred by him in the performance of these statutory duties. The equivalent for them, in the case of creditors who upon the voluntary liquidation of the bank seek to enforce the individual liability of the stockholders, is the ordinary costs of the court taxable in the cause. No receiver is necessary in ordinary cases, and there is nothing in the circumstances of this case to make it an exception. Whatever costs and expenses should be paid on account of the receivership in this case, beyond any allowance made heretofore and paid, if any, should come out of the creditors at whose instance the receiver was appointed, and not out of the stockholders.

It is also objected to the decree that it included among the claims directed to be paid out of the assessment upon the shareholders an amount, alleged to be about $5,000, in behalf of persons assumed to be creditors, but who did not appear in the cause or before the master to file and prove their claims. This was erroneous. No person is entitled to recover as a creditor who does not come forward to present his claim. The only proof in reference to such claims in the present case consisted in affidavits made by Henry B. Mason, one of the attorneys of the receiver, that he had "made a personal investigation of all the claims against the Manufacturers' National Bank, and, from the evidence introduced in the cause, and from outside knowledge confirmatory thereof, states that the Manufacturers' National Bank of Chicago is justly indebted to the several persons mentioned in the schedule hereunto annexed and made part of this affidavit, in the principal sums set opposite their several names, with interest thereon from March 12, 1875, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum in each case," etc. No one appeared as claimant, and no authority is shown to any one to act for him or in his own name. These claims should have been disallowed.

The decree of the Circuit Court is accordingly reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to proceed therein as justice and equity may require in conformity with this opinion; and it is so ordered.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF CLEVELAND, OHIO ET AL., Appts., [74]
v.
JOHN M. SHEDD ET AL., Trustees.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 74–87.)

Railroads—foreclosures of mortgages—trustee as representative of bondholders—right of majority to control—sale before settlement of questions as to priority and extent of lien.

1. The trustee of a railroad mortgage as a rule represents the bondholders in all legal proceedings carried on by him affecting his trust to which they are not actual parties; and where differences of opinion exist among them as to what their interests require, he should act, within the provisions of his trust, in accord with the wishes of the majority acting in good faith and without collusion.

2. In a proceeding for the foreclosure of two railroad mortgages and the determination as to the extent of the priority of lien of the first mortgage and the amount due on the issue of bonds thereunder, the law does not require that a sale shall be postponed, until all disputed questions as to the distribution of the proceeds are settled, against the wishes of the trustees and a large majority of the bondholders, merely because the intervenors, representing a minority interest, object.

Submitted Jan. 24, 1887. Decided Mar. 28, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

Motion to dismiss, with which is united a motion to affirm. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George T. Bispham and Dunning & Edsall, for John M. Shedd, appellee; and Messrs. Francis Rawle and D. T. Watson, for Henry Rawle, appellee, in support of motions.

Mr. John Dalzell, for appellants, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts on which these motions rest are as follows: The Shenango and Allegheny Valley Railroad Company is a corporation organized under a charter granted by the State of Pennsylvania to build and operate a railroad from a point of intersection or junction with the Erie and Pittsburgh Railroad, in the Township of West Salem, in the County of Mercer, to Bear Creek, in the County of Butler. In March, 1869, the directors of the company resolved to issue bonds to the amount of $1,000,000, and [75] secure them by a mortgage or deed of trust to Henry Rawle, Trustee, on that portion of its road "constructed and to be constructed between the western terminus thereof at its junction with the Erie and Pittsburgh Railroad in West Salem Township, Mercer County, and a point in Butler County forty miles southeastwardly from said western terminus, and to be denominated a first mortgage." Under this authority a mortgage or trust deed was actually executed to Rawle, as Trustee, not only on this forty miles of road, with its rolling stock and appurtenances, but also upon "any lateral or branch roads, with their appurtenances, that may hereafter be constructed by or come into possession of the company along the line of the aforementioned forty miles of main line or connected therewith; all of which things are hereby declared to be appurtenances and fixtures of the said railroad, and also all franchises connected with or relating to the said railroad, or the construction, maintenance, or use thereof, now held or hereafter acquired by the said party of the first part (the company), and all corporate and other franchises which are now or may be hereafter possessed or exercised by the" company. This mortgage was duly recorded, and all the bonds authorized were issued thereunder.

By an Act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, approved April 14, 1870, the company was authorized "to so extend their eastern terminus as to connect with the Allegheny Valley Railroad, and to so extend the western terminus as to connect with any other railroad;" and by another Act, approved March 7, 1872, "to construct three branches from their railroad as may be necessary and convenient for the development and transportation of coal, ore, limestone, and other minerals in the vicinity of their railroad, provided the said branches shall not exceed a distance of ten miles from the main line of said company."

The main line of the road was afterwards extended from its eastern terminus to the Allegheny Valley Railroad on the east side of the Allegheny River, and from its western end to the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad near the Town of Greenville, making the entire length of that line forty-seven miles. The company
[76] also built sundry branch roads, and on the first of July, 1877, it executed another mortgage or deed of trust to John H. Devereux, Trustee, to secure another proposed issue of $1,000,000 of bonds. This mortgage covered "the entire railroad, built and to be built, * * * from its junction with the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad * * * to the Allegheny Valley Railroad on the east side of the Allegheny River, together with all its branches, extensions, side tracks, switches and turnouts, built and to be built, and also all the lands, rights, franchises, and appurtenances thereto belonging, * * * and also all the corporate rights and franchises of said railroad company;" but it was expressly made "subject to a previous mortgage on forty miles of the northwestern end of the railroad aforesaid and its appurtenances executed to Henry Rawle, Trustee."

Under this mortgage $200,000 of bonds were issued, and $175,000 in addition were placed with the following parties as collateral security for the following sums:

1. First National Bank of Cleveland, O.....	$64,000	to secure	$80,000
2. Second National Bank of Erie, Pa....	60,000	"	85,000
3. First National Bank of Greenville.....	22,000	"	20,000
4. Mahoning Nat. Bank of Youngstown.....	16,000	"	10,000
5. Wick Brothers & Company	5,000	"	2,500
6. Thomas H. Wells...	8,000	"	5,000
In all—bonds.....	$175,000	to secure	$102,500

On the 15th of March, 1884, Charles L. Young and Henry Tyler, subjects of Great Britain, claiming to be the owners of the $200,000 of bonds issued under the Devereux mortgage, filed their bill against the Railroad Company in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania to have a receiver appointed. This was done on the same day the bill was filed by the appointment of Thomas P. Flower, receiver, and he was at once authorized to borrow $100,000 upon his certificates, to be used in the payment of wages, interest, taxes, and other preferred claims.

On the 1st of May, 1884, Devereux, as trustee under the second mortgage, filed his bill against the company in the same court, to foreclose his mortgage, and asking the appointment of a receiver. To this the company filed an [77] answer, June 26, 1885, substantially admitting all the averments in the bill, and setting forth the appointment of Flower as receiver in the suit of Young & Tyler.

On the 6th of June, 1885, Rawle filed a petition in the suit of Young & Tyler, asking permission to sell under his mortgage; but on the 31st of July, 1885, the court, although of opinion that "an early sale of the railroad as an entirety would undoubtedly conduce to the benefit of its creditors," postponed the order asked for until a sale could be made under both mortgages, by the two Trustees acting conjointly.

On the 5th of September, 1885, Devereux, by leave of the court, filed an amended bill, to which, in addition to the railroad company, he made Rawle, Trustee, Flower, the receiver, The British and South Wales Railway Wagon Company (Limited), The Union Rolling Stock Company (Limited), and William A. Adams, defendants. In this amended bill it is averred that the Devereux mortgage is a first lien on all the main line of the company excepting only "forty miles of said main line extending southeasterly from its junction with the Erie and Pittsburgh Railroad at Shenango," and "upon all the lateral branches of said road." The whole line, including the lateral branches, is stated to be seventy-five miles in length, and the part on which the Devereux mortgage is the first lien thirty-five miles. The prayer is for an account of the amount due on the bonds outstanding secured by the mortgages to Devereux and Rawle respectively, the amount due on the receiver's certificates issued by Flower, the expenses of the receivership, and certain car-trust contracts, and also for a determination of the respective priorities of all the incumbrances and charges on the property, and for a sale of the mortgaged premises, free of liens, to pay the amounts found due in the order of their priority. This bill also prays the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the property and manage the business during the pendency of the suit. The British and South Wales Railway Wagon Company, The Union Rolling Stock Company, and William A. Adams answered, setting up certain car-trust contracts [78] which are immaterial on the present appeal. Devereux, the trustee, having died pending the suit, John M. Shedd was duly appointed in his place and substituted for him as complainant, April 16, 1886.

On the 18th of May, 1886, the First National Bank of Cleveland, The Second National Bank of Erie, The First National Bank of Greenville, The Mahoning National Bank, Wicks Brothers and Company, and Thomas H. Wells appeared in court, and on the 10th of June, 1886, were permitted to intervene in the suit, pro interesse suo, because of averments in their petition that Shedd, the substituted trustee, "is committed to a course, and is acting in a manner which is calculated to injure them in their security; in this, to wit, that there is on foot a certain scheme for the reorganization of said railroad company, which contemplates a 'united and friendly foreclosure' and sale of the entire road under the two mortgages named in plaintiff's amended bill, and this action now pending is to be used as the means of carrying forward said reorganization scheme in connection with certain proceedings to be instituted upon the mortgage; in which Henry Rawle is named as trustee, and mentioned in plaintiff's said bill; that there are certain questions as to the extent of the lien of the said Rawle mortgage, and the number of the bonds outstanding, and the amount that is due thereon, which should be determined in this action, and which the petitioners are informed and believe that the said Shedd, Trustee, does not intend to raise, and which, petitioners are informed and believe, if raised, will be determined against the validity and amount of a large portion of said bonds, but if left to the claim of the holders thereof and their trustee would amount to over one million dollars ($1,000,000,), and be made a charge and lien upon said premises superior to that of the bonds held by the petitioners, and there are also disputes as to the extent of the liens of the two mortgages, the said Rawle claiming a first lien upon the entire road, and the petitioners claiming that it is only a lien upon forty (40) miles of the main line, and that theirs is a first lien upon the entire balance. That petitioners are informed and believe that it is a part of said scheme to which said Shedd, [79] Trustee, is committed to have the interest in said railroad covered by the conveyance to Devereux sold without a determination of these questions, and by so doing the petitioners say that the value of their security will be greatly diminished, first, by not being able to know the exact extent thereof; and secondly, by being unable, by reason of the uncertainties existing as to the extent of their lien, to protect the property from being sacrificed upon sale, and as to these matters they beg leave of the court to refer for a fuller statement of the same to their pleadings allowed by the court to be filed in case No. 17, in equity, May Term, 1884," the Young & Tyler suit.

On the 12th of June, 1886, Rawle filed a cross bill, in which, after setting up the mortgage in his favor and the default of the company in the payment of interest on the bonds secured thereby, he asked to be permitted to sell the mortgage property free of all liens, and to bring the proceeds into court to be distributed in accordance with the respective liens and priorities of the parties.

On the 18th of June, 1886, the railroad company answered both the amended and cross bills, and, leaving the parties to litigate among themselves as to their respective rights under the mortgages, joined in the prayers that the property might be sold.

On the 26th of June each of the intervenors filed an answer to the cross bill of Rawle, setting up their respective claims and insisting that the lien of his mortgage should be confined to the forty miles of main line included in the resolution of the company authorizing its execution. It is also insisted that the amount actually due upon the outstanding bonds is much less than $1,000,000, for reasons which are specially stated, and "that owing to the disputes existing as to the amount of the first mortgage bonds outstanding, and the extent of the lien thereof, and the dispute as to the extent of the lien of the second mortgage bonds, and as disputes have arisen as to the amount and validity of the receiver's certificates, it is necessary, in order to protect its rights as a lien creditor, to have a court of competent jurisdiction to determine the amount of said bonds outstanding, and the amount due thereon, and the extent of the lien thereof, as well as the amount and the [80] extent of the lien of said second mortgage bonds, as well as the amount and validity of the said certificates, before a sale of the said property."

"And the respondent respectfully represents that if the property of the defendant company is sold before the validity and extent of said liens are judicially determined, bidding will be deterred on account of the risk and uncertainty, and the property will be in great danger of being sacrificed at said sale.

"Wherefore your respondent prays that an accounting may be had and taken in the premises; that the amount of the bonds outstanding in the hands of bona fide holders for value may be determined; that the extent of the lien of each may be judicially determined, and upon the final determination of the matters and not before that an order of sale may be issued to sell the mortgaged premises; and for such other and further relief as may be just and equitable in the premises and to your honors shall seem meet."

After these answers were in, both Shedd and Rawle, the Trustees, moved the court for leave to sell the mortgaged property under their deeds of trust, and upon these motions, on the 13th of July, the district judge, sitting in the circuit court, filed an opinion, in which the circuit judge concurred, as follows:

"When this case was formerly before us, upon the petition of Henry Rawle, Trustee, for leave to sell the Shenango and Allegheny Railroad under the power of sale in the mortgage to him, we expressed the opinion that an early sale of the railroad as an entirety would undoubtedly conduce to the benefit of all its creditors. This opinion is greatly strengthened by what has since transpired. Under the operation of the receivership the financial condition of the company is constantly growing worse, and it is now entirely clear that the best interests of all parties concerned will be promoted by a speedy sale. In this view the creditors generally concur. The controlling objection to the sale as formerly proposed has been removed by the joint application of the Trustees [81] under the two mortgages to sell by virtue of the powers of sale conferred upon them respectively, they agreeing to unite in the sale so as to assure to the purchaser an undoubted title to the whole property, and to so conduct the sale as to secure the highest price attainable.

"We have no hesitation in finding in the case of the Devereux-Shedd mortgage that there has been a default in the payment of interest coupons for more than eighteen months, and that by the election of one tenth in amount of the bondholders the principal of the bonded indebtedness has become due and payable, and that by reason thereof the Trustee is entitled to foreclose the mortgage or exercise his power of sale.

"The sale by the Trustee will be under the control and subject to the approval of the court, and we can see to it that no unfair advantage is taken of the minority of the bondholders by reason of any improper combination among the majority or otherwise.

"The court having reached the conclusion that the mortgage Trustees should be permitted to exercise their powers of sale under the direction of the court, it is to be hoped that the parties can speedily agree as to the manner in which the property shall be offered for sale, but if they do not agree we will hear them further upon that point before a decree is framed."

Pursuant to this decision a decree was entered on the 14th of October, as follows:

"This cause came on to be heard * * * upon a motion by and on behalf of the said John M. Shedd, Trustee, and also by and on behalf of the said Henry Rawle, Trustee, that the court shall order and decree a sale of all and singular the property, real, personal and mixed, of the Shenango and Allegheny Railroad Company, freed and discharged from all liens and incumbrances whatsoever; and also upon a motion made by and on behalf of the said John M. Shedd, trustee; and also by and on behalf of the said Henry Rawle, Trustee, to the effect that each Trustee shall be authorized and empowered under and in accordance with the terms [82] of his mortgage to proceed and sell all and singular the property, real, personal, and mixed, covered by or included within his said recited mortgage, and upon a motion by and on behalf of both Trustees for a sale of the entire property of the defendant company as incumbered and unable to pay the liens upon it, and so that the proceeds thereof may be distributed among the creditors entitled thereto. Due notice having been given to all parties in interest of these motions, and that the same would be heard, and the same having been already heard, all the parties in interest appearing by counsel and taking part in the argument, and the various papers and proceedings and record in the case of Young et al. v. Shenango & Allegheny V. R. R. Co., now pending at No. 17, May Term, 1884, of this court, as well as also all papers, affidavits, and other proceedings in this case and other documents, were produced, heard, and considered by the court in support of the said motions, and the court, after consideration, being of the opinion that it was to the best interest of all parties concerned that the said railroad and all the property of the Shenango and Allegheny Railroad Company should be sold as speedily as possible; and having filed an opinion to that effect, and the parties in interest being unable to agree upon the form of a decree directing said sale, and the court having fixed the 30th day of September, A. D., 1886, for settling the form of a decree, and counsel for all the respective parties having appeared and having been duly heard, and the court having considered the premises, do now order, adjudge and decree as follows".

Then follows a detailed statement of all the property of the company, describing particularly its main line and branches, and also its lands, rolling stock, and other property. There is then a finding of the execution of the two mortgages to Rawle and Devereux, the amount of bonds originally issued thereunder, and a default in the payment of interest such as would entitle the several Trustees to take possession and sell under the powers vested in them respectively, and an adjudication that the Trustees are severally "entitled to proceed and forclose the said mortgage." It is also found that the mortgages are each valid and existing liens on so much of the property "as was thereby lawfully conveyed to the said respective [83] Trustees, and which thereafter became vested in the said Trustees respectively as after acquired property, according to the terms of said mortgages, or either of them;" that all of the original issue of bonds under the Rawle mortgage was outstanding with interest coupons attached, from October 1, 1884, and under the Devereux, $375,000 and all the interest warrants from their date, but there is no finding of the amount actually due on either of the issues. It is also found that there are $155,849.87 of receiver's certificates outstanding on which interest is payable at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from their respective dates, and that these "together with the costs, charges, and lawful expenses in this cause, and the costs, charges, expenses of the liabilities of the receivership, including the costs in the case of Young v. Shenango & Allegheny V. R. R. Co. in this court and all just and proper compensation, expenses, and allowances to the said receiver and the Trustees under the said mortgages, and to any of the parties to the said cause, are entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of the * * * sale in the first instance," and in preference to the bondholders.

The decree then proceeds as follows:

(8.) "And this court does further find, adjudge and decree that all the property, real, personal, and mixed, of the said Shenango and Allegheny Railroad Company is subject to the lien of either the said mortgage to the said Henry Rawle, Trustee, or to the said mortgage to the said John H. Devereux, Trustee, as also to the outstanding receiver's certificates, and that there are conflicting claims in reference to the priority of liens and their extent, and that there are conflicting claims between the said mortgagees and some of the bondholders in reference to the number of bonds legally outstanding and unpaid under the said respective mortgages to the said Henry Rawle, Trustee, and to the said John H. Devereux, Trustee, and, also, that there are conflicting claims in reference to the amounts of money due on the said respective bonds outstanding under the said [84] mortgages which the holders thereof are entitled to receive; and this court also finds that the Shenango and Allegheny Railroad Company is insolvent, and that it would be to the best interests of all parties concerned that the said property, real, personal, and mixed, of the said defendant company should be sold; and it appearing to the said court that such sale by this court of the said property is prayed for under the amended bill filed by the said John M. Shedd, Trustee, and also in the cross bill filed by the said Henry Rawle, Trustee, this court does now, upon motion of the solicitors for the said John M. Shedd, Trustee, and also upon motion of the solicitors of the said Henry Rawle, Trustee, the solicitors for the company and the receiver acquiescing herein, order, adjudge and decree that the said Henry Rawle and John M. Shedd be, and they are hereby, appointed special commissioners by this court to make sale of all and singular the property, real, personal, and mixed, including the franchises of the said Shenango and Allegheny Railroad Company; said sale shall be on the 25th day of January, 1887, at Shenango, the junction of the Shenango and Allegheny Railroad with the Atlantic and Great Western, now New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio Railroad, near Greenville, Mercer County, Pennsylvania, at twelve (12) o'clock noon, and it shall be at public auction, and the sale shall be made to the highest and best bidder, and report thereof made to this court."

It is then ordered that the whole property be sold as an entirety, at not less than $625,000, and that upon a confirmation of the sale the purchaser be entitled to a conveyance freed and discharged of the lien of the mortgages, receiver's certificates, costs, expenses, etc., and the conclusion is as follows:

(18th) "All disputes and controversies between the two mortgage Trustees, the said Rawle and the said Shedd, or the bondholders under the said two mortgages, touching the extent of the lien of the said mortgages, respectively, or the priority of the lien of the said mortgages, respectively, as well as all questions concerning and touching the amounts due bondholders, respectively, under the said two mortgages, are hereby expressly reserved for future consideration and determination, unaffected by anything in this decree."

[85] From this decree the intervenors alone have appealed, and that appeal Shedd and Rawle move to dismiss because it was "taken from an interlocutory decree or order of sale and not a final decree." With this motion is also united a motion to affirm under Rule 6, section 5.

The motion to dismiss is overruled, but the motion to affirm is granted. The appeal in its present form brings up for review the single question of the propriety of ordering a sale before the rights of the parties under the several mortgages have been fully ascertained and determined. All parties, including the mortgage Trustees, are satisfied, except these appellants, who have been allowed to intervene pro interesse suo, and who represent but a small minority of the mortgage indebtedness. The only substantial issues presented by their answers relate to the extent of the priority of the lien of the Rawle mortgage, and the amount due on that issue of bonds. They do not deny that the property must in the end be sold under the mortgages, and, while insisting that Rawle can only enforce his lien to the extent of the past due interest on that issue of bonds, there is no offer to provide means for the payment of that interest, and there is no pretense that the part of the property covered by his mortgage, whatever it may be, can be sold to advantage otherwise than as an entirety. Neither is it claimed that the property covered by the Devereux mortgage alone can be sold separate from the rest as advantageously as if the whole road and its branches were offered together. The entire opposition to a sale now rests on the claim that it is necessary, in order to protect the rights of these intervenors as lien creditors, that all disputed questions should be settled, or "bidding will be deterred on account of the risk and uncertainty, and the property will be in great danger of being sacrificed."

Against this is the fact that both the Trustees agree in the opinion that the interests of their respective beneficiaries will be best subserved by an immediate sale, in which the creditors generally concur. In addition to this, the court finds, and the evidence shows, that the financial condition of the company under the administration of the receiver, is continually growing worse. The receiver's certificates have [86] increased since March 15, 1884, when the first loan was authorized, from $100,000 to nearly $156,000 in October, 1886, and the receiver, in his answers, says, that from his knowledge "of the condition of said railroad company and its property and finances, he verily believes it would be for the best interest of all parties concerned, including the stockholders, bondholders, and creditors, * * * that all its property should be sold as soon as possible, and in such manner as to give the purchasers thereof an unincumbered title thereto." This also was the opinion of the court when Rawle made his application in the suit of Young & Tyler for leave to sell, and which was then denied because the Trustee of the Devereux mortgage did not unite in the application, and the court was satisfied that a fragmentary sale would operate injuriously upon the rights of all who were interested in securing the largest price for the property to be sold.

Against all this we do not find a word of evidence in the record, so that the only question is whether the law requires that a sale should be postponed against the wishes of the mortgage Trustees and a large majority of the bondholders, simply because these intervenors, representing a minority interest, object. As a rule the trustee of a railroad mortgage represents the bondholders in all legal proceedings carried on by him affecting his trust, to which they are not actually parties. There is here no evidence to show fraud or unfairness on the part of the Trustees. The company is satisfied with what they are doing, and so are all the bondholders under the Rawle mortgage, and a majority of those under that to Devereux. As said in Shaw v. R. R. Co. 100 U. S. 612 [25: 759]: "Railroad mortgages are a peculiar class of securities. The trustee represents the mortgage, and in executing his trust may exercise his own discretion within the scope of his powers. If there are differences of opinion among the bondholders as to what their interests require, it is not improper that he should be governed by the voice of the majority acting in good faith and without collusion, if what they ask is not inconsistent with the provisions [87] of his trust." Here the majority want an immediate sale. In this the Trustees both agree, as does the railroad company itself. There is no evidence whatever of a want of good faith in anyone. The court below, having the practical workings of the receivership under its own eye, did not hesitate to say that "it is now entirely clear that the best interests of all parties concerned will be promoted by a speedy sale," and we see nothing to the contrary.

Of the power of the court to make such an order in a proper case we have no doubt. The property is in the possession of the court and is depreciating in value by the accumulation of receiver's indebtedness, while the litigation between the parties as to their respective interests in it is going on. There cannot be a doubt that the whole ought to be sold together. If in the end it shall be found that the Rawle mortgage covers only a part, it will be as easy to fix the rule for dividing the proceeds equitably between the two securities after a sale, as before, and there is nothing in the decree as entered to interfere in any way with such a distribution.

Upon the facts as presented to us we are entirely satisfied that the decree of the court below was right, and it is consequently affirmed.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 87-89.)

Habeas corpus—what appeals lie to this court under Act of March 3, 1885—judge sitting without the district—decision as judge not decision of the court—Rule 34.

1. The Act of March 3, 1885, gives an appeal to this court in habeas corpus cases only from the final decision of a circuit court.
2. The order of a circuit judge, in habeas corpus proceedings, that the papers be filed and his order of discharge recorded in the circuit court of another district within which the petitioner is confined, does not make his decision as judge a decision of the court; neither does Rule 34, adopted by this court at the last term, have that effect.

Argued March 18, 1887. Decided March 28, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia. Dismissed.

The appellee is a sample merchant, who travels for the house of Austin, Field & Co., of Philadelphia, in the State of Virginia and sells their goods by sample. He tendered the State's tax receivable coupons to the proper officer in payment of his license tax, and demanded his license, but the coupons were refused and the license also. He thereupon proceeded with his business without a license, and was arrested by the state authorities for so doing. He applied to the Hon. H. L. Bond, United States Circuit Judge for the Fourth Circuit, at Baltimore, Maryland, for a writ of habeas corpus, upon the ground that he was held in violation of the Constitution of the United States. The Judge at Baltimore ordered the writ to issue from the clerk's office of the Circuit Court, at Richmond, Virginia, to be returnable before himself at Baltimore. The body of the petitioner was produced before him on the day named, when he ordered his discharge; and also ordered "that the papers in this case be filed in the Circuit Court of the United States at Richmond, Virginia, and that this order be recorded in said court." Thereupon the respondent therein appealed to this court.

Messrs. R. A. Ayers, Atty-Gen. of Virginia, for appellant.

Messrs. D. H. Chamberlain, Bradley T. Johnson, and William L. Royall, for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opin- [88] ion of the court.

This was a proceeding before the Circuit Judge for the Fourth Circuit at his Chambers in Baltimore, Maryland, for the discharge of Richard L. Fitzgerald from the custody of H. A. Carper, jailer of Pulaski County, Virginia, under a mittimus from John H. Cecil, a justice of the peace of that county. The petition was presented to the judge in Baltimore, who directed the clerk of the Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Virginia to issue a writ of habeas corpus, and make it returnable before him at the United States court house in Baltimore. The writ was accordingly issued, under the seal of the court, in the usual form of circuit court writs, and made returnable "before the Honorable Hugh L. Bond, Judge of our Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, sitting at the United States court house in Baltimore, Maryland." The record shows that the jailer made his return to the writ, and that the petitioner filed a demurrer thereto, upon consideration of which an order of discharge was entered. At the foot of this order was the following:

"And it is ordered that the papers in this case be filed in the Circuit Court of the United States at Richmond, Virginia, and that this order be recorded in said court.

"HUGH L. BOND, Circuit Judge." [89]

From this order the jailer was allowed an appeal to this court by the circuit judge, and the case was docketed here as "an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia." The form of the docket entry here does not change the character of the proceeding from which the appeal was taken, and that was clearly under section 752 of the Revised Statutes, before the judge sitting as a judge, and not as a court. The Act of March 3, 1885, chap. 353, 23 Stat. at L. 437, gives an appeal to this court in habeas corpus cases only from the final decision of a circuit court.

The order of the judge that the papers be filed, and his order recorded in the circuit court, does not make his decision as judge a decision of the court. Neither does our Rule 34, 117 U. S. 708 [29:4] adopted at the last term, have that effect. The purpose of that rule was to regulate proceedings on appeals under section 763, from the decision of a judge to the circuit court of the district, as well as under section 764, as amended by the Act of March 3, 1885, from a circuit court to this court. Power to make such a regulation was given to this court by section 765 of the Revised Statutes.

Appeal dismissed.

[102] WILLIAM L. ROYALL, Plff. in Err.,
v.
STATE OF VIRGINIA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 102-105.)

Constitutional law—tender of Virginia coupons in payment of license tax—demurrer to plea, effect of.

1. Under the laws of Virginia, an assessment, made by law a condition precedent to obtaining a license for pursuing a profession, is payable in coupons of certain bonds issued by the State.

2. Where an applicant for a license has tendered coupons in payment therefor, he need not resort to a mandamus to compel its issue upon its being wrongfully withheld, but may, without a license, pursue the business of his calling, which is not unlawful in itself, and which he has the constitutional right to prosecute.

3. In the case presented, the demurrer to the plea is an admission of record that the coupon tendered was genuine, and bore on its face the contract of the State, making it receivable in payment of the license tax in question. This is held to show a good tender.

Argued March 18, 1887. Decided March 28, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia. Reversed.

The plaintiff in error is an attorney at law. On the first day of May, 1886, he tendered the treasurer of Richmond city the State's coupons in payment of his license tax for the ensuing year and demanded his license. The tender was rejected and a license refused. He thereupon proceeded with the practice of his profession without a license. He was prosecuted for this in the Hustings Court of the City of Richmond, convicted and fined. He applied to the court of appeals for a writ of error, which was refused him; whereupon he sued out this writ of error.

Messrs. D. H. Chamberlain, Bradley T. Johnson and William L. Royall, in person, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. R. A. Ayers, Atty-Gen. of Virginia, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This case cannot be distinguished in principle from that of Royall v. Virginia, 116 U. S. 572 [29:735]. The demurrer to the plea is an admission of record that the coupon tendered in payment of the license tax was genuine, "and [105] bore on its face the contract of the State of Virginia that it should be received in payment of all taxes, debts, and demands due said State." This shows a good tender, which brings this case within the ruling by this court in the other.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia is reversed on the authority of Royall v. Virginia, supra, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, not inconsistent with this opinion and the judgment in that case.

COLLIS P. HUNTINGTON ET AL.

(S. C. Reporter's ed. 179-182.)

Removal of causes—separable controversy—petition too late, after hearing on demurrer.

1. A bill for assignment of dower, filed by a citizen of the State in which the action is brought, against a corporation of the same State, holding the legal title to the land, and citizens of another State, through whom the corporation immediately holds, does not present a separable controversy to support a removal of the cause.

2. A petition for removal, filed after a demurrer has been heard and sustained, is too late.

[No. 160.]

Argued March 22, 1887. Decided April 4, 1887.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the District of West Virginia. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. F. Brown, for appellant.

No counsel appeared for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opin- [180] ion of the court:

This is a suit begun by Vesta Laidly, a citizen of West Virginia, the widow of Albert Laidly, deceased, on the 20th of December, 1881, in the Circuit Court of Cabell County, West Virginia, against C. P. Huntington and Elizabeth Huntington his wife, citizens of New York, and the Central Land Company, a West Virginia corporation, for an assignment of dower in certain land in that county conveyed by and for Albert Laidly to C. P. Huntington, and afterwards by Huntington, during the life of Laidly, to the Land Company, in whose possession it was, under that conveyance, when the suit was begun. The prayer of the bill is: 1, for an assignment in money, to be estimated according to the valuation of the land at the time of the alienation, or if that cannot be done, then, 2, in land. Attached to the bill as exhibits are copies of the deeds under which the conveyances were made to Huntington, two of which purport to have been executed by Laidly and his wife, and a third by another person who held title for Laidly. In addition to these exhibits there is a copy of the deed by Huntington and wife which purports to convey all the land to the Land Company.

To this bill a joint demurrer was filed by Huntington and wife, May 22, 1882, and a separate demurrer by the Land Company. The ground of each demurrer is that the bill is not sufficient in law. On the 26th of the same month of May, these demurrers were argued and overruled by the court, "but without deciding upon the sufficiency of the acknowledgments to the several exhibits filed with the bill." Thereupon Mrs. Laidly moved the court to dismiss the suit as to Huntington and wife, to which they objected. This motion was argued on both sides and submitted, but, before a decision was reached, Huntington and wife presented their petition for the removal of the suit to the District Court of the United States for the District of West Virginia, sitting in Charleston, having circuit court powers, on the ground "that there is a controversy in said [181] suit which is wholly between citizens of different States; namely, between your petitioners, who are defendants in said suit, and the plaintiff." After the presentation of this petition, the suit was docketed in the district court upon an order to that effect made by that court November 1, 1882. On the 8th of November, Mrs. Laidly moved that it be remanded, and this motion was denied November 11. Thereupon the defendants moved for leave to reargue the demurrer, and this motion was granted. On the 10th of May, 1883, the court refused Mrs. Laidly leave to dismiss the suit as to the Huntingtons, overruled the demurrers, and dismissed the bill. From that decree this appeal was taken. The grounds now relied on for reversal are: 1, the refusal to remand; and 2, the overruling of the demurrers and the dismissal of the bill.

The district court was clearly in error in refusing to remand. There is no separable controversy in this suit, and Mrs. Laidly, the plaintiff, was, when the suit was begun, a citizen of West Virginia, and the Land Company, one of the defendants, a West Virginia corporation, and in law a citizen of the same State. As the legal title to the land was in the Land Company at the time of the death of Albert Laidly, and at the time of the commencement of the suit, the Company was an indispensable party. It is difficult to see how Huntington and wife were even proper parties, for according to the bill they had parted with their interest in the land during the life of the husband of Mrs. Laidly, and there is nothing whatever to indicate that when the suit was brought they had any claim whatever to the property. The whole controversy in the case, as we infer from the argument here, is as to the sufficiency of the acknowledgments by Mrs. Laidly of the deeds to Huntington, which she signed and sealed with her husband, to bar her dower. Thayer v. Life Association, 112 U. S. 717 [28: 864].

The petition was also filed too late, for it was after the case had been heard on a demurrer to the bill because it did not state facts sufficient to entitle the complainant to the relief prayed for, and the demurrer sustained. Alley v. Nott, 111 U. S. 472 [28: 491].

The decree is reversed on the single ground
[182] that the suit should have been remanded to the state court, and, without passing on any of the other questions involved, the cause is remitted to the District Court, with instructions to send it back to the state court as a suit which had been improperly removed, and of which the district court had no jurisdiction.

Jurisdiction—amount in dispute—assignment —preferred creditors—bill against attaching creditors.

This court has jurisdiction of an appeal from a decree dismissing a bill, filed by preferred creditors for an amount in excess of $5,000 under an assignment, to enjoin a sale of the property by attaching creditors and to establish the assignment with its preferences, the property involved exceeding $5,000 in value.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Mississippi.

On motion to dismiss. Overruled.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Edward Mayes and H. M. Sullivan, for appellees, in support of motion.

Mr. Luke E. Wright, for appellants, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a motion to dismiss, on the ground that the value in dispute does not exceed $5,000. The record shows this: On the 25th of March, 1882, S. H. Gunter, a merchant doing business at Sardis, Mississippi, being unable to pay his debts in full, made an assignment of his stock of goods on hand, and the debts due him by note and book account, to S. G. Spain, for the benefit of his creditors, but with a preference in favor of Estes & Doan to the amount of $10,000 on a debt due them of $12,000 or over. Other creditors to a much smaller amount in the aggregate were also preferred. The stock of goods was valued at over $12,000, and the notes [184] and accounts were nominally more than $25,000.

A day or two after the assignment Bickham & Moore and three other firms sued out writs of attachment on their respective claims against Gunter, and seized the assigned property. The attachment in favor of Bickham & Moore was first issued for a debt of $3,000, and levied on a part only of the stock.

The other creditors levied on that taken under this prior attachment, and also on the rest. The ground of the attachments was that the assignment had been made to hinder and delay creditors, and was therefore void.

While the property taken under these attachments was in the hands of the sheriff, Estes & Doan, on the 17th of April, brought this suit against Spain, the assignee, the several attaching creditors, and the other preferred creditors, to enjoin a sale of the property under the attachments, to have a receiver appointed to take charge of the property and convert it into money pending the suit, to have the assignment declared valid with its preferences, and for a payment to Estes & Doan of the $10,000 to which they were entitled according to its terms. To this bill none of the defendants appeared, except the attaching creditors, and they filed a joint answer, in which they set up the fraudulent character of the assignment. Spain, the assignee, was served with process, but he did not appear, and as to him the bill was taken for confessed.

Upon the filing of the bill the injunction prayed for was granted, and a receiver appointed to take charge of the property and convert it into money, the proceeds to abide the event of the suit. From an affidavit of that receiver, filed in support of our jurisdiction, it appears that he has already realized more than $5,300, which has been paid into the registry of the court, or for which he is accountable.

In the progress of the cause Estes & Doan voluntarily dismissed the bill as to all the attaching creditors except Bickham & Moore, and from that time on they and Spain, the assignee, were the only defendants in court. On the 3d of March, 1884, the court, after a hearing of [185] the cause, "being satisfied that complainants are not entitled to the relief sought," dissolved the injunction and dismissed the bill. From the opinion of the court, which has been sent up with the transcript, it appears that this was done because the evidence showed that the assignment was made to hinder and delay creditors, and was, therefore, void. This was, of course, equivalent to a decision that Estes & Doan could not be paid their preferred debt out of the fund in court in accordance with the terms of the assignment. From that decree this appeal was taken.

The suit was brought, not only to defeat the attachment of Bickham & Moore, but to establish the assignment and make it available for the payment of the preference in favor of Estes & Doan to the extent of $10,000, if the assigned property produced that sum. It has produced $5,300, and there is nothing to show that more may not be realized from it hereafter. Spain, the trustee, is a party to the suit, and the effect of the decree is not only to prevent him from paying to Estes & Doan the amount claimed by Bickham & Moore under their attachment, but anything besides. The decree is not that Bickham & Moore be paid their debt, but that nothing be paid to the complainants. The distribution of the fund in court is to be made hereafter as law and justice may require. The effect of what has been done is to defeat the claim which Estes & Doan have set up in their bill, and, so far as now appears, it matters not to them what disposition is made of the assigned property. That can be determined hereafter when the rights of other parties shall be presented in proper form. The case is, therefore, in principle, like Shields v. Thomas, 58 U. S. 17 How. 3 [15: 93]; Market Company v. Hoffman, 101 U. S. 112 [25: 782]; The Connemara, 103 U. S. 754 [26: 322]; The Mamie, 105 U. S. 773 [26: 987]; Davies v. Corbin, 112 U. S. 36 [28: 627].

The motion to dismiss is overruled.

Removal of causes—practice—motion to advance.

This court grants a motion to advance a cause in which a state court refused to grant a motion to remove, as within the spirit although not within the letter of Rule 32.

Submitted April 1, 1887. Decided April 4, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Minnesota.

Motion to advance under Rule 32. Granted.

This action was brought by defendant in error in a state court of Minnesota. After issue was joined the plaintiff filed a petition for its removal, which the state court refused to grant. The cause was then tried, the trial resulting in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. The court below having affirmed this judgment, the defendant sued out this writ of error. The defendant in error now moves to advance the cause under Rule 32, on the ground that the question presented is similar to that which would be presented had the cause been removed to the circuit court and by it remanded, and either of the parties had sued out a writ of error to review the ruling of that court.

Mr. C. D. O'Brien, for defendant in error, in support of motion.

No counsel appeared for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is within the spirit, although not within the letter, of Rule 32. The state court refused to let go its jurisdiction on a petition for removal, and the Supreme Court of the State has affirmed the ruling of the trial court to that effect. The only question for our consideration on the writ of error is whether this decision was right. The case is advanced, to be brought on for hearing in the way provided by Rule 32, that is to say, under the rules prescribed by Rule 6 in regard to motions to dismiss writs of error or appeals.

TOWN OF CONCORD, Plff. in Err., [165]

v.

SYLVIA J. ROBINSON.

Municipal bonds—power of Illinois municipalities to issue—statutes—Constitution of 1870.

1. Mere municipal corporations, constituted for the purpose of local police and administration, and having the power of levying taxes to pay all public charges created, have no power or authority to make and utter commercial paper of any kind, unless such power is expressly conferred, or clearly implied from same power expressly given.

2. The Illinois Act of March 7, 1867, authorizing certain municipalities to appropriate such sums of money as they should deem proper to aid in the construction of the Chicago, Danville and Vincennes Railroad, did not authorize the issue of bonds in payment of an appropriation voted for the purpose specified.

3. The bonds in question, issued in 1871 by plaintiff in error, were not authorized by the Act of February 26, 1869, said Act being applicable only to aids voted and granted prior to its passage.

4. Said bonds were not authorized by the Act of March 24, 1869, and the vote by the electors of the Town on November 20, 1869, in favor of a donation to said road upon certain conditions with which the railroad company did not comply. If under the circumstances, the authorities ever had power to issue the bonds, it was withdrawn before their issue by the Constitution of 1870.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Henry Decker, Lewis H. Bisbee and John P. Ahrens, for plaintiff in error:

The bonds were issued in violation of the conditions on which the electors voted the donation.

The proviso, in the proposition voted upon, was a condition precedent to the donation taking effect.

The Act of February 26, 1869, was in terms confined to appropriations theretofore made, and has been held unconstitutional. Town of Middleport v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 82 Ill. 562.

The provisions of the twelfth section of the ninth article of the Constitution of 1870 render the bonds void.

The Constitution of 1870 was notice to the world that bonds of municipalities dated after July 2, 1870, were void, unless their issue had been authorized by a vote of the electors before that date.

Wright v. Bishop, 88 Ill. 302.

Mr. George A. Sanders, for defendant in error:

If there was any power to issue the bonds and coupons, even though coupled with conditions precedent, shown to have been complied with by the town officials, whose duty it is to determine this fact, the bonds must be held valid in the hands of a bona fide purchaser and owner for value, before maturity, and without notice of any claimed want of power or irregularity in their issue.

The supervisor and town clerk executing the bonds and coupons are found by the evidence the duly elected officials of the Town of Concord for that purpose, and their signatures genuine, and the Town is estopped from denying their acts and statements.

Town of Windsor v. Hallett, 97 Ill. 204; Brooklyn v. Ins. Co. 99 U. S. 362 (25: 416); Marcy v. Oswego, 92 U. S. 638 (23: 748); People v. Holden, 82 Ill. 93; People v. Town of Harp, 67 Ill. 62.

The recitals are that they were issued under and by virtue of a law of Illinois. Such recitals import a compliance with the statute, and the Township, according to the uniform decisions of this court, is estopped to assert, as against a bona fide holder, that such recitals are untrue.

Bonham v. Needles, 103 U. S. 648 (26: 451); Buchanan v. Litchfield, 102 U. S. 278 (26:138); Coloma v. Eaves, supra.

A popular election having been held, and a majority of votes cast in favor of the application, it may be conceded that payment of the appropriation could lawfully have been made in town bonds instead of money, if the donation itself was authorized.

Town of Concord v. Savings Bank, 92 U. S. 629 (23: 630); Fairfield v. County of Gallatin, 100 U. S. 47 (25: 544); County of Clay v. Society for Savings, supra.

The bonds, as far as the power is concerned, may have been issued under either of the Acts of March 7, 1869, of March 24, 1869, or February 6, 1869, as all gave power, and were in existence when the vote was taken, the bonds executed and delivered. The recital of the Act of March 7, 1867, does not limit or bind the purchaser or holder to that Act alone for the power to issue the bonds. It is sufficient for a bona fide holder that the power existed, and both courts and purchasers may look beyond the recitals for the power to issue the bonds.

Commissioners v. January, 94 U. S. 204 (24: 111); Anderson Co. v. Beal, supra; Burr v. Chariton County, 2 McCrary, 603; Town of Keithsburg v. Frick, 84 Ill. 405.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of [166] the court:

This is an action upon negotiable coupon bonds signed by the supervisor and clerk of the Town of Concord, a municipal corporation existing under the township organization law of Illinois. They were executed in 1871. Each bond purports, upon its face, to have been "issued under and by virtue of a law of the State of Illinois to authorize cities, towns or townships within certain limits to appropriate moneys and levy a tax to aid the construction of the Chicago, Danville and Vincennes Railroad," and pledges the faith of the Township for the payment of the principal and interest. The Act here referred to was passed March 7, 1867. 1 Pri. Laws, Ill. 1867, p. 842. It authorizes all incorporated towns and cities, and towns acting under the township organization law, within certain territorial limits (which includes the Town of Concord), to appropriate such sums of money as they deem proper to the Chicago, Danville and Vincennes Railroad Company to aid in the construction of its road, "to be paid to said company as soon as the track of said road shall have been located and constructed through said city, town, or township, respectively;" provided, the appropriation is first sustained at the polls by a majority of the electors of the municipality. The Act authorized and required the authorities of said townships, towns or cities, respectively, "to levy and collect a tax, and make such provisions as may be necessary and proper for the prompt payment" of the appropriation. It neither expressly nor by implication invested the municipal corporations, embraced by its provisions, with the power to issue commercial paper in payment of an appropriation so voted. We [167] held in Claiborne County v. Brooks, 111 U. S. 400, 406 [28: 470, 472]—which was decided after the judgment below was rendered—that "mere political bodies, constituted as counties are for the purpose of local police and administration, and having the power of levying taxes to pay all public charges created, have no power or authority to make and utter commercial paper of any kind, unless such power is expressly conferred upon them by law, or clearly implied from some power expressly given which cannot be fairly exercised without it." No such implication arises from the grant to a municipal corporation of power to appropriate moneys in aid of the construction of a railroad, accompanied by a provision directing the levy and collection of taxes to meet such appropriation, and prescribing no other mode of payment. Wells v. Supervisors, 102 U. S. 625, 631-2 [26: 122, 124]; Ogden v. County of Daviess, Id. 634, 639 [26: 263, 265]. The provision in the Act of 1867 that the money should be paid as soon as the road was located and constructed through the city, town, or township voting the appropriation, is inconsistent with the idea that such appropriation could be met, in the first instance, by negotiable bonds which might pass into the hands of bona fide holders for value, and become binding, whether the road was or not so located or constructed.

The clause requiring such provisions to be made as are necessary and proper for the prompt payment of the appropriation has reference only to the collection and application of taxes levied to meet the appropriation.

For these reasons the court erred in holding that the validity of the bonds was sustained by the Act of March 7, 1867.

The suggestion that the bonds were authorized by the Act of February 26, 1869, 3 Pri. Laws Ill. 1869, p. 855, entitled "An Act to Legalize Certain Aids Heretofore Voted and Granted to Aid in the Construction of the Chicago, Danville and Vincennes Railroad," is without force. That Act, by its very terms, has reference only to aids voted and granted prior to its passage. The aid in the present case was voted subsequently.

3. Nor, in our judgment, can the bonds be sustained as valid obligations of the Town by the provisions of the Act of March 24, 1869, 3 Pri. [168] Laws Ill. 1869, p. 856, entitled "An Act to Enable Towns, Townships, Cities or Counties along the Line of the Chicago, Danville and Vincennes Railroad to Contribute Towards the Construction of Said Railroad." The first section of that Act authorizes the several counties through which the road shall pass, by action of the board of supervisors, or by action of the county court in counties not acting under township organization, to make appropriations or loan their credit in such sums and upon such terms and conditions as they deem proper, to aid in the construction of such road; provided, the appropriation is first voted by the electors. The second section provides that "the legal voters of any town, township or city along the line of said railroad, whether said railroad shall run into or through said town, township or city, or not, may, by a majority of the legal voters voting at any election held for the purpose, make appropriations or donations to aid in the construction of said railroad, and the proper authorities shall levy and collect taxes, in the manner that other taxes are levied and collected, to promptly meet any obligations assumed under and by virtue of this Act."

The fourth section provides that "the authorities of any township, town or city—such township, town or city having voted to contribute aid in the construction of said railroad—may borrow money to promptly meet such contribution, and issue bonds of such township, town or city, * * * and shall have power to levy and collect such taxes as may be necessary to pay accruing interest or pay the principal sum." This last section, it is contended, gave the supervisor and town clerk of Concord authority to issue negotiable bonds in payment of the appropriation or contribution voted by the Township of Concord. In this view we do not concur.

The Constitution of Illinois adopted in 1870 provides that "No county, city, township or other municipality shall ever become subscriber to the capital stock of any railroad or private corporation, or make donation to or loan its credit in aid of such corporation: Provided, however, That the adoption of this article shall not be construed as affecting the right of any such municipality to make such subscriptions or donations, Chicago & Iowa R. R. Co. v. Pinckney, 74 Ill. 277; Fairfield v. County of Gallatin, 100 U. S. 50 [25: 545], where the same have been authorized, under existing laws, by a vote of the people of such municipalities prior to such adoption." The corporate authorities of Concord—the electors of the Township—voted November 20, 1869, in favor of levying a tax for the purpose of raising the sum of $25,000 in two years, "to be donated to the Vincennes, Danville and Chicago Railroad Company (meaning the Chicago, Danville and Vincennes Railroad Company), provided said company run said railroad through the Villages of Concord and Sheldon." The road was never constructed into or through either of said villages. It did not touch either township; nor did the electors of Concord Township ever vote upon the subject of issuing bonds in payment of the donation so voted. If, under these circumstances, the authorities of [169] that Township ever had power, under the Act of March 24, 1869, to issue bonds to meet that donation, that power was withdrawn by the Constitution of 1870 before the bonds in suit were issued. The section of that instrument relating to municipal subscriptions to railroad corporations went into operation July 2, 1870. Louisville v. Savings Bank, 104 U. S. 469 [26: 775]; Schall v. Bowman, 62 Ill. 321. Since that day no municipal corporation of Illinois has possessed authority to subscribe to the stock of a railroad or private corporation, or to make donations to or loan its credit to them, except that a subscription or donation, lawfully voted by the people before the adoption of that section, could be completed upon the terms and conditions approved by the electors. There is no saving of the right of such corporation to loan their credit to railroad corporations, where such loan of credit was not embraced in a vote previously taken, under existing laws, and which was favorable to a subscription of stock or a donation. The Township of Concord voted a donation merely, to be met by taxation within the period of two years, and to be paid if the railroad was constructed through the Villages of Concord and Sheldon, and not a donation to be met by interest bearing bonds covering a period of ten years. Some question is made as to whether the Township did not, by the vote at the special election of June 30, 1870, lawfully rescind the vote of November 20, 1869. Upon that question we express no opinion; and it may be assumed, for the purposes of this case, that the election of [170] June 30, 1870, did not affect the legal right of the railroad company to claim the donation voted November 20, 1869, upon the terms and conditions annexed thereto by the electors. But that is the utmost the company could have claimed. It certainly could not, prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1870, have demanded, as of right, that bonds be issued; for the people did not vote for issuing bonds, and the Act of March 24, 1869, did not make it imperative upon the township authorities to issue bonds to meet a donation. It only declared that they "may borrow money * * * and issue bonds," and, in that way, pay the contribution which had been voted. The Constitution took away all power to impose upon the township any greater burdens than the people had by vote lawfully assumed under the existing statutes. These bonds were issued in 1871. Purchasers were bound to know that neither the Act of 1867, under which they were issued, nor the Act of February 26, 1869, conferred authority to issue them. If they purchased them in the belief that the recital in the bonds of the Act of 1867 was a mere mistake, and that the Act of March 24, 1869 gave the requisite authority, they were informed by the latter Act that the township authorities were not obliged to issue them, and, by the Constitution of 1870, that the power to do so was taken away. They were bound to know that the power of the Township, after July 2, 1870, was restricted by the Constitution to a completion of such subscription or donation as had been lawfully voted before that date; if not upon the precise terms and conditions attached thereto by the vote of the people, upon such terms as did not increase the burden. The bonds contain no recital that they are issued pursuant to a vote of the people had before the adoption of the Constitution of 1870, and there is, consequently, no pretense to say that the Township is estopped to deny the authority of its supervisor and clerk to execute them. Orr v. Oxford, 119 U. S. 215 [ante, 888].

If it be suggested that the railroad company [171] acquired a right, by the vote of November 20, 1869, which the Constitution of 1870 could not affect, the answer is that the company, in its acceptance, June 20, 1870, of the offer of township aid, stated that it would construct the road pursuant "to the terms and conditions voted by said town," which did not include the issuing of negotiable bonds. Besides, the Constitution saved whatever rights were acquired by the company under that vote; for, it left untouched the authority of the Township to complete the donation to the company according to the terms upon which it was voted. It only withdrew from the Township the power to make new subscriptions or donations, or to loan its credit to a railroad or private corporation, a power which the Township had not agreed, prior to July 2, 1870, by vote or otherwise, to exert in behalf of the railroad company. In the interpretation we have placed upon the foregoing section of the State Constitution, we are sustained by the judgment of the Supreme Court of Illinois in Middleport v. Ætna Life Ins. Co. 82 Ill. 568. See also Aspinwall v. Comrs. of Daviess Co. 68 U. S. 22 How. 364 [16: 296]: Wadsworth v. Supervisors, 102 U. S. 534 [26: 221].

Upon the whole case, and without suggesting other grounds upon which the conclusion we have reached may rest, we are of opinion that the bonds in suit are not valid obligations of the Town, notwithstanding the plaintiff purchased them before maturity, without notice of any defense thereto.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to enter a judgment, on the special finding of facts, for the defendant; it is so ordered.

v.
WILLIAM C. STEVENS, As Auditor-General of The STATE OF MICHIGAN.

(See S. C. "Fargo v. Michigan," Reporter's ed. 230-247.)

Constitutional law—interstate commerce—tax on gross receipts of railroads engaged in, void.

*1. A state statute which levies a tax upon the gross receipts of railroads for the carriage of freights and passengers, into, out of, or through the State, is a tax upon commerce among the States, and therefore void.

2. While a State may tax the money actually within the State, after it has passed beyond the stage of compensation for carrying persons or property, as it may tax other money or property within its limits, a tax upon receipts for this class of carriage specifically is a tax upon the commerce out of which it arises; and, if that be interstate commerce, it is void under the Constitution.

*Head notes by Mr. Justice MILLER.

3. The States cannot be permitted under the guise of a tax upon business transacted within their borders, to impose a burden upon commerce among the States, when the business so taxed is itself interstate commerce.

[No. 842.]

Submitted Dec. 9, 1886. Decided April 4, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Ashley Pond, for plaintiff in error:

Taxation by the State of Michigan, of an association organized and domiciled in the State of New York, based upon the estimated gross earnings of its cars within the State of Michigan, while engaged solely in traffic which crosses the state line, such earnings being also received and possessed by such association in the State of New York, operates as a regulation of commerce, is extraterritorial and void.

It is respectfully submitted that the recent cases of Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. 196, and Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34 (29: 158, 785), and the principle of Wabash etc. R. R. Co. v. Illinois, decided October 25, 1886 (ante, 244), are decisive of the case at bar.

Interstate communication cannot be restricted; and the terms upon which commerce may be engaged in cannot be prescribed by state authority.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1 (6: 23); Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419 (6: 678); Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. 7 How. 283 (12: 702); Henderson v. Mayor, 92 U. S. 259 (23: 543); Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580 (28: 798).

The tax cannot be sustained as a tax upon the property of the company within the State. The company has no property taxable within the State. Its cars are within the State only in transit while engaged in interstate transportation or commerce. They cannot be there taxed as property, being owned in New York.

Hays v. Pacific Mail Steamship Co. 58 U. S. 17 How. 596 (15: 254).

The tax cannot be sustained as a tax upon the business of the company, for that business is not local but is interstate, and is wholly beyond state regulation.

The cases of Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 107 U. S. 365 (27: 419), and Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa., supra illustrate the difference between a valid tax upon the property of a domestic corporation engaged in interstate commerce, and an invalid tax upon the business of a foreign corporation engaged solely in interstate commerce.

See also Moran v. New Orleans, 112 U. S. 69 (28: 653).

The tax cannot be sustained as an exercise of the restrictive power of the State over foreign corporations; for under that power there can be no regulation of commerce by the State.

The Supreme Court of Michigan fails to distinguish this case from that of State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 284 (21: 164), in which a tax on the gross receipts of a Pennsylvania company, which had been actually garnered into its treasury in that State, was in question.

The court also specifically declares the tax to be one upon business done in the State, and deems it within the purview of Osborne v. Mobile, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 479 (21: 470), without distinguishing that the license in that case was of a business carried on in the City of Mobile, which was entirely local in its nature.

Mr. Edward Bacon with Mr. Moses Taggart, Atty-Gen. of Michigan, for defendant in error:

There are, in the different States of the Union, two well known systems of railroad taxation: one, such as that used in Tennessee, according to a valuation (see State R. R. Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 601, 603 (23: 669); the other, such as that used in Michigan, according to gross receipts, a small percentage thereof being taken by the State annually as specific taxes in lieu of all other taxation.

Howell's Statutes of Michigan, chap. 90, entitled Commissioner of Railroads, § 1, being § 3291 of said statutes; State Treasurer v. Auditor-Gen. 46 Mich. 231, 232; Chicago etc. R. Co. v. Auditor-Gen. 53 Mich. 79. See also State R. R. Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 611 (23: 666).

Is it true that the Merchants Dispatch Transportation Company did not carry on, in the State of Michigan, any business liable to state taxation?

Osborne v. Mobile, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 479 (21: 470); Telegraph Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 464 (26: 1068).

The laws of New York, under which the bill states that the complainant was organized and was taxed, include statutes of the same force and effect as the Michigan Statute complained of in the bill; and a decision in the complainant's favor, against the Michigan Statute, would entitle it to a decision in its favor against the New York Statute, so far as interstate commerce is concerned.

The Court of Appeals of the State of New York has declared the validity of these statutes.

People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 346; People v. Equitable Trust Co. 96 N. Y. 394–396; People v. Gold etc. Tel. Co. 98 N. Y. 78.

The Act No. 152 of the Laws of Michigan for 1883 (also New York Statutes and similar statutes of other States), was enacted in reliance upon principles recognized by the decision of this court.

Osborne v. Mobile, supra.

The complainant has been claiming and exercising extensively, in Michigan, franchises granted by the laws of New York.

No good reason can be shown why the State which creates important corporate franchises for commercial corporations should have a right to tax the exercise thereof, while at the same time another State, wherein the same franchises are assumed and exercised (to a greater extent perhaps, and with more profit than elsewhere) should be forever powerless to tax such franchises or business carried on in the exercise thereof.

Gross Receipts*, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 296 (21: 168); Minot v. Philadelphia etc. R. R. Co. 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 231 (21: 896); St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 357 (27: 225); Diamond Match Co. v. Powers, 51 Mich. 148; Talcott v. McCormick Harvesting Machine

Co. 51 Mich. 7; Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 524 (29: 717); Telegraph Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 464-5 and Relfe v. Rundle, 103 U. S. 225-6 (26: 1068; 339); Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Md. 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 456 (22: 678).

Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. 196 (29: 158), is relied upon by the plaintiff in error; but the decision of no issue joined in that case can be relevant here. The Gloucester Ferry Company was doing no more business in Pennsylvania than any foreign corporation owning a line of steamships carrying on commerce between European ports and Philadelphia. It merely obtained a lease of a sufficient landing place on the Pennsylvania shore; 114 U. S. 205 (29: 162), and on page 203 this court uses the following language:

"The business of landing and receiving passengers and freight at the wharf in Philadelphia is a necessary incident to, indeed is a part of, their transportation across the Delaware River from New Jersey. Without it that transportation would be impossible. Transportation implies the taking up of persons or property at some point and putting them down at another. A tax, therefore, upon such receiving and landing of passengers and freight is a tax upon their transportation; that is, upon the commerce between the two States involved in such transportation."

The case of Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34 (29: 785), is distinguishable. In that case the company had no office in the State (Tenn.) through which its cars ran.

A corporation which seeks by its agents to establish a domicil of business in a State other than that of its own creation must take that domicil, subject to the responsibilities and burdens imposed by the laws which it finds in force there.

Atty-Gen. v. Bay State Min. Co. 99 Mass. 153; Ricker v. American etc. Co. 140 Mass. 350; Carron Iron Co. v. McLaren, 5 H. L. Cas. 416, 449.

The Tennessee Statute imposing the tax in Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. supra, was objectionable because it purported to make entirely illegal certain interstate commerce, except on payment of the license fee as a condition precedent, and was therefore no better than a statute to collect, at the state line, duties on interstate commerce.

The method of ascertaining taxes measured by gross receipts has been approved by this court and by the Supreme Court of Michigan.

Summary. The tax in question is valid for the following reasons:

The tax is on business done in the exercise of corporate franchises, introduced by permission of the State of Michigan.

The tax is on such business done by means of the complainant's permanently established local agents and offices in Michigan, with every facility for carrying on business between places within the State, whenever profitable.

The tax is necessary to the safety of the State's revenue, from railroad companies and express companies.

The tax is upon railroad business so affecting and controlling public interests of the people of the State of Michigan that such business ought not to escape taxation in the State.

The complainant ought not to escape taxation in Michigan, merely because the final receipt of its earnings in Michigan was at its chief office in the City of New York.

The business by which all right to such earnings accrued was completed within the State of Michigan; and according to the ordinary course of such business, any suit to collect such earnings must be brought in Michigan, where the contracts therefor were made and fulfilled.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan to bring here for review a decree sustaining a demurrer to the complainant's bill in chancery, and dismissing the bill. The complainant brought suit as President of the Merchants' Dispatch Transportation Company, averring that said company is a joint stock association, organized and existing under the laws of the State of New York, [231] and by the laws of that State authorized to sue in the name of its president. The bill, so far as it presents the questions on which this court can have jurisdiction, charges as follows:

"Second. That during the year ending with the 31st day of December, A. D. 1883, the said Transportation Company was engaged in the business of soliciting and contracting for the transportation of freight required to be carried over connecting lines of railroad in order to reach its destination, and, for the prosecution of its said business, it had agencies located generally throughout the United States and the Dominion of Canada; the said Transportation Company issued through bills of lading for such freight, and caused the same to be carried by the appropriate railroad companies; and, as compensation for its service in the premises, the said Transportation Company was paid by the said railroad companies a definite proportion of the through rate charged and collected by said companies for the carriage of said freights.

"Third. That during the said year the said Transportation Company was possessed of certain freight cars which were used and run by the railroad companies in whose possession they chanced from time to time to be for the transportation, upon their own and connecting lines of railroad, of through freight, principally between the City of New York, in the State of New York, and Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, and Chicago, in the State of Illinois, and other points and commercial centers in the West, Northwest and Southwest, without the said State of Michigan; that said cars were not used for the carriage of freight between points situate within the said State of Michigan, but wholly for the transportation of freight, either passing through the State or originating at points without said State and destined to points within, or originating at points within said State and destined to points without; that the said several railroad companies thus making use of said cars during the said year paid to the said Transportation Company as compensation therefor a definite sum per mile for the distance traveled by the said cars over their respective lines.

"Fourth. That the said Transportation Company during the said year was not running or [232] interested in any special fast, through, or other stock, coal or refrigerator car freight line, or doing business in or running cars over any of the railroads of said State of Michigan, otherwise than as in the preceding paragraphs stated.

"Fifth. That prior to the first day of April, A. D. 1884, the Commissioner of Railroads of the State of Michigan transmitted to the said Transportation Company certain blank forms of a report to be made to him pursuant to the provisions of an Act of the Legislature of the State of Michigan approved June 5, 1883, entitled 'An Act to Provide for the Taxation of Persons, Copartnerships, Associations, Carloaning Companies, and Fast Freight Lines Engaged in the Business of Running Cars Over Any of the Railroads of This State, and not Being Exclusively the Property of Any Railroad Company Paying Taxes on Their Gross Receipts,' with the requirement that the said Transportation Company should make up and return said report to the office of said commissioner on or before the first day of April, 1884, under the penalties of said Act; that on or about said first day of April, in compliance with said demand, but protesting that the same was without authority of law, and that said Act was invalid—or if valid, was not applicable to the said Transportation Company—the said Transportation Company made and filed with said commissioner a report, duly verified, setting forth that the gross amount of the receipts of the said Transportation Company for the mileage of said cars during said year 1883, while in use in the transportation of freight between points without said State and passing through said State in transit, estimated and prorated according to the mileage of said cars within said State of Michigan while so in use, was the sum of $95,714.50; and while in the use of transportation of freight from points without to points within said State of Michigan, and from points within to points without said State, estimated and prorated according to the mileage of said cars within the State of Michigan while so in use, was the sum of $28,890.01, making in the aggregate the sum of $124,604.51; that during said year it received no moneys whatever on business done solely within the said State of [233] Michigan, and no moneys which were or could be regarded as earned during said year within the limits of said State of Michigan other than as hereinbefore and in said report set forth.

"Sixth. That by the terms of said Act it is the duty of said Commissioner of Railroads to make and file with the Auditor-General of said State of Michigan, prior to the first day of June each year a computation based upon the report of each person, association, copartnership, or corporation taxable thereunder, of the amount of tax to become due from them respectively, and each such person, association, copartnership or corporation is required on or before the first day of July in such year to pay to the Treasurer of said State of Michigan, upon the statement of the Auditor-General thereof, 2½ per cent upon its gross receipts as computed by the said Commissioner of Railroads and derived from loaning, renting or hiring of cars to any railroad or other corporation, association, copartnership or party. It was also provided in said Act that for the said taxes and interest thereon, and the penalty imposed for delay in the payment thereof, the said State should have a lien upon all the property of the person, association, copartnership, or corporation so taxed, and in default of the payment of said tax by and within the time so prescribed the Auditor-General of said State was authorized to issue his warrant, to the sheriff of any county in said State, commanding him to levy the same, together with 10 per cent for his fees, by distress and sale of any of the property of the corporation or party neglecting or refusing to pay such tax wherever the same may be found within the county or State.

"Seventh. That the said Commissioner of Railroads has computed and determined that the amount of the gross receipts of the said Transportation Company under the said Act is the said sum of $28,890.01, and that there is due from said Transportation Company to the State of Michigan, as a tax thereon, the sum of $722.25, and has transmitted said computation to the said Auditor-General; and your orator shows that unless said tax is paid by the said Transportation Company on or before the first day of July, 1884, it will become the duty of [234] the said Auditor-General under the said Act, and the said Auditor-General threatens that he will proceed to enforce payment of the said tax against said Transportation Company by the seizure and sale of the property of said Transportation Company under the provisions of said Act.

"Eighth. That your orator is advised and so charges, that the said Act as to the said gross receipts of the said Transportation Company, or of any of its receipts or earnings from the use of its cars, within the State of Michigan, and the transaction of its business in the manner aforesaid, is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and void, and that said Act is inapplicable to the said Transportation Company, and inoperative for further reasons appearing upon its face; and that said Transportation Company is not amenable thereto.

"Ninth. That the chief office of the said Transportation Company for the transaction of corporate business was, during said year, and is in the City of New York, in the State of New York, and that all the moneys earned by it, as set forth in the second and third paragraphs hereof, were paid to it at its said office; that said Company during said year had no funds or property whatsoever within the State of Michigan, except cars in transit and office furniture in the possession of agents; and that during said year the said Transportation Company was subject to taxation and was taxed on account of its property and earnings within and under the laws of the State of New York."

The bill then prays for a subpena against William C. Stevens, Auditor-General of the State of Michigan, and for an injunction to prevent him from proceeding in the collection of said taxes. To this bill the defendant Stevens demurred, and the Circuit Court for the County of Washtenaw, in which this suit was brought, overruled that demurrer. From this decree the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court of the State, where the judgment of the lower court was reversed, the demurrer sustained, and the bill dismissed. To reverse that decree this writ of error was sued out.

The contention of the plaintiff in error is that the Statute of Michigan, the material parts of which are recited in the bill, is void as a regulation of commerce among the States, which, by the Constitution of the United States, is confided exclusively to Congress. Art. 1, § 8, clause 3. It will be observed that the bill shows that the tax finally assessed by the Auditor of State, against the Transportation Company, was for the $28,890.01 of the gross receipts which the Company had returned to the commissioner as money received for the transportation of freight from points without to points within the State of Michigan, and from points within to points without that State; and that no tax was assessed on the $95,714.50 received for transportation passing entirely through the State to and from other States.

[238] There is nothing in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the State, which is found in the transcript of the record, to explain this discrimination. There is nothing in the Statute of the State on which this tax rests which makes such a distinction; nor is there anything in the commissioner's requirement for a report which suggests it. It must have been, therefore, upon some idea of the authorities of the State that the one was interstate commerce and the other was not, which we are at a loss to comprehend. Freight carried from a point without the State to some point within the State of Michigan as the end of its voyage; and freight carried from some point within that State to other States is as much commerce among the States as that which passes entirely through the State from its point of original shipment to its destination. This is clearly stated and decided in the case of Phila. & Reading Railroad Co. v. Pa. commonly called the case of The State Freight Tax, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 232 [21: 146], in which it is held that a tax upon freight taken up within the State and carried out of it, or taken up without the State and brought within it, is a burden on interstate commerce, and therefore a violation of the constitutional provision that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. And in Wabash R. Co. v. Ill. 118 U. S. 557 [ante, 244], it is held that a statute attempting to regulate the rates of compensation for transportation of freight from New York to Peoria, in the State of Illinois, or from Peoria, to New York, is a regulation of commerce among the States. The same principle is established in Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 35 [18: 745].

The Statute of the State of Michigan of 1883, under which this tax is imposed, is entitled "An Act to Provide for the Taxation of Persons, Copartnerships, Associations, Carloaning Companies, Corporations, and Fast Freight Lines Engaged in the Business of Running Cars over Any of the Railroads of This State, and Not Being Exclusively the Property of any Railroad Company Paying Taxes on Their Gross Receipts." Sections 1 and 2 require reports to be made to the commissioner of railroads of the gross amount of their receipts for freight earned within the limits of the State from all persons and corporations running railroad cars within the State. The commissioner [239] is by section 4 required to make and file with the Auditor-General, on the first day of June of each year, a computation of the amount of tax which would become due on the first day of July next succeeding from each person, association, or corporation liable to pay such taxes. Each one of these is by section 5 required to pay to the State Treasurer, upon the statement of the Auditor-General, an annual tax of 2½ per cent upon its gross receipts, as computed by the Commissioner of Railroads.

It will thus be seen that the Act imposed a tax upon all the gross receipts of the Merchants Dispatch Transportation Company, a corporation under the laws of the State of New York, and with its principal place of business in that State, on account of goods transported by it in the State of Michigan; and the bill states that the Company carried no freight, the transportation of which was between points exclusively within that State.

The subject of the attempts by the States to impose burdens upon what has come to be known as interstate commerce or traffic, and which is called in the Constitution of the United States "commerce among the States," by statutes which endeavor to regulate the exercise of that commerce, as to the mode by which it shall be conducted, or by the imposition of taxes upon the articles of commerce, or upon the transportation of those articles, has been very much agitated of late years. It has received the attentive consideration of this court in many cases, and especially within the last five years, and has occupied Congress for a time quite as long. The recent Act, approved February 4, 1887, entitled "An Act to Regulate Commerce," passed after many years of effort in that body, is evidence that Congress has at last undertaken a duty imposed upon it by the Constitution of the United States, in the declaration that it shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes." Congress has freely exercised this power so far as relates to commerce with foreign Nations and with Indian Tribes, but in regard to commerce among the several States it has, until this Act, refrained from the passage of any very important regulation upon this subject, [240] except perhaps the statutes regulating steamboats and their occupation upon the navigable waters of the country.

With reference to the utterances of this court until within a very short time past, as to what constitutes commerce among the several States, and also as to what enactments by the State Legislatures are in violation of the constitutional provision on that subject, it may be admitted that the court has not always employed the same language, and that all of the judges of the court who have written opinions for it may not have meant precisely the same thing.

still, we think the more recent opinions of the court have pretty clearly established principles upon that subject which can be readily applied to most cases requiring the construction of the constitutional provision, and that these recent decisions leave no room to doubt that the Statute of Michigan, as interpreted by its supreme court in the present case, is forbidden as a regulation of commerce among the States, the power to make which is withheld from the State.

The whole question has been so fully considered in these decisions, and the cases themselves so carefully reviewed, that it would be doing little more than repeating the language of the arguments used in them to go over the ground again. The cases of The State Freight Tax and State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, which were considered together and decided at the December Term, 1872, and reported in 82 U. S. 15 Wallace, pp. 232 to 328 [21: 146-189], present the points in the case now before us perhaps as clearly as any which have been before this court. A Statute of the State of Pennsylvania imposed upon all the railroad corporations doing business within that State, as well as steamboat companies and others engaged in the carrying trade, a specific tax on each 2,000 pounds of freight carried, graduated according to the articles transported. These were arranged into three classes, on the first of which a tax of two cents per ton was laid, upon the second three cents, and upon the third five cents. The Reading Railroad Company, a party to the suit, in making its report under this statute, divided its freight on which the tax was to be levied into two classes; namely, [241] freight transported between points within the State and freight which either passed from within the State out of it or from without the State into it. The Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania decided that all the freight carried, without regard to its destination, was liable to the tax imposed by the statute. This court, however, held that freight carried entirely through the State from without, and the other class of freight brought into the State from without or carried from within to points without, all came under the description of "commerce among the States," within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States; and it held also that freight transported from and to points exclusively within the limits of the State, was internal commerce and not commerce among the States. The taxing law of the State was, therefore, valid as to the latter class of transportation; but with regard to the others it was invalid, because it was interstate commerce, and the State could lay no tax upon it. In that case, which was very thoroughly argued and very fully considered, the case of Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 35 [18: 745], was cited as showing, in regard to transportation, what was strictly internal commerce of a State and what was interstate commerce. The court said: "It is not at all material that the tax is levied upon all freight, as well that which is wholly internal as that embarked in interstate trade. We are not at this moment inquiring further than whether taxing goods carried because they are carried, is a regulation of carriage. The State may tax its internal commerce; but if an Act to tax interstate or foreign commerce is unconstitutional, it is not cured by including in its provisions subjects within the domain of the State. Nor is a rule prescribed for carriage of goods through, out of, or into a State any the less a regulation of transportation because the same rule may be applied to carriage which is wholly internal. Doubtless a State may regulate its internal commerce as it pleases. If a State chooses to exact conditions for allowing the passage or carriage of persons or freight through it into another State the nature of the exaction is not changed by adding to it similar conditions for allowing transportation wholly within the State." [242]

In the case of The Erie Railway Company (a corporation of the State of New York) v. Pennsylvania, decided at the same time (88 U. S. 21 Wall. 492 [22: 595]), it appeared that the road of that company was constructed for a short distance through a part of the State of Pennsylvania, and that a similar tax was levied upon it for freight carried over its road. This was held to be invalid for the reasons given in the case of the Reading Road.

In the other case of State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, which was also a suit between the Reading Railway Company and the State of Pennsylvania, an Act of the Legislature of that State was relied on which declared that, "In addition to the taxes now provided by law, every railroad, canal and transportation company incorporated under the laws of this Commonwealth, and not liable to the tax upon income under existing laws, shall pay to the Commonwealth a tax of three fourths of 1 per centum upon the gross receipts of said company; and the said tax shall be paid semi annually upon the first days of July and January, commencing on the first day of July, 1866."

This tax was held to be valid. The grounds upon which it was distinguished from the one in the preceding case upon freight were, that the corporation being a creation of the Legislature of Pennsylvania and holding and enjoying all its franchises under the authority of that State, this was a tax upon the franchises which it derived from the State, and was for that reason within the power of the State, and that, in determining the mode in which the State could tax the franchises which it had conferred, it was not limited to a fixed sum upon the value of them, but it could be graduated by and proportioned to either the value of the privileges granted or the extent or results of their exercise. "Very manifestly," said the court, "this is a tax upon the railroad company, measured in amount by the extent of its business, or the degree to which its franchise is exercised." Another reason given for the distinction is that "The tax is not levied, and indeed such a tax cannot be, until the expiration of each half year, and until the money received for freights, and from other sources of income, [243] has actually come into the company's hands. Then it has lost its distinctive character as freight earned, by having become incorporated into the general mass of the company's property. While it must be conceded that a tax upon interstate transportation is invalid, there seems to be no stronger reason for denying the power of a State to tax the fruits of such transportation after they have become intermingled with the general property of the carrier, than there is for denying her power to tax goods which have been imported, after their original packages have been broken, and after they have been mixed with the mass of personal property in the country. Brown v. Md. 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419 [6: 678].

The distinction between that case, which is mainly relied upon by the Supreme Court of Michigan in support of its decree, and the one which we now have before us, is very obvious, and is twofold: First, the corporation which was the subject of that taxation was a Pennsylvania corporation, having the situs of its business within the State which created it and endowed it with its franchises. Upon these franchises thus conferred by the State, it was asserted the State had a right to levy a tax. Second, this tax was levied upon money in the treasury of the corporation, upon property within the limits of the State, which had passed beyond the stage of compensation for freight and had become, like any other property or money, liable to taxation by the State. The case before us has neither of these qualities. The Corporation upon which this tax is levied is not a Corporation of the State of Michigan, and has never been organized or acknowledged as a corporation of that State. The money which it received for freight carried within the State probably never was within the State, being paid to the Company either at the beginning or the end of its route; and certainly at the time the tax was levied it was neither money nor property of the Corporation within the State of Michigan.

The proposition that the States can, by way of a tax upon business transacted within their limits, or upon the franchises of corporations which they have chartered, regulate such business or the affairs of such corporations, has [244] often been set up as a defense to the allegation that the taxation was such an interference with commerce as violated the constitutional provision now under consideration. But where the business so taxed is commerce itself, and is commerce among the States or with foreign Nations, the constitutional provision cannot thereby be evaded; nor can the States, by granting franchises to corporations engaged in the business of the transportation of persons or merchandise among them, which is itself interstate commerce, acquire the right to regulate that commerce, either by taxation or in any other way.

This is illustrated in the case of Cook v. Pa. 97 U. S. 566 [24: 1015]. The State of Pennsylvania, by her laws, had laid a tax upon the amount of sales of goods made by auctioneers, and had so modified and amended this class of taxes that in the end it remained a discriminating tax upon goods so sold imported from abroad. This court held that the tax which the auctioneer was required to pay into the treasury was a tax upon the goods sold, and, as this tax was three quarters of 1 per cent upon foreign drugs, glass, earthenware, hides, marble work and dye woods, that it was a tax upon the goods so described for the privilege of selling them at auction. The argument was made that this was a tax exclusively upon the business of the auctioneer, which the State had a right to levy. In that case, as in others, it was claimed that the privilege of being an auctioneer derived from the State by license, was subject to such taxation as the State chose to impose, but the proposition was overruled; and this court held that the tax was a regulation of commerce with foreign Nations, and that the fact that it was a tax upon the business of an auctioneer did not relieve it from the objection arising from the constitutional provision.

The same question arose in the case of The Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. 196 [29: 158]. That company was a corporation chartered by the State of New Jersey to run a ferry carrying passengers and freight between the Town of Gloucester, in that State, and the City of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania. It had no property within the State of Pennsylvania, but it leased a landing place or wharf in that city for its business. The Auditor-General and Treasurer of the State [245] of Pennsylvania assessed a tax upon the capital stock of this corporation, under the laws of that State, which the company refused to pay. Its validity was sustained by the State Supreme Court, and the question was brought to this court by a writ of error. It was insisted that the tax was justified as a tax upon the business of the corporation, which, it was claimed, was largely transacted in the City of Philadelphia. The Supreme Court of the State, in giving its decision, stated that the single question presented for consideration was whether the company did business within the State of Pennsylvania within the period for which the taxes were imposed; and it held that it did because it received and landed passengers and freight at its wharf in the City of Philadelphia. The argument was very much urged in this court that the licensing of ferries across navigable rivers, whether dividing two States or otherwise, had always been within the control of the States, and that this, being a mere tax upon the business of that corporation carried on largely within the State of Pennsylvania, was within the power of that State to regulate. But this court held, after an extensive review of the previous cases, that the business of ferrying across a navigable stream between two States was necessarily commerce among the States, and could not be taxed as was attempted in that case.

In the case of Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34 [29: 785], decided at the last term of the court, it was shown that the Legislature of Tennessee had imposed what it called a privilege tax under the Constitution of that State of $50 per annum upon every sleeping car or coach run or used upon a railroad in that State, not owned by the railroad company so running or using it. This, it will be perceived, is very much like the tax in the case before us, except that it is a specific tax of $50 per annum upon the car instead of a tax upon the gross receipts arising from the use of the car by its owner. In that case, after an exhaustive review of the previous decisions in this class of cases by Mr. Justice Blatchford, who delivered the opinion of the court, it was held that, as these cars were not property lo- [246] cated within the State, it was a tax for the privilege of carrying passengers in that class of cars through the State, which was interstate commerce, and for that reason the tax could not be sustained.

Two cases have been decided at the present term of the court, in which these questions have been considered, one of them at least involving the subject now under consideration, namely, that of Sabine Robbins v. Taxing District of Shelby Co. Tenn. [ante, 694]. A Statute of that State declared that "All drummers, and all persons not having a regular licensed house of business in the taxing district, offering for sale or selling goods, wares, or merchandise therein by sample, shall be required to pay to the county trustee the sum of $10 per week, or $25 per month, for such privilege." Robbins was prosecuted for a violation of this law, and on the trial it appeared that he was a resident and citizen of Cincinnati, Ohio, who transacted the business of drumming in the taxing district of Shelby County, that is, soliciting trade by the use of samples, for the firm by which he was employed, whose place of business was in Cincinnati, and all the members of which were residents and citizens of that city. It was argued in that case, as in the others we have just considered, that the State had a right to tax the business of selling by samples goods to be afterwards delivered, and to impose a tax upon the persons called "drummers" engaged in that business. It was further insisted that, since the license tax applied to persons residing within the State as well as to those who might come from other States to engage in that business, it was not a tax discriminating against other States, or the products of other States, and was valid as a tax upon that class of business done within the State. The whole subject is reconsidered again in this case by Mr. Justice Bradley, who delivered the opinion of the court, in which it is held that the business in which Robbins was engaged, namely, that of selling goods by sample, which were in the State of Ohio at the time and were to be delivered in the City of Memphis, Tennessee, constituted interstate commerce, and that, so far as this tax was to be imposed upon Robbins for doing that kind of business, it was a tax [247] upon interstate commerce, and therefore not within the power of the State to enforce.

In the case of Wabash R. Co. v. Ill. [supra,] the question presented related to a statutory regulation of that State as to compensation for carrying freight. It was held by the Supreme Court of Illinois to embrace all contracts for transportation by railroad which came into or went out of the State, as well as that which was wholly within its limits, and although the controversy did not arise in regard to a tax upon interstate commerce, yet the general question was fully considered as to what was interstate commerce and what was commerce exclusively within the State, and how far the former could be thus regulated by a statute of a State. This court held in that case that no statute of a State in regard to the transportation of goods over railroads within its borders which was a part of a continuous voyage to or from points outside of that State, and thus properly interstate commerce, could regulate the compensation to be paid for such transportation; that the carriage of passengers or freight between different points is commerce, and except where that is wholly and exclusively within the limits of a State it is not subject in its material features to be regulated by the State Legislature.

In many other cases, indeed in the three cases last mentioned, the whole subject has been fully examined and considered with all the authorities, and especially decisions of this court relating thereto. The result is so clearly against the Statute of Michigan as applied by its supreme court that we think the judgment of that court cannot stand.

The decree of the Supreme Court of Michigan is reversed, with directions for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

MERCANTILE NATIONAL BANK OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, Appt., [138]

v.

MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND COMMONALTY OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, AND GEORGE W. McLEAN, Receiver of Taxes.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 138-162.)

National banks—state taxation of shares of stock—the words "other moneyed capital" defined—test of distinction—exemptions of personal property, not similarly situated, immaterial—trust companies—savings bank deposits—municipal bonds—jurisdiction—review of authorities.

1. The words "other moneyed capital," as used in section 5219 R. S., providing that state taxation of national bank shares "shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens," do not necessarily embrace shares of stock so held in all corporations whose capital is employed in business carried on for the pecuniary profit of shareholders, although shares in some corporations may be such moneyed capital. The rule and test of the distinction is to be found in the nature of the business in which the corporation is engaged. The Act simply requires that capital invested in national banks shall not be taxed at a greater rate than like property similarly situated.

2. The words "other moneyed capital," as used in said section 5219 R. S., include shares of stock or other interests owned by individuals in all enterprises in which the capital employed in carrying on its business is money, where the object of the business is the making of profit by its use as money.

3. Upon a bill filed by an association organized as a National Bank in the City of New York, to restrain the collection of taxes assessed upon its stockholders in respect to their shares therein, it is held: that the exemption from state taxation of large amounts of personal property, not situated similarly to that invested in national banks, does not entitle national bank shares to similar exemption; that trust companies in New York are not banking institutions; that the mode of taxing such companies, adopted by that State, does not create the inequality alleged by the complainant; that the exemption from state taxation of savings bank deposits does not entitle national bank shares to similar exemption; that the exemption from state taxation of municipal bonds is immaterial; and that the property to be taxed under the rule prescribed for the taxation of national bank shares must be property which, under the law of the State, is the subject of taxation within its jurisdiction.

Argued March 11, 14, 1887. Decided April 4, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case fully appear in the opinion of the court. Compare the following case of National Newark Banking Company v. The Mayor.

Messrs. Charles W. Wells, Frederick W. Whitridge and Willard Brown, for appellant:

The words "other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens" are not confined in their meaning to capital employed in the business of banking, but embrace shares of stock of all corporations, whether they are engaged in manufacturing, railroad or banking business, and also embrace bonds, mortgages, credits and moneys at interest.

See Hepburn v. School Directors, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 480 (23: 112); People v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 539 (25: 705); Cummings v. National Bank, 101 U. S. 153 (25: 903); Evansville Bank v. Britton, 105 U. S. 322 (26: 1053); Boyer v. Boyer, 113 U. S. 689 (28: 1089).

The intent of Congress in constituting this restriction upon the powers of the States to tax shares of national banks, was based upon the necessity of protection, but not protection solely against encroachments by state banking capital. The protection was made to extend as widely as the danger. It is just as much within the power of the States to injure and finally destroy the national bank by discrimination against investment in their shares in favor of investments in shares of railroad and trading corporations, as in favor of investments in banking business. Capital will seek investment in such property as is least burdened and most productive; and if the State may burden at its will the shares of national banks, relieving from like burden the shares in railroad companies, it is manifest that capital seeking investment will take the latter rather than the former, and thereby the requisite national banking capital will not be taken by the investor, and this necessary instrument of the National Government will be destroyed. Should a State say to its citizens, "If you invest $100 in national bank stock, you shall pay as a penalty therefor the sum of $5 into the treasury of the State, but if you will invest it in a share of a railroad company designed to develop the interest of this State, you shall not be required to pay such penalty," there can be no question that such discrimination would be quite as effectual in driving capital out of national banking shares as if the discrimination had been made in favor of the development of a state banking enterprise.

For these reasons this court said in the case of Boyer v. Boyer, supra, that capital invested in national bank shares was intended to be placed upon the same footing of substantial equality in respect of taxation by state authority, as the State establishes for other moneyed capital however invested, whether in state bank shares or otherwise.

Shares of stock of railroad and miscellaneous corporations being "other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens" within the meaning of the Act of Congress, the State of New York has exempted such shares from all taxation. This constitutes an exemption of "a very material part relatively of other moneyed capital" and renders void the taxation of national bank shares.

The exemption of shares of trust companies from taxation in the hands of shareholders, of itself constitutes a "material discrimination" against national bank shares.

The exemption of the shares of stock of life insurance companies and their investments in bonds, mortgages and the like, is a "substantial discrimination" against national bank shares.

The exemption of the deposits in savings banks is also a "material discrimination" against shares of national banks.

Messrs. James C. Carter and Thomas Allison, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court: [139]

The bill in this case was filed by the appellant, an association organized as a National Bank, in the City of New York, the object and prayer of which were to restrain the collection of taxes assessed upon its stockholders in respect to their shares therein, on the ground that the taxes assessed and sought to be collected by the defendants were illegal and void under section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as being at a greater rate than those assessed under the laws of New York upon other moneyed capital in the hands of the individual citizens of that State. The assessment in question was made for the year 1885, by the proper officer, acting in pursuance of section 312 of an Act of the Legislature of the State of New York, passed July 1, 1882, entitled "An Act to Revise the Statutes of this State Relating to Banks, Banking and Trust Companies," which reads as follows:

"Sec. 812. The stockholders in every bank or banking association organized under the authority of this State, or of the United States, shall be assessed and taxed on the value of their shares of stock therein; said shares shall be included in the valuation of the personal property of such stockholders in the assessment of taxes at the place, city, town or ward where such bank or banking association is located, and not elsewhere, whether the said stockholders reside in said place, city, town or ward or not; but in the assessment of said shares, each stockholder shall be allowed all the deductions and exceptions allowed by law in assessing the value of other taxable personal property owned by individual citizens of this State, and the assessment and taxation shall not be at a [140] greater rate than is made or assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of this State. In making such assessment there shall also be deducted from the value of such shares such sum as is in the same proportion to such value as is the assessed value of the real estate of the bank or banking association, and in which any portion of their capital is invested, in which said shares are held, to the whole amount of the capital stock of said bank or banking association. Nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to exempt the real estate of banks or banking associations from either state, county or municipal taxes, but the same shall be subject to state, county, municipal and other taxation to the same extent and rate, and in the same manner according to its value, as other real estate is taxed. The local authorities charged by law with the assessment of the said shares shall, within ten days after they have completed such assessment, give written notice to each bank or banking association of such assessment of the shares of its respective shareholders, and no personal or other notice to such shareholders of such assessment shall be necessary for the purpose of this Act."

The hearing in the circuit court was had upon an agreed statement of facts, as follows:

"It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between the parties to the above entitled suit, that, for the purpose of the trial of this cause, the facts hereinafter stated are true, and that the cause be submitted for trial and decree upon such statement alone, together with the pleadings:

"1. That the complainant, on the second Monday of January, A. D. 1885, and for several months prior thereto, had a capital stock of the par value of $1,000,000 and a surplus fund of $200,000; that nearly the whole of said capital and surplus fund was, during that period, invested in bonds of the United States of the par value of $949,000, and of a market value and cost largely exceeding that sum; that its shares of stock were each of the par value of $100 and of the number of 10,000, and were then held by one hundred and forty-two persons and corporations, fifty of whom, owning 1,877 shares, were residents of States other than [141] the State of New York, and the remainder residents of the State of New York.

"2. That, on the second Monday of January, 1885, the proper tax officers of the City of New York, acting under chapter 409 of the Laws of 1882 of the State of New York, did value and assess for taxation the shares of stock of said Bank against the individual shareholders thereof, at the rate of $89 per share, after deducting the proportion of the assessed value of the real estate of said Bank applicable to each share of stock, as by law required, making the total gross valuation of said shares in the hands of the shareholders the sum of $890,000, from which sum the debts of sundry indebted stockholders, amounting to $89,128, were deducted, as by law allowed, leaving the total valuation of said shares against said stockholders upon which taxes were thereafter assessed the sum of $800,872.

"3. That, on the second Monday of January, 1885, the aggregate actual value of the shares of stock of the incorporated moneyed and stock corporations incorporated by the laws of the State of New York deriving an income or profit from their capital or otherwise (not including life insurance companies, trust companies, banks, or banking associations, organized under the authority of this State or of the United States) amounted to the sum of $755,018,892; that 'Exhibit A,' hereto appended and made a part of this agreement, contains a list of the corporations whose shares of capital stock are embraced in said sum of $755,018,892, and also shows the total par value of the shares of capital stock of each of said corporations.

"4. That, at the period aforesaid, the aggregate actual value of the shares of stock of the life insurance companies incorporated under the laws of this State amounted to the sum of $3,540,000, and at the same period the aggregate value of the personal property of said companies, consisting of mortgages, loans with collateral security, state, county, and municipal bonds, and railroad bonds and shares of stock of corporations (but not including the bonds of the United States nor the shares of corporations created by the State of New York), amounted to $195,257,305; all of which is shown in detail [142] in the schedule hereto annexed, marked 'Exhibit B.'

"5. That, at the said period, the aggregate actual value of the shares of the capital stock of the trust companies existing in the State of New York and organized under its laws amounted to $32,018,900, as is shown in detail in the schedule hereto annexed, marked 'Exhibit C.' of which sum the amount of $30,215,900 was of trust companies located in the City of New York.

"6. That, at the same period, the aggregate actual value of the deposits due by the savings banks of this State to depositors was $437,107,501 (not including the surplus accumulated by the said corporations, amounting to $68,669,001).

"7. That the aggregate actual value of the bonds and stocks issued by the City of New York, subject to the provisions of chapter 552 of the Laws of 1880, at the said period, amounted to $13,467,000.

"8. That the aggregate actual value at the same period of the shares of stock of corporations created by States other than the State of New York, owned by the citizens of the State of New York, amounted to at least the sum of $250,000,000.

"9. The assessed valuation of all personal property, after making the deductions allowed by law, in the City of New York (at the said period), as shown by the annual record of the assessed valuation of real and personal estate of the said City for the year 1885, was $202,673,806. This sum included the capital of corporations (after making deductions for investments thereof in real estate, shares of New York corporations, taxable upon their capital stock under the laws of this State, and nontaxable securities), as follows:

Insurance companies	$ 2,146,879
Trust companies	156,506
Miscellaneous companies	29,234,409
Railroad companies	12,339,871

"It also included:

Shares of national banks	45,046,074
Shares of state banks	15,700,220

"The sum so deducted for the value of the [143] real estate belonging to said trust companies located in the City of New York did not exceed $2,336,572.31.

The assessed value of the real estate in said City for said period is	$1,168,443,137
And in the said State, including the City of New York, is	2,761,978,845
The latter sum including the sum of about	840,000,000

being the assessed value of the real estate located in said State belonging to corporations.

"The 'aggregate amount of the taxable personal estate' within the State of New York, exclusive of said City, after deducting debts due by the owners thereof for the year ending December 31, 1884, as assessed by the assessors and returned to the State Comptroller, is $151,682,869.

"This sum included the capital of corporations (after making the deductions for investments thereof in real estate, shares of New York corporations taxable upon their capital stock under the laws of this State, and nontaxable securities) of the amount of $34,466,612.

The aggregate capital stock, taken at par, of the national banks outside of the City of New York, but within the State of New York, on December 20, 1884, as shown by the report of the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States, was	$36,804,160
And that of state banks, outside of the said City, but within said State, as shown by the report of the bank superintendent of New York, is	8,128,000
Total (outside of New York City).	$44,932,160
The total par value of the shares of national banks in said State, including the City of New York, for the period aforesaid, is	$83,054,160
And of the state banks	32,815,700

"10. That it is the intention of the defendants, unless restrained by injunction, to collect the said tax levied by them against the shareholders of the said complainant upon said shares [144] by the use of all needful legal process.

"11. That any Statutes of the United States or of the State of New York may be cited and relied upon before the said court as if herein fully set forth."

From a decree dismissing the bill the present appeal is prosecuted.

Section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is as follows:

"Nothing herein shall prevent all the shares in any association from being included in the valuation of the personal property of the owner or holder of such shares in assessing taxes imposed by authority of the State within which the association is located; but the Legislature of each State may determine and direct the manner and place of taxing all the shares of national banking associations located within the State, subject only to the two restrictions that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State, and that the shares of any national banking association owned by nonresidents of any State shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located and not elsewhere. Nothing herein shall be construed to exempt the real property of associations from either state, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real property is taxed."

In the present case no question is raised by the appellant as to the validity of section 312, chapter 409 of the Laws of New York of 1882, considered by itself, nor in reference to the rule of valuation or assessment which it prescribes. No exception is taken to the form of the assessment, nor is the case based in any degree upon the dereliction of the assessing officers in the discharge of their duties, there being no allegation and no proof that they have not performed their whole duty under the statutes of the State.

The proposition which the appellant seeks to establish is that the State of New York, in seeking to tax national bank shares, has not complied with the condition contained in section 5219 of the Revised Statutes, that such taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the [146] hands of individual citizens of such State, "in that, it has by its legislation expressly exempted from all taxes in the hands of the individual citizens numerous species of moneyed capital, aggregating in actual value the sum of $1,686,000,000, whilst it has by its laws subjected national bank shares in the hands of individual holders thereof (aggregating a par value of $88,000,000), and state bank shares (having a like value of $22,815,700), to taxation upon their full actual value, less only a proportionate amount of the real estate owned by the bank." This exemption, it is claimed, is of a "very material part relatively" of the whole, and renders the taxation of national bank shares void.

The exemptions thus referred to are classified as follows:

1. The shares of stock in the hands of the individual shareholders of all incorporated "moneyed or stock corporations deriving an income or profit from their capital or otherwise, incorporated by the laws of New York, not including trust companies and life insurance companies, and state or national banks." The value of such shares, it is admitted, amounts to $755,018,892.

2. Trust companies and life insurance companies. The actual value of the shares of stock in trust companies amounts to $32,018,900, and the actual value of the shares in life insurance companies amounts to $3,540,000, which life insurance companies, it is admitted, are the owners of personal property consisting of mortgages, loans, stocks and bonds to the value of $195,257,805.

3. Savings banks and the deposits therein. The deposits amount to $437,107,501, and an accumulated surplus to $68,669,001.

4. Certain municipal bonds issued by the City of New York under an Act passed in 1880, of the value of $13,467,000.

5. Shares of stocks in corporations created by States other than New York, in the hands of individual holders, residents of said State, amounting to $250,000,000.

It is argued by the appellant that these exemptions bring the case within the decision of [147] Boyer v. Boyer, 113 U. S. 689 [28: 1089]. In that case, referring to the legislation of Pennsylvania, it was said: "The burden of county taxation imposed by the latter Act has at all events been removed from all bonds or certificates of loan issued by any railroad company incorporated by the State; from shares of stock in the hands of stockholders of any institution or company of the State which in its corporate capacity is liable to pay a tax into the state treasury under the Act of 1859; from mortgages, judgments, and recognizances of every kind; from moneys due or owing upon articles of agreement for the sale of real estate; from all loans, however made, by corporations which are taxable for state purposes when such corporations pay into the state treasury the required tax on such indebtedness."

This enumeration of exempted property, the amounts of which were stated in the bill and admitted by the demurrer, was held to include such a material portion relatively of the moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens as to make the tax upon the shares of national banks an unfair discrimination against that class of property, but no attempt was made in the opinion of the court to define the meaning of the words "moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens" as used in the statute, or to enumerate all the various kinds of property or investments that came within its description, or to show that shares of stock in the hands of stockholders of every institution, company, or corporation of a State, having a capital employed for the purpose of earning dividends or profits for its stockholders, were taxable as moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens.

It is accordingly contended on behalf of the appellees in the present case, 1, that the shares of stock in the various companies incorporated by the laws of New York as moneyed or stock corporations, deriving an income or profit from their capital or otherwise, including trust companies, life insurance companies, and savings banks, are not moneyed capital in the hands of the individual citizen within the meaning of the Act of Congress; 2, that if any of them are, then the corporations themselves are taxed under the laws of New York in such a manner and to such an extent that the shares of [148] stock therein are in fact subject to a tax equal to that which is assessed upon shares of national banks; and 3, that if there are any exceptions, they are immaterial in amount and based upon considerations which exclude them from the operation of the rule of relative taxation intended by the Act of Congress.

In view of the nature of the contention between the parties to this suit, and the extent and value of the interests involved, it becomes necessary to review with care the previous decisions of this court upon the same subject, and to endeavor to state with precision the rule of relative taxation prescribed to the States by Congress on shares of national banks.

The National Banking Act of 1864, 13 Stat. at L. 111, in addition to the restrictions now imposed upon the state taxation of national bank shares, declared "That the tax so imposed, under the laws of any State, upon the shares of any of the associations authorized by this Act shall not exceed the rate imposed upon the shares in any of the banks organized under the authority of the State where such association is located." In the re-enactment of this statute in 1868, 15 Stat. at L. 34, this proviso was omitted. The case of Van Allen v. Assessors, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 573 [18: 229] was decided under the Act of 1864 as originally enacted. In that case, the taxing law of New York, which was in question, was held to be invalid because it levied no taxes upon shares in state banks at all, the tax being assessed upon the capital of the banks after deducting that portion which was invested in securities of the United States; and it was held that this tax on the capital was not a tax on the shares of the stockholders equivalent to that on the shares in national banks. It was also decided in that case that it was competent for the States, under the permission of Congress, to tax the shares of national bank stock held by individuals, notwithstanding the capital of the bank was invested in bonds of the United States which were not subject to taxation.

It appears, therefore, as the result of the decision in that case, that a tax upon the capital of a state bank, levied upon the value thereof, after deducting such part as was invested in nontaxable government bonds, was less than an equivalent for a tax upon the shares of national banks from which no such deduction was permitted. Accordingly, in the case of People [149] v. Commissioners, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 244 [18: 344], the complaint was made on behalf of individual owners of national bank stock taxed in New York, that no deduction was permitted to them from the value of their shares on account of the capital of the bank being invested in nontaxable government bonds, while such deduction was allowed in favor of insurance companies and individuals in the assessment for taxation of the value of their personal property; and it was contended, therefore, that the relators in that case were taxed upon their shares of national bank stock at a greater rate than was assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens. In reference to this supposed inequality the court said: "The answer is that upon a true construction of this clause of the Act, the meaning and intent of the law makers were that the rate of taxation of the shares should be the same or not greater than upon the moneyed capital of the individual citizen, which is subject or liable to taxation. That is, no greater proportion or percentage of tax in the valuation of the shares should be levied than upon other moneyed taxable capital in the hands of the citizens. This rule seems to be as effectual a test to prevent unjust discrimination against the shareholders as could well be devised. It embraces a class which constitutes the body politic of the State, who make its laws and provide for its taxes. They cannot be greater than the citizens impose upon themselves. It is known as sound policy that in every well regulated and enlightened State or government, certain descriptions of property, and also certain institutions, such as churches, hospitals, academies, cemeteries, and the like, are exempt from taxation; but these exemptions have never been regarded as disturbing the rates of taxation, even where the fundamental law had ordained that it should be uniform." The court then proceeded to show that the exclusion, as the subject of taxation, of government securities held by individuals, from their moneyed capital, was by authority of the United States, and hence it [150] would be a contradiction to infer that Congress meant to include the same government securities as a part of that moneyed capital which it required to be taxed by the States at a rate equal to that imposed by the latter upon the shares held by individuals of national bank stock.

The other objection taken to the validity of the tax complained of was, that insurance companies created under the laws of the State were authorized to deduct from the amount of their capital and surplus profits, for purposes of taxation, such part as was invested in United States securities. In reference to this the court said: "The answer is that this clause does not refer to the rate of assessments upon insurance companies as a test by which to prevent discrimination against the shares; that is confined to the rate of assessments upon moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens. These institutions are not within the words or the contemplation of Congress; but even if they were, the answer we have already given to the deduction of these securities in the assessment of the property of individual citizens is equally applicable to them."

In Lionberger v. Rouse, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 468 [19: 721], it was held that the proviso originally contained in the Act of 1864, and omitted from the Act of 1868, expressly referring to state banks was limited to state banks of issue. The court said p. 474 [724]: "There was nothing to fear from banks of discount and deposit merely, for in no event could they work any displacement of national bank circulation." Of course, so far as investments in such banks are moneyed capital in the hands of individuals, they are included in the clause as it now stands.

In the case of Hepburn v. School Directors, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 480 [23: 112], it was decided to be competent for the State to value, for taxation, shares of stock in a national bank at their actual value, even if in excess of their par value, provided thereby they were not taxed at a greater rate than was assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the State. It was a further question in that case whether the exemption from taxation by statute of "all mortgages, judgments, recognizances, and moneys owing upon arti-[151] cles of agreement for the sale of real estate" made the taxation of shares in national banks unequal and invalid. This was decided in the negative on the two grounds: 1, that the exemption was founded upon the just reason of preventing a double burden by the taxation both of property and of the debts secured upon it; and 2, because it was partial only, not operating as a discrimination against investments in national bank shares. The court said: "It could not have been the intention of Congress to exempt bank shares from taxation because some moneyed capital was exempt."

The subject was further considered in the case of Adams v. Nashville, 95 U. S. 19 [24: 369]. One of the questions in that case had reference to an exemption from taxation by state authority of interest-paying bonds issued by the municipal corporation of the City of Nashville, in the hands of individuals. It was held that the exemption did not invalidate the assessment upon the shares of national banks. The court said, p. 22 [370]: "The Act of Congress was not intended to curtail the state power on the subject of taxation. It simply required that capital invested in national banks should not be taxed at a greater rate than like property similarly invested. It was not intended to cut off the power to exempt particular kinds of property, if the Legislature chose to do so. Homesteads to a specified value, a certain amount of household furniture (the six plates, six knives and forks, six teacups and saucers of the old statutes), the property of clergymen to some extent, school houses, academies and libraries are generally exempt from taxation. The discretionary power of the Legislatures of the States over all these subjects remains as it was before the Act of Congress of June, 1864. The plain intention of that statute was to protect the corporations formed under its authority from unfriendly discrimination by the States in the exercise of their taxing power."

In People v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 539 [25: 705], it was held that the prohibition against the taxation of national bank shares at a greater rate than that imposed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens could not be evaded by the assessment of equal rates of taxation upon unequal valuations, and that consequently where the state statute authorized in- [152] dividuals to deduct the amount of debts owing by them from the assessed value of their personal property and moneyed capital subject to taxation, the owners of shares of national banks were entitled to the same deduction. The cases of Supervisors v. Stanley, 105 U. S. 305 [26: 1044]; Hills v. Exchange Bank, Id. 319 [26: 1052]; Evansville Bank v. Britton, Id. 322 [26: 1053], and Cummings v. National Bank, 101 U. S. 153 [25: 903], are applications of the same principle.

The rule of decision in Van Allen v. Assessors, [supra], is not inconsistent with that followed in People v. Commissioners [supra]. In the former of these cases the comparison was between taxes levied upon the shares of national banks and taxes levied upon the capital of state banks. In the valuation of the capital of state banks for this taxation, nontaxable securities of the United States were necessarily excluded, while in the valuation of shares of national banks no deduction was permitted on account of the fact that the capital of the national banks was invested in whole or in part in government bonds. The effect of this was of course, to discriminate to a very important extent in favor of investments in state banks, the shares in which eo nomine were not taxed at all, while their taxable capital was diminished by the subtraction of the government securities in which it was invested, and against national bank shares taxed without such deduction at a value necessarily and largely based on the value of the government securities in which by law a large part of the capital of the bank was required to be invested. In the case of People v. Commissioners the comparison was not between the taxation of shareholders in national banks and of shareholders in state banking institutions, but between the taxation of national bank shares and that of personal property held by individuals and insurance companies, from the valuation of which the deduction was permitted of the amount of nontaxable government securities held by them respectively. The general ground of the decision was that the exemption was not an unfriendly discrimination against investments in national banks in favor of other investments of a similar and competing character. [153]
It was held that the exemption, under state authority, of United States securities, which it was not lawful for the State to tax, could not be considered an unwarranted exemption in that case. It was also held that the language of the Act of Congress which fixed the rate of taxation upon national bank shares, by reference to that imposed by the State "upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens," excluded from the comparison moneyed capital in the hands of corporations, unless the corporations were of that character, such as state banks were held to be in the case of Van Allen v. The Assessors, that shares of stock in them fell within the description of "moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens." In that way a distinction was established between shares of stock held in banking corporations and those held in insurance companies and other business, trading, manufacturing and miscellaneous corporations, whose business and operations were unlike those of banking institutions.

It follows, as a deduction from these decisions, that "moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens" does not necessarily embrace shares of stock held by them in all corporations whose capital is employed, according to their respective corporate powers and privileges, in business carried on for the pecuniary profit of shareholders, although shares in some corporations, according to the nature of their business, may be such moneyed capital. The rule and test of this difference is not to be found in that quality attached to shares of stock in corporate bodies generally, whereby the certificates of ownership have a certain appearance of negotiability, so as easily to be transferred by delivery under blank powers of attorney, and to be dealt in by sales at the stock exchange, or used as collaterals for loans, as though they were negotiable security for money. This quality, in a greater or less degree, pertains to all stocks in corporate bodies, the facility of their use in this way being in proportion to the estimated wealth and credit, present or prospective, of the corporation itself. Neither is the difference to be determined by the character of the investments in which, either by law or in fact, the bulk of the capital and the accumulated surplus of the corporation is from time to time invested. It does not follow, because these are invested in such a way as properly to constitute moneyed capital, that the shares of stock in the corporations themselves must necessarily be within the same description. Such is the case of insurance companies, in respect to which it was held, in People v. The Commissioners, that shares of stock in them were not taxable as "moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens;" and that the language of the Act of Congress does not include moneyed capital in the hands of corporations. The true test of the distinction, therefore, can only be found in the nature of the business in which the corporation is engaged.

The key to the proper interpretation of the Act of Congress is its policy and purpose. The object of the law was to establish a system of national banking institutions, in order to provide a uniform and secure currency for the people, and to facilitate the operations of the Treasury of the United States. The capital of each of the banks in this system was to be furnished entirely by private individuals; but, for the protection of the government and the people, it was required that this capital, so far as it was the security for its circulating notes, should be invested in the bonds of the United States. These bonds were not subjects of taxation; and neither the banks themselves, nor their capital, however invested, nor the shares of stock therein held by individuals, could be taxed by the States in which they were located without the consent of Congress, being exempted from the power of the States in this respect, because these banks were means and agencies established by Congress in execution of the powers of the Government of the United States. It was deemed consistent, however, with these national uses, and otherwise expedient, to grant to the States the authority to tax them within the limits of a rule prescribed by the law. In fixing those limits it became necessary to prohibit the States from imposing such a burden as would prevent the capital of individuals from freely seeking investment in institutions which it was the express object of the law to establish and promote. The business of banking, including all the operations which distinguish it, might be carried on under state laws, either by corporations or private persons, and capital in the form of money might be invested and employed by individual citizens in many single and separate operations forming substantial parts of the business of banking. A tax upon the money of individuals, invested in the form of shares of stock in national banks, would diminish their value as an investment and drive the capital so invested from this employment, if at the same time similar investments and similar employments under the authority of state laws were exempt from an equal burden. The main purpose, therefore, of Congress, in fixing limits to state taxation on investments in the shares of national banks, was to render it impossible for the State, in levying such a tax, to create and foster an unequal and unfriendly competition, by favoring institutions or individuals carrying on a similar business and operations and investments of a like character. The language of the Act of Congress is to be read in the light of this policy.

[155]

Applying this rule of construction we are led, in the first place, to consider the meaning of the words "other moneyed capital," as used in the statute. Of course it includes shares in national banks; the use of the word "other," requires that. If bank shares were not moneyed capital, the word "other" in this connection would be without significance. But "moneyed capital" does not mean all capital the value of which is measured in terms of money. In this sense, all kinds of real and personal property would be embraced by it, for they all have an estimated value as the subjects of sale. Neither does it necessarily include all forms of investment in which the interest of the owner is expressed in money. Shares of stock in railroad companies, mining companies, manufacturing companies, and other corporations, are represented by certificates showing that the owner is entitled to an interest, expressed in money value, in the entire capital and property of the corporation, but the property of the corporation which constitutes its invested capital may consist mainly of real and personal property, which, in the hands of individuals, no one would think of calling moneyed capital, and its business may not consist in any kind of dealing in money, or commercial representatives of money.

[156] So far as the policy of the government in reference to national banks is concerned, it is indifferent how the States may choose to tax such corporations as those just mentioned, or the interest of individuals in them, or whether they should be taxed at all. Whether property interests in railroads, in manufacturing enterprises, in mining investments, and others of that description, are taxed or exempt from taxation, in the contemplation of the law, would have no effect upon the success of national banks. There is no reason, therefore, to suppose that Congress intended, in respect to these matters, to interfere with the power and policy of the States. The business of banking, as defined by law and custom, consists in the issue of notes payable on demand, intended to circulate as money where the banks are banks of issue; in receiving deposits payable on demand; in discounting commercial paper; making loans of money on collateral security; buying and selling bills of exchange; negotiating loans, and dealing in negotiable securities issued by the government, state and national, and municipal and other corporations. These are the operations in which the capital invested in national banks is employed, and it is the nature of that employment which constitutes it in the eye of this statute "moneyed capital." Corporations and individuals carrying on these operations do come into competition with the business of national banks, and capital in the hands of individuals thus employed is what is intended to be described by the Act of Congress. That the words of the law must be so limited appears from another consideration: they do not embrace any moneyed capital in the sense just defined, except that in the hands of individual citizens. This excludes moneyed capital in the hands of corporations, although the business of some corporations may be such as to make the shares therein belonging to individuals moneyed capital in their hands, as in the case of banks. A railroad company, a mining company, an insurance company, or any other corporation of that description, may have a large part of its capital invested in securities payable in money, and so may be the owners of moneyed capital; but, as we have already seen, the shares of stock in such companies held by individuals are not moneyed capital.

[157] The terms of the Act of Congress, therefore, include shares of stock or other interests owned by individuals in all enterprises in which the capital employed in carrying on its business is money, where the object of the business is the making of profit by its use as money. The moneyed capital thus employed is invested for that purpose in securities by way of loan, discount, or otherwise, which are from time to time, according to the rules of the business, reduced again to money and reinvested. It includes money in the hands of individuals employed in a similar way, invested in loans, or in securities for the payment of money, either as an investment of a permanent character, or temporarily with a view to sale or repayment and reinvestment. In this way the moneyed capital in the hands of individuals is distinguished from what is known generally as personal property. Accordingly, it was said in Evansville Bank v. Britton, 105 U. S. 322 [supra]: "The Act of Congress does not make the tax on personal property the measure of the tax on the bank shares in the State, but the tax on moneyed capital in the hands of the individual citizens. Credits, money loaned at interest, and demands against persons or corporations are more purely representative of moneyed capital than personal property, so far as they can be said to differ. Undoubtedly there may be said to be much personal property exempt from taxation without giving bank shares a right to similar exemption, because personal property is not necessarily moneyed capital. But the rights, credits, demands, and money at interest mentioned in the Indiana Statute, from which bona fide debts may be deducted, all mean moneyed capital invested in that way."

This definition of moneyed capital in the hands of individuals seems to us to be the idea of the law, and ample enough to embrace and secure its whole purpose and policy.

From this view, it follows that the mode of taxation adopted by the State of New York in reference to its corporations, excluding for the present trust companies and savings banks, does not operate in such a way as to make the tax assessed upon shares of national banks at a greater rate than that imposed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens.

This is the conclusion reached on similar grounds by the Court of Appeals of New York. [158] In the case of McMahon v. Palmer, 102 N. Y. 176, that court said: "Our system of laws, with reference to the taxation of incorporated companies and capital invested therein, has been carefully framed with a view of reaching all taxable property and subjecting it to equality of burden, so far as that object is attainable in a matter so complex. In view of the wide variation in the employable value of such investments and the frequent mutations in their conditions it is by no means certain that this object has not been attained with reasonable accuracy. It is quite clear, from even this cursory review of the statutes, that if any discrimination is made by our laws in taxing capital invested, it is not to the prejudice of that employed in banking corporations. Even if this were not the result of the statute, we are of opinion that investments in the shares of companies named do not come within the meaning of that clause in the federal statutes, referring to other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals. That phrase, as generally employed, distinguishes such capital from other personal property, and investments in the various manufacturing and industrial enterprises. And this is the sense in which it is used in our tax laws, as appears by reference to the statutes."

The cases of trust companies and savings banks require separate consideration. Section 812 of chapter 409 of the Act of 1882 is a reenactment of section 8 of chapter 596 of the Laws of 1880, except that in the latter, trust companies were included with banks and banking institutions, so as to subject the stockholders therein to the same rule of assessment and taxation on the value of their shares of stock. The present statute omits them from the corresponding section. The consequence is that trust companies are taxable, as other corporations under the Act of 1857, for local purposes, upon the actual value of their capital stock. By chapter 361 of the Laws of 1881, as amended, they are subjected to a franchise tax, in the nature of an income tax, payable to the State for state purposes. It is argued, from this legislation, in reference to the taxation of trust companies, that it discloses an evident intent to discriminate in favor of the latter as between them and banks, including national banks; and it is argued that, considering the nature of the business in which trust companies are engaged, it is a material and unfriendly discrimination in favor of state institutions engaged to some extent in a competing business with that of national banks. Trust companies, however, in New York, according to the powers conferred upon them by their charters and habitually exercised, are not in any proper sense of the word banking institutions. They have the following powers: To receive moneys in trust and to accumulate the same at an agreed rate of interest; to accept and execute all trusts of every description committed to them by any person or corporation or by any court of record; to receive the title to real or personal estate on trusts created in accordance with the laws of the State, and to execute such trusts; to act as agents for corporations in reference to issuing, registering, and transferring certificates of stock and bonds, and other evidences of debt; to accept and execute trusts for married women in respect to their separate property; and to act as guardian for the estates of infants. It is required that their capital shall be invested in bonds and mortgages on unincumbered real estate in the State of New York worth double the amount loaned thereon, or in stocks of the United States or of the State of New York, or of the incorporated cities of that State.

It is evident, from this enumeration of powers, that trust companies are not banks in the commercial sense of that word, and do not perform the functions of banks in carrying on the exchanges of commerce. They receive money on deposit, it is true, and invest it in loans, and so deal, therefore, in money and securities for money in such a way as properly to bring the shares of stock held by individuals therein within the definition of moneyed capital in the hands of individuals, as used in the Act of Congress. But we fail to find in the record any sufficient ground to believe that the rate of taxation, which in fact falls upon this form of investment of moneyed capital, is less than that imposed upon shares of stock in national banks.

It appears from the tax laws of New York applicable to the subject, as judicially construed by the Court of Appeals of that State, that the capital stock of such a corporation is to be assessed at its actual value. The actual value of the whole capital stock is ascertained by reference, among other standards, to the market price of its shares, so that the aggregate value of the entire capital may be the market price of one multiplied by the whole number of shares. Oswego Starch Factory v. Dollovay, 21 N. Y. 449; People v. Commissioners of Taxes, 95 N. Y. 554. From this are to be deducted, of course, the real estate of the corporation otherwise taxed, and the value of such part of the capital stock as is invested in nontaxable property, such as securities of the United States. In addition to this, the corporation, as already stated, pays to the State, as a state tax, a tax upon its franchise based upon its income; the tax on the capital being for local purposes.

It is evident, we think, that taxation in this mode is, at least, equal to that upon the shares of individual stockholders, for if the same property was held for the same uses and taxed by the same rule, in the hands of individuals, as moneyed capital, it would be subject to precisely the same deductions; in addition to which, the individual would be entitled to make a further deduction of any debts he might owe. Upon these grounds, therefore, we are of opinion that this mode of taxing trust companies does not create the inequality which the appellant alleges.

In the case of savings banks, we assume that neither the bank itself nor the individual depositor is taxed on account of the deposits. The language of the statute (sec. 4, chap. 456, Laws 1857) is as follows: "Deposits in any banks for savings, which are due to the depositors, * * * shall not be liable to taxation, other than the real estate and stocks which may be owned by such bank or company, and which are now liable to taxation under the laws of this State."

According to the stipulation in this case, the deposits in such banks amount to $437,107,501, with an accumulated surplus of $68,669,001. It cannot be denied that these deposits constitute moneyed capital in the hands of individuals within the terms of any definition which can be given to that phrase; but we are equally clear that they are not within the meaning of the Act of Congress in such a sense as to require that, if they are exempted from taxation, shares of stock in national banks must thereby also be exempted from taxation. No one can suppose for a moment that savings banks come into any possible competition with national banks of the United States. They are what their name indicates, banks of deposit for the accumulation of small savings belonging to the industrious and thrifty. To promote their growth and progress is the obvious interest and manifest policy of the State. Their multiplication cannot in any sense injuriously affect any legitimate enterprise in the community. We have already seen that by previous decisions of this court it has been declared that "it could not have been the intention of Congress to exempt bank shares from taxation because some moneyed capital was exempt"—Hepburn v. School Directors, 23 Wall. 480 [supra]—and that "the Act of Congress was not intended to curtail the state power on the subject of taxation. It simply required that capital invested in national banks should not be taxed at a greater rate than like property similarly invested. It was not intended to cut off the power to exempt particular kinds of property, if the Legislature chose to do so." Adams v. Nashville, 95 U. S. 19 [24: 369]. The only limitation, upon deliberate reflection, we now think it necessary to add, is that these exemptions should be founded upon just reason, and not operate as an unfriendly discrimination against investments in national bank shares. However large, therefore, may be the amount of moneyed capital in the hands of individuals, in the shape of deposits in savings banks as now organized, which the policy of the State exempts from taxation for its own purposes, that exemption cannot affect the rule for the taxation of shares in national banks, provided they are taxed at a rate not greater than other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens otherwise subject to taxation.

It is further objected, on similar grounds, to the validity of the assessment complained of in this case, that municipal bonds of the City of New York, to the amount of $13,467,000, are [162] also exempted from taxation. The amount of the exemption in this case is comparatively small, looking at the whole amount of personal property and credits which are the subjects of taxation; not large enough, we think, to make a material difference in the rate assessed upon national bank shares; but, independently of that consideration, we think the exemption is immaterial. Bonds issued by the State of New York, or under its authority by its public municipal bodies, are means for carrying on the work of the government, and are not taxable even by the United States, and it is not a part of the policy of the government which issues them to subject them to taxation for its own purposes. Such securities undoubtedly represent moneyed capital, but as from their nature they are not ordinarily the subjects of taxation, they are not within the reason of the rule established by Congress for the taxation of national bank shares.

The same considerations apply to what is called an exemption from taxation of shares of stock of corporations created by other States and owned by citizens of New York, which it is agreed amount to at least the sum of $250,000,000. It is not pretended, however, that this exemption is based upon the mere will of the Legislature of the State. The courts of New York hold that they are not the proper subjects of taxation in the State of New York, because they have no situs within its territory for that purpose. Hoyt v. Commissioners of Taxes, 23 N. Y. 224; People v. Commissioners, 4 Hun, 595. The objection would be equally good if made to the nontaxation of real estate owned by citizens of New York, but not within its limits. Clearly the property to be taxed under the rule prescribed for the taxation of national bank shares must be property which, according to the law of the State, is the subject of taxation within its jurisdiction.

Upon these grounds, substantially the same as those on which the circuit judge proceeded (28 Fed. Rep. 776), we are of opinion that the appellant is not entitled to the relief prayed for.

The decree of the Circuit Court is, therefore, affirmed.

NATIONAL NEWARK BANKING COMPANY, Appt., [163]
v.
MAYOR AND COMMON COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF NEWARK, AND A. JUDSON CLARK, Receiver of Taxes.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 163-165.)

National banks—state taxation of shares of stock—"other moneyed capital"—exemption of personal property, not similarly situated, immaterial—New Jersey Statute, April 11, 1866.

The exemption from state taxation of personal property, not situated similarly to that invested in national banks, does not entitle national bank shares to similar exemption under section 5219 R. S.

Argued March 14, 15, 1887. Decided April 4, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

See the preceding case of The Mercantile National Bank v. The Mayor, ante, 895.

Messrs. Charles W. Wells and John W. Taylor, for appellant.

Messrs. Joseph Coult and John R. Emery, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity filed by the appellant, a National Bank organized under the Act of Congress, doing business in the City of Newark, New Jersey, the object and prayer of which are to enjoin the collection of taxes assessed upon the individual shareholders therein, on the ground that, according to the laws of New Jersey, under which the assessment has been made, the rate of taxation is greater than that assessed upon the moneyed capital in the hands of the individual citizens of the State. This alleged inequality, it is contended, results from certain exemptions authorized by the laws of New Jersey, whereby a material portion of the moneyed capital in the hands of individuals is freed from taxation.

According to the allegations of the bill, these exemptions consist, 1, of the shares of capital stock held by individuals in all private corporations of the State, "except banking institutions, and except those which by virtue of any contract in their charters or other contracts with this State are expressly exempted from taxation, and except mutual life insurance com- [164] panies specially taxed;" which exemptions, it is charged, amount to the sum of $301,485,000; and 2, of the deposits in savings banks, amounting to the sum of $24,017,916.99.

The 15th section of the Act of April 11, 1866, establishing these exemptions, is as follows (Revision of 1877, p. 1156): "That all private corporations of this State, except banking institutions, and except those which by virtue of any contract in their charters or other contracts with this State are expressly exempted from taxation, and except mutual life insurance companies specially taxed, shall be and are hereby required to be respectively assessed and taxed at the full amount of their capital stock paid in, and accumulated surplus; but any real estate which such corporations may lawfully own in any other State than this State, shall not be liable to be estimated in such accumulated surplus, and the persons holding the capital stock of such corporations shall not be assessed therefor; and such corporations as have no capital stock other than those above excepted, shall be assessed for the full amount of their property and valuable assets, without any deductions for debts and liabilities; but depositors in savings banks, taxed by virtue of this section, shall be exempted from taxation on their personal estate to the amount of their deposits; provided, that premium notes held by life insurance companies shall in no case be considered as future premiums, but shall be included in the valuable assets of said company."

Under the statutory provision for the taxation of bank shares in New Jersey, the stock of every bank, national as well as State, is assessed for taxation in the place where the bank is located to all nonresident stockholders thereof, the taxes assessed on which are payable by the bank itself for their account; resident stockholders being taxed on their shares in the townships or wards in which they respectively reside. The rate of taxation is the same as that upon other personal property held by individuals, and is subject to deduction on account of debts due by the owner.

It is not claimed that the assessments complained of in this case are unequal or illegal, unless made so by the exemptions authorized by the 15th section of the Act of April 11, 1866.

[165] There is no material difference between the legislation of New Jersey on this subject and that of New York, as considered in the case of Mercantile National Bank of the City of New York v. Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of New York, and George W. McLean, Receiver of Taxes, just decided. This case is, therefore, necessarily governed by the decision in that.

The decree of the Circuit Court is accordingly affirmed.

Mr. Justice Bradley and Mr. Justice Blatchford took no part in the decision of this case.

ALBERT GRANT, Appt.,
v.
PHŒNIX MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Bill by the cestui que trust to foreclose equity of redemption in property covered by twenty-six trust deeds, not multifarious—parties—plea—depositions—discretion of court—receiver to preserve property, rents and profits—usury—commissions—evidence.

Upon a bill filed by the cestui que trust to foreclose the equity of redemption of the grantor in property covered by twenty-six trust deeds executed to five different sets of trustees, as to all of whom as defendants the bill was taken pro confesso, it is held: that the bill can be maintained by the cestui que trust, no objection being made by the trustees; that it is not multifarious, it being necessary to adjudicate all the claims in one suit; that the General Term of the court below properly remanded the cause to the Special Term for further proceedings in the taking of the testimony after the reversal of a decree of sale on the report of the auditor, without a trial of the issue raised by the pleadings; that the decree of res judicata was properly overruled by the court below, the complainant having been merely a party defendant to a former bill against the defendant involving parts of the lots in question, and said bill having been dismissed; that a plea is bad where the answer extends to the whole of the matter covered by it; that the court below exercised a proper discretion in admitting certain depositions and in refusing the appellant further time to take depositions in rebuttal; that it is within the discretion of a court of equity, where the debtor is insolvent and the mortgaged property is insufficient security for the debt and there is danger of waste or deterioration, to take charge of the property by means of a receiver to preserve not only the corpus, but the rents and profits, for the satisfaction of the debt; that commissions paid by the complainant to secure the loans, did not make the transactions in question usurious; and that the cross bill filed by the complainant, setting up a certain alleged contract of settlement, is not sustained by the evidence.

Argued March 24, 25, 1887. Decided April 4, 1887.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Affirmed.

See case below, 8 MacArthur, 42 and 220.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Joseph E. McDonald and Henry W. Blair, for appellant.

Messrs. M. F. Morris and W. F. Mattingly, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court: [106]

This is a suit in equity, brought in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, on the 17th of April, 1875, by the Phœnix Mutual Life Insurance Company, a Connecticut corporation, against Albert Grant and others, to enforce certain deeds of trust, twenty-six in number, executed by Grant and his wife to secure sundry sums of money, the plaintiff claiming to be the owner of all the debts secured by the deeds of trust, which cover various lots in square 760, in the City of Washington. The suit applies to lots 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 16, 17 and 18, all of which but lots 16, 17 and 18 had buildings on them when the suit was brought. The total amount of principal moneys alleged in the bill to be due on the debts secured by the deeds of trust is $312,658.14. The trustees in the several deeds of trust, being five different sets of trustees, two in each set, are made parties defendant, as are certain judgment and mechanics' lien creditors of Grant, and purchasers from him. The bill alleges that Grant is insolvent; that the property is very much deteriorating for the want of necessary repairs to the buildings upon it, which Grant is unable or unwilling to make; [107] and that ten of the buildings are unoccupied. The bill prays for the appointment of a receiver to rent and properly care for 12 of the lots; that the net amounts collected by the receiver be paid over to the plaintiff on account of the indebtedness; that the 14 lots covered by the trust deeds may be sold to pay the indebtedness due to the plaintiff; and that the proceeds of the sale be paid to the parties lawfully entitled thereto.

On the 7th of May, 1875, after a hearing, the court made an order appointing a receiver of 10 of the lots, to collect the rents of the rented property, and to lease such as was unrented.

On the 6th of July, 1875, Grant demurred generally to the bill. This demurrer was overruled on the 8th of November, 1875, with leave to answer.

On the 27th of November, 1875, Grant filed an answer denying his indebtedness as to a large part of the amount claimed by the plaintiff, and denying generally the equities of the bill; and with the answer filed four pleas, setting up (1) a want of jurisdiction in the court to decree a sale, on the ground that the only lawful authority to make the sale without the consent of Grant was vested in the several trustees; (2) the nonjoinder of numerous parties named in the plea; (3) the illegality of the indebtedness claimed, because $9,000 of illegal and usurious interest was charged by the plaintiff and paid by Grant on such indebtedness; (4) that all the indebtedness was paid and satisfied before the bringing of the suit.

On the same day, Grant filed a cross bill, making as defendants the parties to the original bill and those named in the second plea, in which he set up that a contract had been made between him and the plaintiff, on the 1st of March, 1873, by the terms of which, among other things, all of his obligations to the plaintiff were to be surrendered to him in consideration of a deed in fee to be made by him to the plaintiff of 11 of the lots. The cross bill prayed for a specific performance of such contract by the plaintiff.

On the 23d of December, 1875, the plaintiff moved to strike out the pleas, and also demurred to the cross bill. On the 15th of March, [108] 1876, the demurrer to the cross bill was sustained, with leave to amend. On the 20th of March, 1876, the plaintiff filed a general replication, joining issue with Grant. On the 6th of May, 1876, the Court in Special Term made an order referring the cause to the auditor of the court to state the account between the plaintiff and Grant, the amount due under the several deeds of trust, the amounts due to the judgment and mechanics' lien creditors referred to in the bill, whether the same are liens upon any of the real estate, the relative priorities of the claims of such creditors and the plaintiff, and the value of the real estate. From this order Grant appealed to the General Term. On the hearing before the auditor he refused to receive evidence on the part of Grant in support of any of the defenses raised by his answer.

On the 19th of June, 1876, the auditor filed his report, in which he reported upon the several matters referred to him, and found the amount due on the several deeds of trust on the real estate the sale of which the bill prayed for, to be $425,848.83, including interest, and stated the value of the 14 lots and of the buildings upon them to be $200,425. Grant filed exceptions to this report, and on the 11th of December, 1876, the court made a decree overruling the exceptions and confirming the report. The decree directed that the 14 lots be sold by trustees named in the decree, unless Grant should by a day specified pay into court for the plaintiff the sum of $407,117.58. In case of a sale, the proceeds were to be brought into court to abide further order. Grant appealed to the General Term from this decree.

On the 28th of March, 1877, a decree was made by the General Term, reversing the decree of the Special Term of December 11, 1876, setting aside the order of reference to the auditor and the proceedings thereunder, and remanding the cause to the Special Term for further proceedings, to commence with the cause as it stood after the filing of the replication and when application for the reference to the auditor was made, with leave to Grant to move to amend his cross bill and to the plaintiff to apply for such order as it might be advised in regard to its replication. The decision of the General Term, reported in 3 MacArthur, 42, considers the objection raised to the juris- [109] diction of the court to decree a sale, on the ground that by the trust deeds the sales were to be made by the trustees, and overrules it. It says: "The present case contains many particular features which seem to render the jurisdiction of the court absolutely indispensable in order that a fair sale should be made, and bidders should know beforehand that they could get a valid title under a decree in which the rights of every person having a claim upon the property had been ascertained and settled From the face of the bill it appears that the property in question has been subdivided into numerous lots. Some of the deeds of trust are liens upon all the lots; others upon some of them only. Payments have been made on account of some of the claims, and none upon others. The aggregate liens exceed the value of the property, and the owner is apparently insolvent. Purchasers from Grant subsequent to the liens are parties to the bill, and in justice to them the securities should be marshaled. The parties in interest are numerous, and the complication of rights is so great that nothing can settle them except a decree in equity." It goes on to hold that the order of reference to the auditor was erroneous in the then condition of the cause, and that the issues raised by Grant ought to have been first tried in the usual way.

On the 21st of May, 1877, by leave of the Court in Special Term, Grant filed amendments to his cross bill. On the 23d of July, 1877, the plaintiff, by an order of the Special Term, withdrew its replication filed March 20, 1876, and filed a general replication to the answer of Grant, and set down for argument the pleas filed with Grant's answer. On the 11th of September, 1877, Grant filed a supplemental answer, setting up as a bar to the suit a decree made by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in equity, in a suit wherein Aaron Carter, Jr., and others were plaintiffs, and Grant and the Phœnix Mutual Life Insurance Company and others were defendants; and the Company filed an answer to the amended cross bill of Grant.

On the 12th of February, 1878, the Court in [110] General Term, on an application made by Grant at the Special Term and which it ordered to be heard in the first instance by the General Term, made an order vacating the receivership and directing the receiver to deliver to Grant possession of 10 of the lots, and to pay into the registry of the court all moneys in his hands derived from rents and profits.

On the 4th of March, 1878, the Court in Special Term made an order overruling all of the pleas filed by Grant. Grant appealed to the General Term from so much of this order as overruled the second, third and fourth pleas.

On the 2d of July, 1879, the General Term affirmed the order of the Special Term overruling the second, third and fourth pleas, and remanded the cause to the Special Term for further proceedings. On the 22d of November, 1879, the plaintiff filed a replication joining issue with Grant on his supplemental answer to the bill.

Thereafter, testimony was taken by both parties on the issues raised. Testimony was taken at Hartford, Connecticut, on the part of the plaintiff, by commission. Grant moved to suppress certain depositions taken under that commission. The motion was granted as to three depositions and overruled as to the others. Complaint is made by Grant that upon the motion to suppress he was not permitted to read certain affidavits, and that he was denied leave to cross examine orally certain witnesses at Hartford, and that he was denied an extension of time in which to take testimony in rebuttal of evidence taken on the part of the plaintiff at Hartford.

On the 9th of February, 1881, the Court in Special Term made an order referring the cause to the Court in General Term for hearing in the first instance.

On the 2d of March, 1882, the cause having been heard by the General Term on the pleadings and proofs, a decree was made by it declaring that Grant is not entitled to any relief under his cross-bill; that the plaintiff is the holder and owner of the several obligations of Grant secured by the deeds of trust of the real estate the sale of which the bill prays for; that Grant has made default in the payment of his said obligations, on which he is indebted to the plaintiff in large sums of money; that the taxes on the real estate are in arrear for more 111] than $20,000; that the indebtedness of Grant to the plaintiff largely exceeds the value of the real estate; that the plaintiff has no personal security for its debt; and referring the cause to the auditor of the court to state the account between the plaintiff and Grant, the amount due under the deeds of trust, the amounts due to judgment and mechanics' lien creditors, whether the same are liens upon any of the real estate, the relative priorities of the claims of those creditors and the plaintiff, the value of the real estate, the amount of taxes in arrear, and the particulars of any sales for taxes. The decree also appoints a receiver in the cause, to take possession of 12 of the lots and lease them, and enjoins Grant from interfering with the receiver in his possession and control of the property.

The reference was had before the auditor, and on the first of May, 1882, he filed his report, finding that there was due on that date from Grant to the plaintiff on the indebtedness secured by the trust deeds $285,202.09 of principal, and $225,117.98 of interest, making a total of $510,320.07. The report also showed that the amount of taxes and interest thereon, in arrear, upon the real estate, was $48,755.05, and that the value of the 14 lots and the improvements upon them was $137,000. On the 5th of March, 1883, Grant filed exceptions to the auditor's report. The case was brought to a further hearing in the General Term, on its interlocutory decree of March 2, 1882, and on the report of the auditor, and on the exceptions of Grant thereto; and on the 16th of June, 1883, it made a final decree overruling the exceptions, confirming the report, and dismissing the cross-bill of Grant, and decreeing that unless Grant should, by a day specified, pay to the complainant the sum of $510,320.07 with interest on $285,202.09 from May 1, 1882, and the costs of the suit, the 14 lots should be sold by a trustee appointed by the decree, and the proceeds of the sale should be brought into court to abide further order. From that decree Grant has appealed to this court.

The first assignment of error is that the court erred in overruling the demurrer of Grant. The bill seeks to foreclose the equity of redemption of Grant in the property covered by twenty-six trust deeds executed to five different [112] sets of trustees, the plaintiff being the cestui que trust in all of them, either originally or by purchase. Some of these deeds cover only one lot, others embrace two or more lots; and there is but one of them which embraces all of the property. All of the trustees are made defendants, and the bill has been duly taken pro confesso as to all of them. As to Gallaudet and Paine, trustees in twenty-two of the twenty-six deeds, the bill alleges that they have declined to execute their trusts. The bill also sets forth a number of judgments and mechanics' liens held by parties who are made defendants, none of the mechanics' liens covering the whole property, and a number of purchases of lots from Grant. The objection made is that the bill does not show a right in the plaintiff to maintain the suit; that each trust deed vests in its trustees a legal title to the property covered by it, with power to sell; that the interest of the cestui que trust is represented by the trustees, who must enforce the trust; and that unless the bill shows a failure on their part to do so, through incapacity or otherwise, the cestui que trust has no standing in court in its own right. The bill alleges that in twelve of the deeds of trust executed January 1, 1872, to Gallaudet and Paine as trustees, the length of notice of the time and place of sale by advertisement is left blank; that this would prevent the trustees from executing such power of sale; but that in a court of equity the deeds would be considered as mortgages. It is urged on the part of Grant that this defective power of sale renders it the more necessary that the trustees, rather than the cestui que trust, should act in either seeking a correction of the defect or in enforcing the trust. But we think there is nothing in the objection thus raised. The case is one clearly of equity cognizance, for the reasons above set forth and those contained in the opinion of the General Term, above quoted. No objection is made on the part of any of the trustees to the maintenance of the suit. The bill is taken as confessed as to all of them, and there is no possible prejudice to the defendant

Grant, in the bringing of the bill in its actual shape by the cestui que trust

[113] Nor is the bill open to the objection that it is multifarious. The fact that one of the deeds of trust covers the entire property, and that some of the creditors of Grant who were made defendants have liens upon various portions of that property, makes it eminently proper, and in deed indispensable, that a clear title is to be given by a sale, to adjudicate all the claims in one suit.

The second assignment of error is that the General Term erred in its decree of March 28, 1877, in remanding the cause to the Special Term for further proceedings, after it had reversed the decree of the Special Term of December 11, 1876, and especially in then authorizing the plaintiff to apply to the Special Term for such order as it might be advised in regard to its replication. The ground taken is that as, at the time of the hearing which resulted in the decree of the Special Term of December 11, 1876, no testimony had been taken upon any of the issues raised by the pleadings, and as the plaintiff had gone to hearing in that state of the case, and had obtained a decree of sale in the Special Term, that decree was a final decree in its favor on the merits; and that, on the hearing in the General Term, on the appeal of Grant, upon the same record, the General Term, finding the decree of the Special Term to have been erroneous, was bound to enter a decree on the merits in favor of Grant, reversing the decree of the Special Term and dismissing the bill. But we are of opinion that the General Term had power to make its decree of the 28th of March, 1877. The error of the Special Term was in making a decree of sale on the report of the auditor, without a trial of the issues raised by the pleadings. For that error its decree was reversed, and it was proper for the General Term to remand the cause to the Special Term for further proceedings in the taking of testimony on the issues, and with permission to the parties to apply in the Special Term for leave to amend their pleadings. This was, within section 772 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia, a modification of the decree of the Special Term, on an appeal involving the merits of the action. The decree of the General Term reversed that of the Special Term and vacated the order of reference to the [114] auditor, and all proceedings thereunder, and the further directions in the decree of the General Term were but modifications of the decree of the Special Term.

The third assignment of error is that the court erred in not sustaining Grant's defense of res adjudicata, as set up in his supplemental answer of September 11, 1877. There is attached to that answer a transcript of the record in the suit of Carter and others against Grant and others. The bill in that case was filed on the 30th of October, 1872, and was brought by three judgment creditors of Grant, on their own behalf and that of all others similarly situated, who should become parties. The defendants in it were Grant and his wife, the Phœnix Mutual Life Insurance Company, the trustees in the various trust deeds sought to be enforced by that Company, and various creditors of Grant. It set forth the existence of the various deeds of trust mentioned in the bill in this suit, and prayed for the sale of 12 of the lots covered by those deeds of trust, and that the proceeds of the sale, after satisfying all valid prior liens upon the lots, be applied to the payment of the complainants' judgments. An amended and supplemental bill having been filed in the Carter suit, the Phœnix Mutual Life Insurance Company filed an answer, on the 12th of June, 1874, setting up that Grant is indebted to it in the full amount called for by the several deeds of trust held by it; that the amount of said indebtedness is equal to the value of the property; and that it is willing that the property should be sold under the decree of the court and all equities adjusted on the distribution of the fund, claiming, at the same time, that the judgment creditors have no standing in court without having first offered to redeem the incumbrances on the property which are prior in date to the judgments. After a decree by the Special Term in favor of the plaintiffs in the Carter suit, directing a sale of 12 of the lots free from all liens, and that the proceeds be brought into court, and that all equities between the parties to the cause be reserved for consideration on the distribution of the fund, the General Term, on an appeal to it by Grant from the decree, reversed it on the 6th of March, 1875, and dismissed the bill.

We are of opinion that there is nothing in the record of the Carter suit, or in the above [115] recited proceedings therein, or in any other proceedings therein, which operates to sustain the defense of res adjudicata. The Phœnix Company was a defendant, and merely a defendant, in the Carter suit, subject to the decree which might be made therein, setting up and maintaining its claims, and expressing its willingness that the property in question should be sold and the equities adjusted on the distribution of the proceeds of sale. The plaintiff's bill being dismissed out of court, there is nothing which can operate as a bar to the bill in the present suit.

The fourth assignment of error is that the court erred in overruling the second, third and fourth pleas to the bill. The ground on which the General Term affirmed the order of the Special Term overruling the pleas is stated in the opinion of the General Term, delivered by Mr. Justice Cox (McArthur & Mackey, 117) to have been, that the second, third and fourth pleas, to which alone the appeal related, raised defenses that were covered by the answer of Grant. That answer distinctly sets up the defense of usury, covered by the third plea, and the defense of payment, covered by the fourth plea. The second plea, relating to the want of proper parties, was overruled on the ground that the necessity of making the omitted persons parties was not apparent. We concur in the disposition made, for the reasons thus stated, of these pleas. The defendant has had, under his answer, the benefit of the defenses of usury and payment set up in the third and fourth pleas; and the rule that no plea is to be held bad only because the answer may extend to some part of the same matter as may be covered by the plea, is not applicable where the answer extends to the whole of the matter covered by the plea

The fifth assignment of error complains that the court overruled the motion of Grant to suppress certain depositions taken by the plaintiff at Hartford, when those depositions had been taken after the time limited for the taking of depositions by the plaintiff, and the witnesses had refused to answer certain cross interrogatories propounded by Grant, and for other irregularities appearing on the motion to suppress the depositions; and the sixth assignment of error complains that the court erred in refusing to allow Grant further time to take depositions in rebuttal of the depositions on the part of the plaintiff. We are unable to see that the court did not exercise a proper discretion in its action in the matters thus complained of. [116]

The seventh assignment of error is that the court took the property in controversy out of the possession of Grant by the appointment of a receiver before a sale, and thus deprived him of the use of the property and of its rents and profits; and that it erred in the final decree, in finding the equities of the case in favor of the plaintiff and against Grant, and in dismissing the cross bill of Grant, and ordering a sale of the property.

The original order for the appointment of a receiver was made on the 7th of May, 1875. It put into the possession of the receiver ten of the lots, with power to collect the rents of such of them as had been rented and to lease the others. After a lapse of thirty-three months, and on the 12th of February, 1878, the General Term, in which a motion to discharge the receiver was heard in the first instance by order of the Special Term, made an order vacating the receivership. The opinion of the General Term in this matter, reported in 8 MacArthur, 220, shows that the ground taken by the majority of the five judges (two of them dissenting from the decision), in discharging the receivership, was, that it had failed to accomplish its purpose, and that the property was going to destruction without yielding a revenue sufficient to pay the ordinary taxes. The receivership was renewed by the decree of the General Term of March 2, 1882, establishing the rights of the plaintiff and ordering a sale of the twelve lots. The defendant contends that the court had no power, before a sale, to appoint a receiver of the property involved in the litigation, and thus deprive him of its use and of its rents and profits, on the ground that the trust deeds do not embrace the rents and profits of the property. But we are of opinion that the original appointment of a receiver, and the appointment of one made by the decree of the General Term, of March 2, 1882, were proper, and were a reasonable exercise of the discretion of the court, within the principle stated by this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Bradley, in Omaha Hotel Co. v. Kountze, 107 U. S. 378, 395 [27:609, 616], in these words: "Courts of equity always have the power, where the debtor is insolvent, and the mortgaged property is an insufficient security for the debt, and there is good cause to believe that it will be wasted or deteriorated in the hands of the mortgagor, as by cutting of timber, suffering dilapidation, etc., to take charge of the property by means of a receiver, and preserve not only the corpus, but the rents and profits, for the satisfaction of the debt." The circumstances which, within this rule, justified the exercise of the discretion of the court in appointing a receiver originally, existed in greater force when the receiver was appointed by the decree of March 2, 1882. A point is made that, as the appointment of the receiver made by the interlocutory decree of March 2, 1882, was not expressly continued by the final decree of June 16, 1883, it was superseded; but there is no force in this suggestion. [117]

In the final decree the court found to be due the whole debt shown on the face of the trust deed of August 26, 1871, to Davis and Downman, trustees, covering fourteen lots, to secure $40,000 due to one Fletcher, and also the whole debt shown on the face of the twelve trust deeds of January 1, 1882, to Gallaudet and Paine, to secure in the aggregate to the plaintiff $81,000. It is claimed by Grant that the trust deed to Davis and Downman, and the several trust deeds to Gallaudet and Paine, were executed to secure loans from the plaintiff; that Fletcher was the agent of the plaintiff in the Davis and Downman trust deed; and that the trust deeds of January 1, 1872, to Gallaudet and Paine, for $81,000, provided for and in effect paid the $40,000 Fletcher indebtedness secured by the Davis and Downman trust deed. We have examined the evidence on this point, and are of opinion that the contention of Grant is not sustained by it. It is not profitable to discuss it.

It is also contended by Grant that the loans received by him from the plaintiff were upon usurious interest to the amount of $9,000, and that thereby the entire interest decreed was forfeited. But we are of opinion that the evidence shows that the commissions paid by Grant upon the loans (in which the usury is alleged to have consisted), were not paid to the plaintiff. The plaintiff made no contract for usurious interest, nor did it take any. Call v. Palmer, 116 U. S. 98 [29: 559]. [118]

The gravamen of the cross bill of Grant is that his debt to the plaintiff was extinguished by reason of a contract of sale entered into by him with it, by which, in consideration of the advances it had made to him, and of the amount due from him to it on the several trust deeds, and certain other considerations, he agreed to convey to it eleven of the lots involved in this litigation. It is sufficient to say that the proofs do not sustain the existence of any such contract. No such contract was ever executed in writing, none was even in part performed by either of the parties, and letters which passed between them subsequently to March 1, 1878 (the alleged date of the contract), show that no such contract was understood by them to exist.

Other minor considerations are urged in the briefs of the appellant, which we have considered, but which it is not deemed important to discuss at length.

We see no error in the final decree of the Court below, and it is affirmed.

ALBERT GRANT ET AL., Appts., [118]
v.
PHŒNIX MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 118-121.)

Foreclosure—receiver—application to the court for instructions—jurisdiction of the Special Term, Sup. Ct. of D. C.—it may preserve property after appeal to this court and allowance of a supersedeas*—interlocutory order—appeal from, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.*

1. A receiver appointed by a court of equity, pending foreclosure proceedings, to preserve the corpus of the mortgaged property and the rents and profits arising therefrom for the satisfaction of the debt, may apply to the court for directions as to the expenditure of funds in his hands.

2. An order in such proceedings by the Special Term of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, referring the cause to the General Term for hearing in the first instance, did not deprive the court in Special Term of its jurisdiction to act in the matter of an application of the receiver for authority to make certain repairs on the property under his care. Nor did the appeal from the final decree of the court below, although perfected by a supersedeas, deprive that court of its power to act upon such application of the receiver, its order being strictly confined to the preservation of the property in litigation.

3. An order by the court below in General Term, remanding to the Special Term for hearing in the first instance an application of the receiver for an order on the occupant of one of the houses in question to attorn and pay rent to him, is an interlocutory order from which no appeal lies to this court.

Argued March 25, 1887. Decided April 4, 1887.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court. Case below, 3 McArthur, 42 and 220.

Messrs. Joseph E. McDonald and Henry W. Blair, in person, for appellants.

Messrs. M. P. Morris and W. F. Mattingly, for appellee.

[119] Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

After the making of the final decree of June 16, 1883, by the General Term of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in the case of the Phœnix Mutual Life Insurance Company against Albert Grant and others, the appeal from which decree (taken by Grant) has just been decided, the receiver appointed by the interlocutory decree of March 2, 1882, obtained from the court in Special Term, on the 8th of January, 1886, an order, on notice to Grant, authorizing the receiver to make such necessary repairs to the houses on the lots involved in the litigation as in his judgment are essential to the preservation of the property and to its occupation by tenants, with due regard to economy, and, among other repairs, to put in proper working condition the machinery and apparatus used in supplying the houses with water. Grant appealed to the General Term from this order, and on the 5th of April, 1886, it was affirmed. Grant has appealed from this order of affirmance to this court.

On the 11th of October, 1884, the receiver appointed by the interlocutory decree of the General Term, of March 2, 1882, applied by petition to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in Special Term, for an order requiring Henry W. Blair, not a party to the cause, but who was in the possession and occupation of the house on one of the lots covered by the decree, to attorn and pay rent to the receiver. On a hearing, on notice to Blair and [120] on his appearance, the Special Term directed the application to be heard in the first instance by the General Term; and the General Term, on the 5th of April, 1886, made an order remanding the matter to the court in Special Term, for reference by it to the auditor of the the court, with leave to Blair to show by proof the time when, and the terms and conditions under which, he entered into possession of the property in question, under Grant, the amount of money paid by him to Grant, for what purpose it was paid, and whether such money, or any part thereof, and how much, was expended by Grant in betterments upon any of the property in the custody of the receiver, with leave to the plaintiff, and to the receiver also, to introduce pertinent testimony before the auditor, the auditor to ascertain all facts material to the subject matter of the reference, and report the same, with his conclusions, to the court in Special Term, for its action. From this order Blair and Grant have appealed to this court. The appellants contend, on these two appeals: (1) that the receiver, not being a party to the cause, has no independent standing in court and cannot institute any proceeding on his own motion; (2) that the Special Term of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia has not, since its order made on the 9th of February, 1881, referring the cause to the court in General Term for hearing in the first instance, had any jurisdiction of the suit; (3) that the General Term has had no jurisdiction of the suit since the perfecting of the appeal to this court from the final decree of June 16, 1883.

We are of opinion that a receiver such as the one in this case, in charge of property such as that in this case, has a right to apply to the court for directions in regard to the expenditure of funds in his hands as receiver.

In regard to the jurisdiction of the Special Term since the order of the 9th of February, 1881, we are of opinion that the making of that order did not deprive the court in Special Term of its jurisdiction to act in the matter covered by the order of the 8th of January, 1886. Besides, the General Term, in its interlocutory decree of March 2, 1882, granted leave "to the receiver to [121] apply to the court, or this court in Special Term, for such instructions and orders as may be proper."

We are also of opinion that the appeal to this court from the final decree of June 16, 1883, even though perfected with a supersedeas, did not deprive the court below of its power to adjudicate upon such a matter as that involved in the order of January 8, 1886. There is nothing in this view inconsistent with the general rule that an appeal suspends the power of the court below to proceed further in the cause, by executing the decree. The order of January 8, 1886, was strictly confined to the preservation of the property in litigation.

As to the order of the General Term of April 5, 1886, in the Blair matter, it was clearly merely an interlocutory order, and not a final one, in reference to the matter to which it relates, as it merely directed proceedings in the court in Special Term in reference to the application made in regard to Blair, with a view to a decision upon the application.

The order affirming the order of January 8, 1886, is affirmed; and the appeal from the order of April 5, 1886, in regard to Blair, is dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

CITY OF ABERDEEN, IN THE COUNTY OF MONROE AND STATE OF MISSISSIPPI.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 172-179.)

Municipal bonds—amendment of charter of City of Aberdeen, Mississippi—construction of—issue of bonds under—curative Act—Constitution of 1869—estoppel.

1. The amendment of 1858 to the charter of the City of Aberdeen, Mississippi, did not authorize the city authorities to make a subscription to the stock of a railroad company, requiring a levy of a tax for its payment, without the approval of such tax by a majority of the legal voters of the City.

2. The recital of matter of law in the bonds does not estop the City from denying that they were lawfully issued.

3. The curative Act of 1872 is inoperative as to the bonds in question, the Constitution of 1869 having withdrawn from the Legislature the power to create a new liability without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters of the City.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Mississippi. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Calvin Perkins and Craft & Cooper, for plaintiffs in error:

It will not be denied that the Act of 1858 gave full power to subscribe for the stock. If it required a vote to complete the contract (which we do not admit), this question cannot be raised here. The recitals in the face of the bonds estop the defendant from raising the question. The law, under which the power to issue the bonds is claimed, is styled "An Act to Amend the Charter of the City of Aberdeen;" and therefore the recital that they are issued under and pursuant to the charter is a direct reference to the Act of 1858.

Messrs. Baxter McFarland and E. O. Sykes, for defendant in error.

This is a suit brought against the City of Aberdeen, on the 14th of September, 1882, to recover the interest from May 1, 1874, to May 1, 1882, on one hundred fifty-six bonds of the City issued to the Memphis, Holly Springs, Okolona and Selma Railroad Company, under date of April 26, 1870. The alleged authority for the issue of the bonds is an amendment to the charter of the City in November, 1858, as follows:

[173] "Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, That the mayor and selectmen of the City of Aberdeen be, and they are hereby, empowered to contract with the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad Company, or with any other railroad company, and to subscribe in the name, and for the use of the City of Aberdeen as many shares of the capital stock of said company, and upon such terms and conditions as they may stipulate and agree upon, as they shall deem expedient, not exceeding in amount the sum of $100,000.

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That the mayor and selectmen of said City of Aberdeen are hereby empowered to levy and collect a tax on all the property within the corporate limits of said City, subject at the time to state or county tax, and upon the annual gross incomes of all persons or corporations residing or doing business in the corporate limits of said City, to be applied to the payment of the aforesaid subscription of stock as provided in the first section of this Act: Provided, That before such tax shall be levied the same shall be approved by a majority of the legal voters of said

City to be ascertained by an election held as other elections in said City.

"Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That the said tax shall be levied and collected as other taxes of said City, and the tax collector is hereby required to execute a bond, with good security, to be approved by the said mayor and selectmen conditioned for faithful performance of his duties as such collector, and that he will pay over the moneys collected, as directed by the said mayor and selectmen. And such tax collector shall receive for his services one per centum on the amount collected, and no more.

"Sec. 4. Be it further enacted, That the gross amount of the annual income of each and every person and corporation residing or doing business within the corporate limits of said city, shall be ascertained by the said tax collector, who for such purposes, is authorized and required to administer an oath to each person, or his agent, or the proper officer of a corporation, as (to) the amount of his, her or their annual income; and any person willfully swearing falsely as to the amount of such income, shall [174] be deemed guilty of perjury and upon conviction thereof shall be punished as in other cases of perjury.

"Sec. 5. Be it further enacted, That this Act shall take effect from and after its passage."

On the 26th of April, 1870, the mayor and selectmen of the City passed the following ordinance.

"Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the Mayor and Selectmen of the City of Aberdeen, in Council assembled, That the City of Aberdeen do hereby subscribe to the capital stock of the Memphis, Holly Springs, Okolona and Selma R. R. Company the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, to be paid in bonds of the said City of Aberdeen, each of the denomination of five hundred dollars ($500), maturing twenty years from the first day of May, A. D. 1870, bearing 8 per cent interest per annum, payable semi annually on the first days of May and November of each year; said bonds to be signed by the mayor of the City of Aberdeen and countersigned by the treasurer thereof, with the corporate seal of said City affixed.

"Sec. 2. Be it further ordained, That the bonds issued in pursuance of section first of this ordinance have interest coupons attached, signed by the treasurer of said City of Aberdeen, or with his signature lithographed thereto.

"Sec. 3. Be it further ordained, That the form of the bonds of the City of Okolona issued to said railroad company be adopted as the form of the bonds issued to said railroad company by the City of Aberdeen, issued in pursuance of the foregoing ordinances, and that the city attorney be instructed to prepare immediately a form for said bonds and have the same lithographed.

"Sec. 4. Be it further ordained, That this subscription is upon condition that said Memphis, Holly Springs, Okolona and Selma Railroad shall pass through the City of Aberdeen, Mississippi, and the amount of said subscription be expended in constructing said railroad in and through the County of Monroe, in said State.

"Sec. 5. Be it further ordained, That as soon [175] as said bonds are lithographed and signed, as herein directed, the mayor of said City shall hand the same over to the Memphis, Holly Springs, Okolona and Selma Railroad Company, and receive therefore the certificate of stock of said company."

Pursuant to this ordinance the stock was subscribed and bonds issued. The bonds were in the usual form of negotiable coupon bonds, and contained the following recital:

"This bond is issued under and pursuant to the Constitution and laws of the State of Mississippi, the charter of the City of Aberdeen, and ordinances passed by the mayor and selectmen of the City of Aberdeen on the 26th of April, A. D. 1870."

The declaration states, in substance, the agreement for a subscription, as set forth in the ordinance, to be paid in bonds; the issue of bonds in accordance with this agreement; the purchase by the plaintiffs in March, 1874, of those the interest upon which is sued for, except that the "Seven coupons first maturing had at the time of such purchase been detached and paid and were not purchased," and that none of the coupons for interest had been paid since. There is no averment that the levy of a tax to pay the subscription had ever been approved by the legal voters of the City.

A demurrer to the declaration was sustained by the court below, and a judgment rendered thereon in favor of the City. To reverse that judgment this writ of error was brought.

In our opinion, upon the facts stated in the declaration, the City had no authority to issue the bonds. The amendment of the charter, taken as a whole, shows clearly that the Legislature did not intend to allow the City authorities to make a subscription which would bind the taxpayers for its payment by the levy of a tax, until the legal voters had approved of such a tax by a majority vote at an election held as other elections were held. As was said in Wells v. Supervisors, 102 U. S. 630 [26:124], the policy of Mississippi, "from its earliest history seems to have been to require municipal organizations to meet their current liabilities by current taxation; and in Hawkins v. Carroll County, 50 Miss. 762, it was expressly declared that 'The grant of power to such a body of an extraordinary character, such as is not embraced in the general scope of its duties, must be strictly construed.'" In the present case the mayor and selectmen had power to contract [176] with the railroad company and to subscribe to its stock on "such terms and conditions as they may stipulate and agree upon;" but there was no express authority to borrow money to meet the payment nor to issue bonds. The authority to agree on "terms and conditions" does not necessarily imply such a power. It more naturally refers to stipulations about the location of the road and the expenditure of the money subscribed, of the general character of those which were actually made part of this subscription; namely, that the road should pass through Aberdeen, and that the amount of the subscription should be expended in building it in Monroe County. It could give no power to bind the City to levy a tax to pay the subscription before the tax was voted, because section 2 expressly declares that there shall be no tax without a vote. If voted, the city authorities might probably bind the City for its levy and collection. But if not voted, there was no power to bind the taxpayers in any form for its levy, and that would be the legal effect of a valid negotiable coupon bond given in payment of the subscription, if found in the hands of a bona fide holder for value before maturity. If payment could be made without a tax, the mayor and selectmen might subscribe to any extent they deemed expedient. But if the subscription was in any event to be paid by a tax, the tax must be voted before any obligation for its payment could be incurred.

But it is insisted that the City is estopped by the recital in the bonds from denying that they were lawfully issued. The recital is in effect that they were issued "under and pursuant" to law, the charter of the City, and the ordinance of April 26, 1870. As has been seen, neither the charter nor any other law of the State conferred in express terms power on the City to issue these bonds under any condition of facts. The ordinance of the mayor and selectmen directing their issue is not of itself enough. Legislative authority, express or implied, to pass the ordinance must be shown. The recital, therefore, in its present form, is of matter of law only, because it implies the existence of no special facts affecting the case, except the issue of the bonds under the ordinance to pay the [177] subscription to the stock without any vote of the electors to be taxed therefor. It is in effect nothing more than a recital that bonds issued under such circumstances were "under and pursuant" to law and the charter of the City. Such a recital does not estop the City from asserting the contrary. To hold otherwise would be to invest a municipal corporation with full legislative power and make it superior to the laws by which it was created. Dixon County v. Field, 111 U. S. 92 [28: 368].

It is next contended that the bonds were legalized by section 4 of a curative Act of the Legislature of Mississippi, adopted in 1872 (Acts of 1872, p. 314), which is as follows:

"Be it further enacted, That all subscriptions to the capital stock of the Selma, Marion and Memphis Railroad Company, made by any county, city or town in the State, which were not made in violation of the Constitution of this State, are hereby legalized, ratified and confirmed."

Prior to the passage of this Act the name of the Memphis, Holly Springs, Okolona and Selma Railroad Company had been changed by statute to the Selma, Marion and Memphis Railroad Company.

Before the subscription was actually made by the City a new Constitution of Mississippi went into effect, known as the Constitution of 1869, article XII, section 14 of which is as follows:

"The Legislature shall not authorize any county, city, or town to become a stockholder, or loan its credit to any company, association or corporation, unless two thirds of the qualified voters of such county, city, or town, at a special election, or regular election, to be held therein, assent thereto."

In Sykes v. Mayor etc. of Columbus, 55 Miss. 115, it was decided at October Term, 1877, in reference to this same curative Act, that it did not and could not legalize bonds issued before the adoption of the new Constitution that would not be valid if issued after. In the opinion, which was delivered by Chief Justice Simrall, it was said, p. 149: "The Act of 1872 is not relied on to waive mere irregularities in the execution of the power—but as conferring power by retrospective operation. If the bonds are obligatory on the City of Columbus, they [178] become so for the first time by virtue of this statute. The Legislature of 1872 could not by relation put itself back to 1869, and exercise power not denied or restricted by the Constitution of 1832. The measure of its power was the Constitution of December, 1869, and it could not ratify an Act previously done, if at the date it professed to do so it could not confer power in the first instance. It could authorize a municipal loan conditionally. In order to ratify and legalize a loan previously made, it was bound by the constitutional limitation of its power." The doctrine of this case was fully assented to by this court in Grenada County Supervisors v. Brogden, 112 U. S. 271 [28: 707].

The bonds in the present case, when issued, were unauthorized and void, so that the only question is whether the curative statute has made them good. The objection to them is not that they were issued irregularly, but that there was no power to issue them at all. They are to be made good, if at all, not by waiving irregularities in the execution of an old power, but by the creation of a new one. Clearly, therefore, if the Legislature had no constitutional authority to grant the new power, a statute passed for that purpose could not have the effect of validating the old bonds. In Grenada County Supervisors v. Brogden, the validating Act was sustained, because the subscription was voted by the required two thirds majority of voters, and, therefore, the Constitution of 1869 did not stand in the way of what was done. Here, however, there has been no vote at all.

It is said that in Sykes v. Mayor, etc. of Columbus, there was no authority to subscribe at all, and, therefore, that case was different from this. But here there was no power to subscribe for payment in bonds; and in principle the two cases are alike. The question is as to the obligation of the taxpayers to pay the subscription by taxation. Under its original authority the City could not and did not create such an obligation. The Constitution of the State now prevents the creation of any new liability of that character, unless two thirds of the qualified voters of the city have agreed to it. That was [179] not done when the bonds were made, and no provision has been made for getting such an agreement now. The curative Act is consequently inoperative, so far as this subscription is concerned.

Many other questions were discussed in the argument for the plaintiffs in error, but, as they all grow out of the mistaken idea that the original subscription payable in bonds could have been made under the charter as amended in 1858, they need not be specially referred to. Bonds issued without legislative authority cannot be made binding by mere municipal ratification, because there is no more power to ratify than there was to create originally.

The judgment is affirmed.

No counsel appeared for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This record does not show that the circuit court had jurisdiction of the suit, which depended alone on the citizenship of the parties. The petition states that Edmund Menard, the plaintiff, "resides in Randolph County, in the State of Illinois," and that the defendants, of whom Thomas Goggan, the defendant in error, was one, "reside in the City of Galveston," in the State of Texas. There is nothing else from which the citizenship of either party can be inferred, and this is not enough. We have so held at the present term in Continental Ins. Co. v. Rhoads, 119 U. S. 237 [ante, 380], where the authorities are cited; Halsted v. Buster, Id. 341 [ante, 462], and Everhart v. Huntsville College, 120 U. S. 223 [ante, 623]. This judgment must, therefore, be reversed on the authority of those cases; and as the fault rests with the plaintiff in error, whose duty it was when bringing the suit to make the jurisdiction appear, the reversal will be at his costs in this court. Hancock v. Holbrook, 112 U. S. 229 [28: 714]; Halsted v. Buster, supra. If the [254] necessary citizenship actually existed at the time the suit was begun, it will be for the court below to determine, when the case gets back, whether the record shall be amended so as to show that fact, and thus make out the jurisdiction.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, at the costs of the plaintiff in error, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

COVINGTON STOCK YARDS COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
CHARLES W. KEITH AND EDWARD W. WILSON, as KEITH & WILSON.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 248-250.)

Practice—supersedeas.

This court denies a motion for a supersedeas to an entire decree, where the supersedeas granted by the court below was only to a part thereof, as the circuit justice has power, under section 1007, R. S., to grant, in his discretion, a further stay of execution.

[No. 1347.]

Submitted April 4, 1887. Decided April 11, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky.

Motion for supersedeas. Denied.

On December 22, 1886, a decree was rendered against the appellant on an interpleader between it and the appellees and the receiver of the Kentucky Central Railroad Company, denying the validity of a contract between appellant and said railroad company, which undertook to confer on the former, for a term of ten years yet to run, an exclusive right to maintain a live stock depot on the road of the company in Covington, Kentucky. The decree also provided that appellant should refund to appellees $1209.19, collected from them for the use of appellant's facilities during about seven months preceding. An appeal was granted, and bond fixed and duly executed, the supersedeas being limited so as "not to operate as a supersedeas so far as concerns any order, decree or judgment directed to the receiver herein affecting the receipt, delivery, or shipment to or by said Keith & Wilson of live stock on or over the line of said railroad and its connections."

The appellant now moves this court to grant a supersedeas to the entire decree of the court below.

Messrs. J. G. Carlisle and T. F. Hallam, for appellant in support of motion.

No counsel appeared for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court: [250]

The qualified acceptance of the bond given on this appeal shows that the judge who took it considered the security only sufficient for a stay of the execution of that part of the decree appealed from, which was for the payment of money. Under these circumstances the appeal only operates as a supersedeas to that extent. As the appeal was taken within sixty days after the rendition of the decree, Mr. Justice Mathews, the Justice of this court assigned to the Sixth Circuit, has power, under section 1007 of the Revised Statutes, to grant, in his discretion, a further stay of execution, if application to him for that purpose is made.

For this reason the present motion is denied.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case no citation was ever issued, and the defendants in error do not appear. Notice of a writ of error, given in open court at the same term the judgment is rendered, is not the equivalent of the citation required by section 999 of the Revised Statutes. In this respect writs of error differ from appeals taken in open court.

v.
PHILO C. CALHOUN, Trustee, ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 251, 252.)

Railroads—foreclosure of mortgages—intervention of bank.

Upon a petition of intervention filed in a suit for the foreclosure of the mortgages of the Southeastern Railway Company, asking payment from the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property of a debt due from the company to the People's Bank of Belleville for money lent, it is held: that the bank occupies the position of a general creditor only, the evidence not showing any fraud and deception and the misapplication of current income.

[No. 172.]

Submitted March 30, 1887. Decided April 11, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois.

Affirmed.

The case is sufficiently stated by the court.

Mr. Charles Wait Thomas, for appellant.

No counsel appeared for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order dismissing a petition of intervention filed in a suit for the foreclosure of mortgages of the Southeastern Railway Company, asking payment from the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property of a debt of $40,000 and interest, due from the company to the People's Bank of Belleville for money lent. The case as presented here places the right of recovery entirely on the following grounds: 1. That the money was lent with the knowledge and consent of the mortgage trustees to pay mortgage interest, and that it was actually used for that purpose, the earnings at the time being insufficient to meet both interest and expenses; 2. That the company was wholly insolvent when the loan was made, which was unknown to the Bank, but known to the trustees, and for this reason the money [252] ought to be restored to the Bank from the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property; and 3, That the net earnings for the year during which the loan was made were used to pay interest on the mortgage debt and to make permanent and lasting improvements on the mortgaged property, instead of paying current debts.

The evidence shows that when the Bank took the note which is the basis of the present claim, $80,000 of the bonds of the consolidated mortgage, under which, with an earlier mortgage, the decree of foreclosure was had, were pledged by the company as security; and it fails entirely to satisfy us that any part of the money lent was used directly in the payment of mortgage interest. There is no doubt that the company was heavily in debt when the loan was made, and that it was struggling to maintain its credit, so as to float its consolidated bonds which were then on the market for sale. The money lent was put into the general fund in the treasury of the company, and used like the rest to pay debts which were pressing. We are entirely satisfied that the Bank expected to be paid out of the proceeds of the sales of the bonds, and not from the earnings. The current earnings were used, as it was supposed they would be, to make permanent and lasting improvements, buy additional rolling stock, and keep down the interest on the early mortgages, so as to bolster up the credit of the company and make its consolidated bonds marketable. For its ultimate security the Bank relied on the indorsers of the note and the bonds, which were specially pledged for that purpose. There is not a particle of evidence to show any fraud or deception on the part of the trustees; and neither the current income of the receivership nor that of the company has been employed in a way to deprive the Bank of any of its equitable rights. The Bank is, therefore, not entitled to payment out of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property in preference to the bondholders. It occupies the position of a general creditor only. Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 255 [25: 843].

The decree of the Circuit Court dismissing the petition of intervention is affirmed.

HENRY S. BARRON, Plff. in Err., [186]
v.
GEORGE W. BURNSIDE, Sheriff of LINN COUNTY, IOWA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 186-200.)

Federal courts—jurisdiction of, not affected by state legislation—Iowa Act of April 6, 1886, requiring foreign corporations to surrender right to remove causes, invalid.

1. The jurisdiction of the federal courts depends upon and is regulated by the laws of the United States, and it cannot be affected by state legislation.

2. A corporation is a citizen of the State by which it is created and in which its principal place of business is situated, so far as its right to sue and be sued in the federal courts is concerned, and within the clause of the Constitution extending the jurisdiction of said courts to controversies between citizens of different States.

3. The Iowa Act of April 6, 1886, seeking to make the right of foreign corporations to transact business in that State dependent upon their surrender of the right to remove causes to the federal courts, is invalid.

[No. 1335.]

Argued March 18, 21, 1887. Decided April 11, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. W. C. Goudy and J. J. Herrick, for plaintiff in error:

The Statute of 1886, if enforced, will deprive the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company of its property without due process of law.

The franchise to operate a railroad company is property; and to deprive such a company of the right to use its property is, in effect, to deprive the company of the property itself.

Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 2d ed. § 932; Memphis & L. R. R. R. Co. v. Berry, 112 U. S. 619 (28: 841); New Orleans etc. R. R. Co. v. Delamore, 114 U. S. 509 (29: 247).

The right to remove a case coming within the provisions of the Act of Congress is one existing under the Constitution and Laws of the United States, and any Act of a State Legislature which seeks to destroy or impair that right is void.

Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 450 (22: 367); Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. 94 U. S. 543 (24: 152); Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Cary, 28 Ohio, 208.

But it is claimed that the Doyle Case justifies the Act of legislation now in question, and that the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company, being a corporation of another State, could be excluded from the State of Iowa, or that any condition could be imposed upon the right to do business in the State.

There is a difference between the Wisconsin and Iowa Statutes. The one collided with no provision of the Constitution; the other did.

It is said in Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 59 U. S. 18 How. 407 (15: 451), that "A corporation created by Indiana can transact business in Ohio only with the consent, express or implied, of the latter State. This consent may be accompanied by such conditions as Ohio may see fit to impose; and these conditions must be deemed valid and effectual by other States, and by this court, provided they are not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, or inconsistent with those rules of public law which secure the jurisdiction and authority of each State from encroachment by all others, or that principle or maxim of justice which forbids condemnation without opportunity for defense."

The power of the State to exclude a foreign corporation is not denied, that principle having been clearly established by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States with reference to insurance companies; but the power is not an unlimited one. Whenever it collides with the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, the state legislation is void.

If the intention was to prevent the removal of causes from state to federal courts, then the whole Act must be held to be void.

The parts of this statute are so connected and dependent that they cannot be separated so as to hold one part valid and the other part invalid. The true inquiry is as to the intent of the Legislature; and, that being ascertained, the question as to the validity of the Act will be decided.

Messrs. A. J. Baker, Atty-Gen. of Iowa, and J. H. Sweeney, for defendant in error:

A State Legislature possesses no power to prevent those doing business within the territory of the State from resorting to the United States Courts in any or all cases where such right is guaranteed to them by the Constitution of the United States or the laws of Congress enacted in compliance therewith.

But the State may, in the exercise of that absolute sovereignty which resides in it, dictate the terms and conditions under which corporations of other States may come into, or continue to transact business within its jurisdiction, and it "may compel the foreign company to abstain from the federal courts, or cease to do business in the State."

Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. 94 U. S. 542 (24: 152).

This case is decisive of every claim that can be made by the complainants in respect to their inherent or vested right to sue and be sued in the United States Courts. But the complainants say: When we came into the State and purchased our property no such conditions were imposed; this is an additional burden, and the permission to do business in your State when accepted by us became a contract that no such additional burdens would be imposed.

It is hardly necessary to say that this doctrine is not maintained by the adjudicated cases of the States or of this court.

A corporation presupposes a grant of existence and power from a sovereign. The grant of power by a sovereign, by its own inherent force, is operative only within the dominions over which the authority of the sovereign extends. In any other State it must act, if at all, by permission of the sovereign power of such State.

The Act in question does not amount to a regulation of commerce between the States within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. It is not every law which indirectly affects commerce that can be construed to amount to the regulation thereof.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error brought by Henry S. Barron to review a judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa, on a trial on a writ of habeas corpus, remanding him to the custody of George W. Burnside, Sheriff of Linn County, Iowa, by whom he was held under a warrant for his arrest issued by a justice of the peace of Linn County, October 5, 1886, for "the crime of knowingly transacting a portion of the business of the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company within the State of Iowa, when such railway company had no valid permit to do business in the State of Iowa, as provided by chapter 76 of the Laws of the 21st General Assembly of the State of Iowa, approved April 6, 1886, and taking effect September 1, 1886."

The statute in question is entitled "An Act Requiring Foreign Corporations to File Their Articles of Incorporation with the Secretary of State, and Imposing Certain Conditions upon such Corporations Transacting Business in This State." The provisions of the Act are as follows:

"Sec. 1. That hereafter any corporation for pecuniary profit other than for carrying on mercantile or manufacturing business organized under the laws of any other State or of any Territory of the United States or of any foreign country desiring to transact its business, or to continue the transaction of its business, in this State, shall be and hereby is required, on and [187] after September [first] A. D. 1886, to file with the Secretary of State a certified copy of its articles of incorporation duly attested, accompanied by a resolution of its board of directors or stockholders, authorizing the filing thereof, and also authorizing service of process to be made upon any of its officers or agents in this State engaged in transacting its business, and requesting the issuance to such corporation of a permit to transact business in this State. Said application to contain a stipulation that said permit shall be subject to each of the provisions of this Act. And thereupon the Secretary of State shall issue to such corporation a permit in such form as he may prescribe for the general transaction of the business of such corporation. And upon the receipt of such permit such corporation shall be permitted and authorized to conduct and carry on its business in this State; Provided, That nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to prevent any foreign corporations from buying, selling, and otherwise dealing in, notes, bonds, mortgages, and other securities, or from enforcing the collection of the same, in the federal courts, in the same manner, and to the same extent, as is now authorized by law.

"Sec. 2. No foreign corporation which has not in good faith complied with the provisions of this Act, and taken out a permit, shall hereafter be authorized to exercise the power of eminent domain, or exercise any of the rights and privileges conferred upon corporations, until they have so complied herewith and taken out such permit.

"Sec. 3. Any foreign corporation sued or impleaded in any of the courts of this State upon any contract made or executed in this State or to be performed in this State, or for any act or omission, public or private, arising, originating or happening in the State, who shall remove any such cause from such state court into any of the federal courts held or sitting in this State, for the cause that such corporation is a nonresident of this State or a resident of another State than that of the adverse party, or of local prejudice against such corporation, shall thereupon forfeit and render null and void any permit issued or authority granted to such corporation to transact business in this State; such forfeiture to be determined from the rec- [188] ord of removal, and to date from the date of filing of the application on which such removal is effected; and whenever any corporation shall thus forfeit its said permit no new permit shall be issued to it for the space of three months, unless the executive council shall for satisfactory reasons cause it to be issued sooner.

"Sec. 4. Any foreign corporation that shall carry on its business and transact the same on and after September 1, 1886, in the State of Iowa, by its officers, agents, or otherwise, without having complied with this statute, and taken out and having a valid permit, shall forfeit and pay to the State for each and every day in which such business is transacted and carried on, the sum of one hundred dollars ($100), to be recovered by suit in any court having jurisdiction. And any agent, officer or employé who shall knowingly act or transact such business for such corporation when it has no valid permit as provided herein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for each offense shall be fined, not to exceed one hundred dollars ($100), or imprisoned in the county jail not to exceed thirty days, and pay all costs of prosecution.

"Sec. 5. All Acts and parts of Acts inconsistent with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed; Provided, That nothing contained in this Act shall relieve any company, corporation, association or partnership from the performance of any duty or obligation now enjoined upon them or required of them or either of them by the laws now in force."

The information on which the warrant of arrest was issued was as follows:

v.
"Henry Barron. }

"The defendant is accused of the crime of knowingly transacting a portion of the business of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway [189] Company within the State of Iowa, when such railway company has no valid permit to do business in the State of Iowa, as provided in chapter 76 of the Laws of the 21st General Assembly of said State of Iowa, and taking effect September 1, 1886.

"For that the said defendant, on the 5th day of October, 1886, at the City of Cedar Rapids, in the county and State aforesaid, well knowing the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company to be a foreign corporation organized under the laws of Illinois, and not a corporation organized under the laws of Iowa, and well knowing that the said Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company was such foreign corporation for pecuniary profit other than for carrying on mercantile or manufacturing business; to wit, for the operating of a line of railroad, and well knowing that said railway company has failed, neglected and refused to file its articles of incorporation with the Secretary of State of the State of Iowa, and has neglected and refused to request the issuance to such Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company of a permit to transact business in said State of Iowa, and well knowing that said railway company has no permit to do business in said State of Iowa, as required by said chapter 76 of the Laws of Iowa, passed by the 21st General Assembly aforesaid, did knowingly act as a locomotive engineer for the transaction of the business of said Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company within the State of Iowa, by running a locomotive engine, with a passenger train attached thereto, through the Township of Rapids, in the county and State aforesaid, contrary to law and the statute in such case made and provided. J. H. Preston.

"Subscribed and sworn to by J. H. Preston before me, this 5th day of October, A. D. 1896.

Notary Public in and for Linn County, Iowa."

Barron, having been arrested, applied to the Supreme Court of the State for a writ of habeas [190] corpus, by a petition setting forth various facts as showing that his imprisonment was illegal, and praying that his petition might be tried before the supreme court. The writ was issued, a return was made to it by the sheriff, and the case was heard upon an agreed statement of facts, the only material ones, in the view we take of the case, being that the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company was and is an Illinois corporation, operating railroads in Iowa, and claiming to do so under the authority of statutes of that State, and that Barron, "at the time he was arrested, was in the employment of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company, and engaged as an engineer on a locomotive in running a passenger train, which was made up at Chicago, in the State of Illinois, and was destined to Council Bluffs, in Iowa, and that said train was carrying passengers and the United States mails received at different points in the State of Illinois, and destined to points in the State of Iowa and beyond, and also from points in the State of Iowa to other points in the same State," and that he was arrested while he was engaged in controlling the engine on the train while it was running. It was admitted that the company had not complied with the Iowa Statute by taking out the required permit.

On the hearing before the state court it was urged, among other things, that the Statute of Iowa is void as an attempt to interfere with the jurisdiction of the federal courts, as established by the Constitution of the United States and Acts of Congress. The court upheld the validity of the statute.

The statute manifestly applies to the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company, as an Illinois corporation. The first section provides that a foreign corporation, desiring to continue the transaction of its business in Iowa, is required, on and after September 1, 1896, "to file with the Secretary of State a certified copy of its articles of incorporation duly attested, accompanied by a resolution of its board of directors or stockholders, authorizing the filing thereof, and also authorizing service of process to be made upon any of its officers or agents in this State engaged in transacting its business, and requesting the issuance to such corporation of a permit to transact business in this State; said application to contain a stipulation that said permit shall be subject to each of the provisions of this Act; and thereupon the Secretary of State shall issue to such corporation a permit in such form as he may prescribe, for the general transaction of the business of such corporation; and, upon the receipt of such per- [196] mit, such corporation shall be permitted and authorized to conduct and carry on its business in this State."

The initial step required is a resolution authorizing the filing of the copy of the articles of incorporation, and authorizing service of process in the manner specified, and requesting the issue of the permit; the application to be accompanied by a stipulation that the permit shall be subject to each of the provisions of the Act. This proceeding is a unit. The filing of the articles of incorporation and the provision in regard to service of process are to be authorized by the same resolution which requests the issue of the permit; and this request or application is to contain the stipulation above mentioned. These various things are not separable. They are all indissolubly bound up with the application for a permit, which is to be subject to every provision of the Act. The permit cannot be issued unless such a stipulation is given, and the corporation is not to be permitted to carry on its business in the State unless the permit is issued to it and received by it.

Section 3 of the Act provides that if the permit is issued, and the foreign corporation, being thereafter sued in a court of Iowa, upon a contract made or executed in Iowa, or to be performed in Iowa, or for any act or omission, public or private, arising, originating or happening in Iowa, shall remove the suit from the state court into any federal court in Iowa, because the corporation is a nonresident of Iowa, or a resident of a State other than the State of the adverse party, or because of local prejudice against the corporation, that fact shall forfeit the permit and render it void, such forfeiture to be determined from the record of removal, and to date from the filing of the application on which the removal is effected.

Section 4 imposes a penalty of $100 a day on the corporation for carrying on its business in Iowa without having complied with the statute, and having a valid permit, and provides that any agent, officer or employee who shall knowingly act, or transact such business, for the corporation, when it has no valid permit, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for each offense shall be fined not to exceed $100, or be imprisoned in the county jail not to exceed thirty days, and pay all costs of prosecution. [197]

It is apparent that the entire purpose of this statute is to deprive the foreign corporation, in suits such as those mentioned in section 3, of the right conferred upon it by the Constitution and laws of the United States, to remove a suit from the state court into the federal court, either on the ground of diversity of citizenship, or of local prejudice. The statute is not separable into parts. An affirmative provision requiring the filing by a foreign corporation, with the Secretary of State, of a copy of its articles of incorporation, and of an authority for the service of process upon a designated officer or agent in the State, might not be an unreasonable or objectionable requirement, if standing alone; but the manner in which, in this statute, the provisions on those subjects are coupled with the application for the permit and, with the stipulation referred to, shows that the real and only object of the statute, and its substantial provision, is the requirement of the stipulation not to remove the suit into the federal court.

In view of these considerations, the case falls directly within the decision of this court in Home Insurance Co. v. Morse, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 445 [22:365]. In that case, which was twice argued here, a Statute of Wisconsin provided that it should not be lawful for any foreign fire insurance company to transact any business in Wisconsin unless it should first appoint an attorney in that State, on whom process could be served, by filing a written instrument to that effect, containing an agreement that the company would not remove a suit for trial into the federal court. The Home Insurance Company, a New York corporation, filed the appointment of an agent, containing the following clause: "And said company agrees that suits commenced in the State Courts of Wisconsin shall not be removed by the acts of said company into the United States Circuit or Federal Courts." A loss having occurred on a policy issued by the company, it was sued in a court of the State. It filed its petition in proper form for the removal of the suit into the federal court. The state court refused to allow the removal, and, after a trial, gave a judgment for the plaintiff, [198] which was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin. The company brought the case into this court, which held these propositions: First, The agreement made by the company was not one which would bind it, without reference to the statute. Second, The agreement acquired no validity from the statute. The general proposition was maintained, that agreements in advance to oust the courts of jurisdiction conferred by law, are illegal and void, and that, while the right to remove a suit might be waived, or its exercise omitted, in each recurring case, a party could not bind himself in advance, by an agreement which might be specifically enforced, thus to forfeit his rights at all times and on all occasions, whenever the case might be presented.

In regard to the second question, the proposition laid down was that the jurisdiction of the federal courts, under article 3, section 2, of the Constitution, depends upon and is regulated by the laws of the United States; that state legislation cannot confer jurisdiction upon the federal courts, nor limit or restrict the authority given to them by Congress in pursuance of the Constitution; and that a corporation is a citizen of the State by which it is created, and in which its principal place of business is situated, so far as its right to sue and be sued in the federal courts is concerned, and within the clause of the Constitution extending the jurisdiction of the federal courts to controversies between citizens of different States. The conclusions of the court were summed up thus: 1, The Constitution of the United States secures to citizens of another State than that in which suit is brought an absolute right to remove their cases into the federal court, upon compliance with the terms of the removal statute; 2, The Statute of Wisconsin is an obstruction to this right, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and is illegal and void; 3, The agreement of the insurance company derives no support from an unconstitutional statute, and is void, as it would be had no such statute been passed. For these reasons the judgment of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin was reversed, and it was directed that the prayer of the petition for removal should be granted.

The case of Doyle v. Continental Insurance Co. 94 U. S. 535 [24:148], is relied on by the defendant in error. In that case this court said that it had carefully reviewed its decision in Home Insurance Co. v. Morse, and was satisfied with it. In referring to the second conclusion in Insurance Co. v. Morse, above recited; namely, that the Statute of Wisconsin was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and was illegal and void, the court said, in Doyle v. Continental Insurance Co., that it referred to that portion of the statute which required a stipulation not to transfer causes to the courts of the United States. In that case, which arose under the same Statute of Wisconsin, the foreign insurance company had complied with the statute, and had filed an agreement not to remove suits into the federal courts, and had received a license to do business in the State. Afterwards, it removed into the federal court a suit brought against it in a state court of Wisconsin. The state authorities threatening to revoke the license, the company filed a bill in the Circuit Court of the United States, praying for an injunction to restrain the revoking of the license. A temporary injunction was granted. The defendant demurred to the bill, the demurrer was overruled, a decree was entered making the injunction perpetual, and the defendant appealed to this court. This court reversed the decree and dismissed the bill. The point of the decision seems to have been that, as the State had granted the license, its officers would not be restrained by injunction, by a court of the United States, from withdrawing it. All that there is in the case beyond this, and all that is said in the opinion which appears to be in conflict with the adjudication in Insurance Co. v. Morse [supra] must be regarded as not in judgment. [199]

In both of the cases referred to, the foreign corporation had made the agreement not to remove into the federal court suits to be brought against it in the state court. In the present case no such agreement has been made; but the locomotive engineer is arrested for acting as such in the employment of the corporation, because it has refused to stipulate that it will not remove into the federal court suits brought against it in the state court, as a condition of obtaining a permit, and consequently has not [200] obtained such permit. Its right, equally with any individual citizen, to remove into the federal court, under the laws of the United States, such suits as are mentioned in the third section of the Iowa Statute, is too firmly established by the decisions of this court to be questioned at this day; and the State of Iowa might as well pass a statute to deprive an individual citizen of another State of his right to remove such suits.

As the Iowa Statute makes the right to a permit dependent upon the surrender by the foreign corporation of a privilege secured to it by the Constitution and laws of the United States, the statute requiring the permit must be held to be void.

The question as to the right of a State to impose upon a corporation engaged in interstate commerce the duty of obtaining a permit from the State, as a condition of its right to carry on such commerce, is a question which it is not necessary to decide in this case. In all the cases in which this court has considered the subject of the granting by a State to a foreign corporation of its consent to the transaction of business in the State, it has uniformly asserted that no conditions can be imposed by the State which are repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States. Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 59 U. S. 18 How. 404, 407 [15:451, 452]; Ducat v. Chicago, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 410, 415 [19:972, 973]; Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 445, 456 [22: 365, 369]; St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 350, 356 [27: 222, 225]; Phila. Fire Asso. v. New York, 119 U. S. 110, 120 [ante, 342, 345].

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Iowa is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court, with an instruction to enter a judgment discharging the plaintiff in error from custody.

CLEVELAND ROLLING MILL COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
CHARLES D. RHODES AND LIZZIE W. BRADLEY, EXRS. of DAVID C. BRADLEY, Deceased.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 255-264.)

Sales—contract for sale of pig iron to be manufactured—time of shipment, of the essence of the contract—practice—trial without jury.

1. Where a merchant agrees to sell and ship to the buyer a certain number of tons of pig iron at a certain time, both the amount of iron and the time of shipment are essential terms of the agreement. Where under such an agreement the seller ships part of the iron at the time appointed and the rest from time to time afterwards, the buyer is not bound to accept any part of the iron so shipped.

2. In the case presented, it is held: that all the pig iron sold and not shipped before the close of navigation in 1880, was to be made before the opening of navigation in 1881; and that the failure of the seller to have a considerable part of remainder of the iron ready for shipment at the opening of navigation in 1881 justified the buyer in refusing to accept any of the iron shipped in 1881.

3. Where it appears from the facts found by a Circuit Court of the United States, on the trial of a cause without a jury, that its judgment was erroneous, this court may direct such judgment to be entered by that court as its special findings require.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Opinion below, 17 Fed. Rep. 426. Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray.

This was an action brought by Rhodes and Bradley, copartners, and citizens of Chicago in the State of Illinois, against the Cleveland Rolling Mill Company, a corporation of the State of Ohio, upon the following agreement in writing, signed by both parties:

"This agreement, made this sixteenth day of February, A. D. 1880, by and between Rhodes & Bradley, of Chicago, Ills., and the Cleveland Rolling Mill Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, witnesseth: That said Rhodes & Bradley have sold to the said Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. the entire product of fourteen thousand (14,000) tons iron ore, to be manufactured into pig iron with charcoal by the Leland Furnace Co., of Leland, Mich., said furnace to make as nearly all numbers one and two iron as possible, and to be shipped in vessel cargoes as rapidly as possible to the Cleveland Rolling Mill Co., at Cleveland, Ohio, during the season of navigation of 1880. Such portion of the product of said ores, as is made after the close of navigation of 1880, is to be shipped by vessel to Cleveland on the opening of navigation of 1881, or as near the opening as possible; said Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. to have the privilege of ordering the iron, which may be made too late for shipment by lake during the season of 1880, through by rail to Cleveland during the winter of 1880 and 1881, they to pay the additional expense of hauling to railroad and freighting through to Cleveland by rail, over and above what it would cost Rhodes & Bradley to ship by lake on the opening of navigation 1881. [256]

"Said Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. agree to receive said iron as rapidly as shipped, and to pay forty-five dollars ($45) per ton (2,240 lbs.) cash for same delivered on rail or vessel at Cleveland, Ohio. The Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. are to have the option of taking a portion of the iron delivered at Chicago, Ills., at the same price and on the same terms and conditions as stated above for delivery in Cleveland, said Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. to furnish a good and suitable dock at which to unload vessels, either at Cleveland or Chicago, and to pay vessels any demurrage which they may be justly entitled to by reason of delay in furnishing a dock at which they can be discharged.

"The iron ore to be furnished at the Leland Iron Co., out of which said iron is to be manufactured, is as follows:

"6000 tons Cleveland mine.
"5000 tons Norway mine.
"1500 tons Rolling Mill mine.
"1500 tons Stephenson mine.

"And whereas, Rhodes & Bradley's contracts with said mining companies are to the effect that in case of accidents or strikes at said mines, resulting in reduced output of ore, said companies are to have the privilege of reducing the amounts due Rhodes & Bradley, as above stated, in same proportion as other sales, the said Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. agree not to hold Rhodes & Bradley responsible for delivery of pig iron beyond the product of such ores as the mining companies deliver them; also, in case of accidents or strikes at said Leland furnace, resulting in the stoppage of said furnace, then Rhodes & Bradley are not to be held responsible for delivery of pig iron under the con- [257] tract, beyond the responsibility of the Leland Iron Co. to them under the contract between said Leland Iron Co. and Rhodes & Bradley, dated January 14, 1880, which contract, as well as Rhodes & Bradley's contracts with the mining companies, is hereby made a part of this agreement."

Prior to January 14, 1880, the plaintiffs had made agreements in writing with the owners of the four mines for the purchase of the amounts of ore above mentioned, to be delivered by them to the plaintiffs during the season of navigation in 1880. And on January 14, 1880, the plaintiffs made an agreement in writing with the Leland Iron Company, which was the owner and manager of a furnace at Leland in the State of Michigan, by which the plaintiffs agreed to sell to that company the same amounts of those ores respectively, "to be furnished, 1500 tons in May, 1880, navigation permitting, and 2500 tons each month thereafter as nearly as may be, and all to be delivered to vessel before November 1, 1880, and in suitable quantities of each for the mixtures desired by said Rhodes & Bradley;" and also agreed "to purchase the entire product of pig iron of the Leland furnace made from the ores so furnished, at the rate of $40 per ton, cash, delivered over the rail at Chicago, or $40.25, cash, at Cleveland, at the option of said Rhodes & Bradley, they to provide proper docking facilities for prompt unloading of vessels;" and the Leland Iron Company agreed "to manufacture pig iron from said ores as nearly as practicable of the grades which said Rhodes & Bradley shall desire, and to ship same in cargo lots as rapidly as possible after manufacture during season of navigation to said Rhodes & Bradley, to Chicago or Cleveland as aforesaid."

A jury was duly waived by stipulation in writing, and the case was tried by the court, which found specially that all the above contracts were executed and delivered by the parties thereto, and further specially found as follows:

"3. That the plaintiffs, between May 16 and October 18, 1880, delivered to the Leland Iron [258] Company, at Leland, Michigan, 14,168 tons of iron ore, of which 5980 tons were from the Cleveland mine, 4405 tons were from the Norway mine, 1478 tons were from the Rolling Mill mine, and 2305 tons were from the Stephenson mine.

"4. That the ores from the Stephenson mine and the ores from the Norway mine were alike in value and quality, and that Stephenson mine ore was equally as good and identical in quality and value with the ore from the Norway mine.

"5. That the Leland Iron Company proceeded, soon after such ores began to arrive at Leland, with proper diligence to manufacture said ores into pig iron, and ship the same in cargo lots as rapidly as possible after manufacture from Leland to Cleveland, Ohio, and there delivered the same to the defendant, and the defendant accepted and paid for the same; that before the close of navigation for the season of 1880 the Leland Iron Company had so manufactured and delivered to the defendant 3421 tons of said pig iron; that the defendant made no objection to the acceptance of said pig iron on said contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant, on the ground of the quality of said iron, or of undue delay in the execution of said contract.

"6. That the navigation between Leland and Cleveland and Chicago closed in the fall of 1880 about November 15; that the last cargo of iron was shipped from Leland on November 8, and although the Leland Iron Company had enough iron manufactured to have furnished another cargo of 502 tons by November 15, no vessel could be obtained by which to ship it that fall; that after the close of navigation the Leland Iron Company continued the manufacture of said ore into pig iron without unreasonable delay, and that after November 8, 1880, and up to and including February 28, 1881, the Leland Iron Company had made 2100 tons of pig iron from said ore, and by May 7, 1881, had, manufactured and on hand ready for shipment, about 3506 tons; that on May 7, 1881, the Leland Iron Company resumed the shipment of said iron in cargo lots to the defendant at Cleveland, and continued such manufacture and shipment in cargo lots as rapidly as possible, so that the entire product of said ore was manufactured and shipped from Leland by and in- [259] cluding July 2, 1881; all which cargoes arrived at Cleveland in due course, and were there tendered to the defendant, and the defendant refused to accept said pig iron or any part thereof and refused to pay for the same; that if the average daily product of said furnace from November 8, 1880, to May 8, 1881, had been the same as the average daily product from May 18 to November 8, 1880, all said 14,000 tons of ore would have been made into pig iron by about May 10, 1881; but in fact the furnace was shut down for a time, and part of the time the blast was checked, for want of a sufficient supply of charcoal, so that about 1100 tons of said pig iron were made after May 8, 1881.

"7. That in the latter part of the month of February, and again about March 8, 1881, the defendant notified the plaintiffs that it would not accept, under said contract of February 16, 1880, any iron which was made from said ore after December 31, 1880; and that some time during the month of May, 1881, the defendant notified the plaintiffs that it would not accept any more iron from the plaintiffs under said contract.

"8. That the fair market price of said pig iron in the Cities of Cleveland and Chicago during the months of March, April, May, June and July, 1881, was $27 per ton; that the total amount of iron manufactured from said 14,000 tons of iron (ore) and shipped by the Leland Company to the defendant after the opening of navigation in the spring of 1881 was 4579 tons; and that the difference between the market value of $27 per ton and the contract price was $18 per ton, making a total difference on 4579 tons of $82,422."

The court rendered judgment upon the special findings for the plaintiffs in the sum of $82,422, and costs. 17 Fed. Rep. 426. The defendant excepted to the admission of evidence at the trial, to the refusal of the court to make certain special findings requested, and to the judgment for the plaintiffs; and afterwards sued out this writ of error.

Messrs. William E. Cushing and George F. Edmunds, for plaintiff in error:

A statement descriptive of the subject-matter, or of some material incident, such as the time and place of shipment, is ordinarily to be regarded as a warranty, in the sense in which that term is used in insurance and maritime law, that is to say, a condition precedent, upon a failure or nonperformance of which the party aggrieved may repudiate the whole contract. Behn v. Burness, 3 B. & S. 751; Bowes v. Shand, 2 App. Cas. 455; Lowber v. Bangs, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 728 (17: 768); Davison v. Von Lingen, 113 U. S. 40 (28: 885); Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188 (29: 366).

The special findings affirmatively show a breach of the condition that the manufacture of iron should be completed by or before the opening of navigation in the spring of 1881.

The findings show a breach of the condition that the ore should be made into iron as rapidly as possible.

As to the meaning of "as rapidly as possible," see Hydraulic Engineering Co. v. McHaffie, L. R. 4 Q. B. Div. 670.

Messrs. Enoch Totten and J. M. Flower, for defendants in error:

The general rule with reference to performance where anything has to be done, as goods to be manufactured or delivered, or the like, and no time is specified in the contract, is that it is the presumption of the law that the thing should be done in a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time is a question of law for the court, which will take into consideration all the facts and circumstances of the case in reaching a determination; and if a manufacturer agrees to make and finish certain goods "as soon as possible," this means within a reasonable time, due regard being had to the manufacturer's means, his engagements and the nature of the article.

2 Pars. Cont. 535, 497, 498; Atwood v. Emory, 1 C. B. N. S. 110.

Substantial performance is all that is required to satisfy such a contract.

Swain v. Seamens, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 268 (19: 557); Weinecke v. Falk, 61 Wis. 628; Woods v. Miller, 55 Iowa, 168.

Upon the facts disclosed in the record, and in view of the authorities cited, it seems clear to us that Rhodes & Bradley must be held to have complied with all of the material terms and conditions of the sale contract, and to have substantially performed their agreement.

[260] Mr. Justice Gray, after stating the case as above reported, delivered the opinion of the court:

The original defendant duly pleaded, and has earnestly argued, that the plaintiffs did not perform their contract, in respect either to the nature of the thing furnished, or to its quantity, or to the time of delivery. The principal objections, each of which would require consideration if the decision of the case depended upon it, are as follows:

As to the nature of the thing: That the amounts of ore from each of the four mines named, delivered at the furnace and there manufactured into pig iron, differed from the amounts contracted for; the ores from three of the mines being respectively 20 tons, 595 tons and 22 tons less, and the ore from the fourth mine 805 tons more.

As to the quantity: That the plaintiffs tendered to the defendant the product of 14,168 [261] tons of ore, when the contract was for the product of 14,000 tons only.

As to the time of performance: That the pig iron was not made and shipped "as rapidly as possible;" and especially that so much of it as had not been made and shipped before the close of navigation in 1880 was not shipped "on the opening of navigation of 1881, or as near the opening as possible."

We have not found it necessary to consider the objections as to the kind of iron, or how far any such objections were waived by the defendant, or the effect of tendering too much, or yet the objections to the competency of evidence admitted at the trial, or the variance suggested between the declaration and the proof, because we are of opinion that the delay which took place in the making and shipment of so much of the pig iron as had not been made and shipped before the close of navigation in 1880 is fatal to the plaintiffs' right to maintain this action.

In a case decided upon much consideration at the last term, the general rule was stated as follows: "In the contracts of merchants, time is of the essence. The time of shipment is the usual and convenient means of fixing the probable time of arrival, with a view of providing funds to pay for the goods, or of fulfilling contracts with third persons. A statement descriptive of the subject-matter, or of some material incident, such as the time or place of shipment, is ordinarily to be regarded as a warranty, in the sense in which that term is used in insurance and maritime law, that is to say, a condition precedent, upon the failure or nonperformance of which the party aggrieved may repudiate the whole contract." Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 203 [29: 366, 368]. See also Filley v. Pope, 115 U. S. 213 [29: 372]; Pope v. Porter, 102 N. Y. 366; Rommell v. Wingate, 103 Mass. 327.

When a merchant agrees to sell, and to ship to the rolling mill of the buyer, a certain number of tons of pig iron at a certain time, both the amount of iron and the time of shipment are essential terms of the agreement; the seller does not perform his agreement, by shipping part of that amount at the time appointed and the rest from time to time afterwards; and the [262] buyer is not bound to accept any part of the iron so shipped.

In the case at bar, the plaintiffs were merchants at Chicago, and the defendant was the owner of a rolling mill at Cleveland. By the agreement between them, made in February, 1880, the plaintiffs sell to the defendant "the entire product of fourteen thousand tons iron ore, to be manufactured into pig iron with charcoal" at a certain furnace, "and to be shipped in vessel cargoes as rapidly as possible" to the defendant at Cleveland, "during the season of navigation of 1880," and "such portion of the product of said ores as is made after the close of navigation of 1880, is to be shipped by vessel to Cleveland on the opening of navigation of 1881, or as near the opening as possible." The plaintiffs thus agree that all of the pig iron contracted for, that is not made and shipped before the close of navigation in 1880, shall be shipped as early in 1881 as navigation shall be open and vessels can be obtained. This implies that the whole of the ore shall be made into pig iron and ready for shipment as soon as navigation opens in 1881. The implication is confirmed by the further stipulation that the defendant shall have the privilege, upon paying the additional expense of transportation by land, "of ordering the iron, which may be made too late for shipment by lake during the season of 1880, through by rail to Cleveland during the winter of 1880 and 1881." In short, all the pig iron, not shipped before the close of navigation in 1880, is to be made before the opening of navigation in 1881, and to be then shipped as soon as vessels can be obtained, unless the defendant elects to have it previously forwarded by land. The facts, as found by the court, bearing upon the question of the plaintiffs' performance of their agreement in this particular, are as follows: The whole amount of pig iron made from the 14,000 tons of ore was 8,000 tons. Of these 8,421 tons were shipped in 1880, and accepted and paid for by the defendant. At the opening of navigation, early in May, 1881, there were manufactured and on hand ready for shipment only 3,506 tons. The remaining 1,073 tons were made afterwards, and the last cargo was not shipped until nearly two months after navigation opened.

[263] The general statements in the sixth finding that the owner of the furnace, after the close of navigation in 1880, "continued the manufacture of said ore into pig iron without unreasonable delay," and on the opening of navigation in 1881 resumed the shipment of iron to the defendant, "and continued such manufacture and shipment in cargo lots as rapidly as possible," are limited and controlled by the more precise statements in the same finding, that if the average daily product of the furnace had been the same from the close of navigation in 1880 to the opening of navigation in 1881, as it had been during the season of 1880, "all said 14,000 tons of ore would have been made into pig iron by about May 10, 1881; but in fact the furnace was shut down for a time, and part of the time the blast was checked, for want of a sufficient supply of charcoal; so that about 1,100 tons of said pig iron were made after May 8, 1881."

The failure to have on hand a sufficient amount of charcoal to keep the furnace at work is not shown to have been due to "accidents or strikes," which were contingencies contemplated by all parties, and provided for in the contract sued on. But it was a state of things of which the plaintiffs assumed the risk by undertaking that the whole of the ore should be made into pig iron ready to be shipped as soon as possible after the opening of navigation in 1881.

After the contract for 8,000 tons of pig iron had been partly performed on both sides in 1880, by the plaintiffs having delivered, and the defendant's having accepted and paid for, 8,421 tons of iron, then the thing which, by the terms of so much of the contract as was yet unperformed, the plaintiffs agreed to deliver, and the defendant agreed to take and pay for, was 4,579 tons of pig iron, made and ready for shipment upon the opening of navigation in 1881, and then shipped as rapidly as possible; and the rights and duties of the parties as to the performance of this part of the contract were the same as if it had been the whole contract between them.

The true construction of the contract being that that amount of iron shall be ready to be shipped and be actually shipped as soon as navigation permits, "that is part of the description of the subject-matter of what is sold;" and [264] "the plaintiff who sues upon that contract has not launched his case until he has shown that he has tendered the thing which has been contracted for; and if he is unable to show that, he cannot claim any damages for the nonfulfillment of the contract." Lord Cairns, in Bowes v. Shand, 2 App. Cas. 455, 468; Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 209 [29: 366, 370].

The necessary conclusion is that the defendant was justified in refusing to accept any of the iron shipped in 1881; and whether the notice, previously given by the defendant to the plaintiffs, that it would not accept under the contract any iron made after December 31, 1880, might have been treated by the plaintiffs as a renunciation and a breach of the contract, need not be considered, because the plaintiffs did not act upon it as such. Dingley v. Oler, 117 U. S. 490, 503 [29: 984, 988].

It conclusively appearing, upon the facts found by the court below, that the original plaintiffs cannot maintain their action, it is ordered, in accordance with the precedents of Fort Scott v. Hickman, 112 U. S. 150 [28: 686], and Allen v. St. Louis Bank, 120 U. S. 20 [ante, 573], that the Judgment be reversed, and the case remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to enter judgment for the original defendant.

TOWN OF BLOOMFIELD, Plff. in Err., [121
v.
CHARTER OAK NATIONAL BANK OF HARTFORD, CONNECTICUT.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 121-133.)

Connecticut towns—powers of town meetings—notice or warning—ratification—action on notes executed by treasurer—want of authority—evidence—estoppel.

1. Towns in Connecticut have those powers only which have been expressly conferred on them by statute, or which are necessary for conducting municipal affairs.

2. A town cannot make a contract, or authorise any officer or agent to make one in its behalf, except by a vote in a town meeting duly notified or warned by a notice specifying the object of the meeting; neither can it ratify an unauthorised act of an officer or agent at such meeting, except by a vote passed pursuant to a previous notice.

3. In an action on notes executed by the treasurer of the defendant Town, it is held: that certain evidence tending to show that the Town had made its treasurer its general agent in fact to borrow money, and had at its town meetings and by its affirmative action treated him as authorized to borrow money for the Town, is not proof of original authority, or of subsequent ratification, or of estoppel, to bind the Town.

4. The vote passed at the annual meeting of the Town, purporting to authorise the town treasurer to borrow money for its use, was invalid for want of evidence that it was specified in the warning of the meeting—the statement in the record of the meeting that it was "legally warned" not showing for what purpose it was warned.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut. Reversed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Gray:

[122] This action was brought June 5, 1880, by a national bank against the Town of Bloomfield in the State of Connecticut, upon three promissory notes, dated June 20, June 21, and July 1, 1879, and payable three months after date, for the aggregate sum of $19,433.30, and all alike in form, the first being as follows:

"Hartford, June 20, 1879. $5500.

Three months after date The Town of Bloomfield promise to pay to the order of S. J. Mills fifty-five hundred dollars at Charter Oak National Bank. Value received.

"S. J. MILLS, Treasurer."

The answer denied that the defendant made the notes, or that Mills, as its treasurer, had authority to make them in its behalf.

A trial by jury was had, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff in the full amount of the notes and interest; and a bill of exceptions was tendered by the defendant and allowed by the court, so much of which as is material to be stated was as follows:

The Town of Bloomfield was incorporated in the usual manner of Connecticut towns, by a resolve of the Legislature of Connecticut, in May, 1835, by which the inhabitants of the [123] Town and their successors forever residing therein "shall have and enjoy all the powers, privileges and immunities which are enjoyed by other towns in this State."

It was admitted that Mills was elected treasurer of the Town on October 5, 1868, and was re-elected annually and acted as treasurer until July 16, 1879, when he resigned; and that he made and signed the notes in suit, and indorsed them to the plaintiff.

The defendant objected to the admission of the notes in evidence, because the plaintiff had shown no authority from the defendant to Mills to borrow money or execute notes. But the court, against the defendant's objection and exception, admitted the notes, "subject to the duty of the plaintiff to prove such authority."

The plaintiff then offered in evidence a copy, certified by the town clerk February 16, 1877, of the record of this vote of the Town:

"At an annual town meeting, legally warned and held at the usual place, October 5, 1868; S. J. Mills, moderator; H. W. Rowley, assistant town clerk; Voted, that hereafter the town treasurer be authorized and empowered to borrow money for the use of the Town."

The defendant objected to the admission of this vote, because the plaintiff offered no evidence that the warning of that meeting specified any such object as was contained in the vote. It was admitted that the warning had not been recorded by the town clerk, and was not on file in his office.

The court overruled the objection, and admitted the vote in evidence, "not as showing a legal or valid vote of the Town, but subject to the duty on the part of the plaintiff to prove that the Town at its meetings, by its affirmative acts and conduct, had assented to and treated as authoritative the power of the treasurer under said vote to borrow money for the use of said Town; or for the purpose of establishing that by the course of conduct of the Town in its town meeting it had practically established the authority of the treasurer under said vote; and of establishing an estoppel in pais against the power of the Town to treat as invalid a vote the validity of which had been affirmatively declared by its acts, if it should [124] appear that the defendant had intentionally caused the plaintiff to believe in a state of facts which it now claims not to exist, and induced it to act on such belief." To this ruling the defendant excepted.

The plaintiff thereupon, "for the purpose of proving that the Town had made the said Mills its general agent in fact to borrow money, and had at its town meetings, and by its affirmative acts in said meetings, treated the treasurer as authorized under said vote to borrow money for the Town," offered the following evidence:

1. Forty four notes, for the aggregate sum of more than $64,000, made by Mills as treasurer in behalf of the Town to sundry persons, other than the plaintiff, and mostly citizens of Bloomfield, between the times of the passage of that vote and of his resignation, all of which bore indorsements of payments of interest, and had been paid and taken up.

2. Copies of the annual printed reports made by the selectmen of the Town, together with the treasurer's annual reports, to the annual town meetings from 1869 to 1878 inclusive; and the records of the town meetings, showing the action of the Town thereon.

The reports of those officers in 1869 showed sums paid for "interest on town notes" to sundry individuals named, $1507, and to two of them for "town notes taken up," $1646.58; "indebtedness of Town by notes, $27,100;" and "amount received on town notes, $6559.88." The reports in the subsequent years showed similar items, varying in amount, and the "indebtedness of the Town by notes" gradually increasing to $48,416.28. It was admitted that the sums paid for interest included the payments of interest on the forty-four notes aforesaid.

The records of the town meetings showed that at an adjournment of the annual meeting of 1868 it was "Voted, that the selectmen be directed to have the report of items of account printed yearly, 500 copies;" that at the annual meeting in 1869, the reports of the selectmen and treasurer were "read and accepted;" that in 1870, "the reports of selectmen and town treasurer, being in printed form, were not called for;" and that there was no record of any action of the Town at the subsequent meetings [125] with reference to such reports. But it was admitted that the printed reports were in fact distributed to all who attended those meetings.

3. A vote of the Town, passed at a special meeting, duly warned, and held May 29, 1880, authorizing the selectmen to make and deliver notes in the name and behalf of the Town to take up and cancel "certain memoranda of indebtedness, signed by the selectmen or other officers of said Town, and all bearing date July 1, 1879," for money lent to the Town and unpaid. Also, evidence that, in pursuance of this vote, the selectmen took up twenty notes, some signed by Mills as treasurer, and others both by him as treasurer and by the selectmen, amounting in all to $45,184, and given by him in their presence on July 1, 1879, to various persons, in renewal of or substitution for notes which he had previously given to them; and that these notes were afterwards taken up and paid by the selectmen.

The defendant objected to all this evidence as irrelevant and immaterial; but the court admitted it, for the reasons above stated, and the defendant excepted to its admission.

The bill of exceptions proceeded as follows:

"The plaintiff's account with Mills as such treasurer commenced in March, 1871, and continued until July, 1879. The first note which he procured to be discounted as such treasurer was discounted on March 24, 1871, and thereafter he continuously obtained discounts and renewals of old notes until the date of the last note, when the three notes in suit were outstanding. The aggregate of his account was over $250,000.

"In this account, he deposited moneys of the Town, and, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, small amounts of his own, and checked out from said account, both for the use of the Town and, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, small amounts for himself.

"The plaintiff offered evidence and attempted to trace each note in suit, so as to show that nearly the whole amount of the proceeds of [126] said notes went to the use of the Town, and that nearly all of the checks drawn against said proceeds were given to inhabitants of the Town in payment of town orders given by the selectmen. But no evidence was offered to show that the Town, in its town meeting assembled, knew that Mills kept his bank account with the plaintiff, or that he was borrowing the money represented by these notes, or those of which these were renewals, of the plaintiff.

"The plaintiff disclaimed any advantage by virtue of being indorsee of the notes rather than payee, and did not claim that it stood on that account in any other relation to the defendant than if it had been the payee.

"The plaintiff also offered evidence which the defendant claimed showed that at the time when the plaintiff first obtained a copy of said vote of October 5, 1868, from the town clerk of said Town; viz., on February 22, 1877, all the moneys represented by the notes in suit had been advanced to said Mills, treasurer, except the sum of $1,500, and the notes in suit, except so far as said $1,500 was concerned, were renewals of notes made before said date, and before the plaintiff knew of said vote from the record itself. The plaintiff denied the validity of said claim.

"It sufficiently appeared from the evidence in the case that the plaintiff supposed or thought that Mills was authorized to borrow money for the use of the Town and give its notes therefor, from the commencement of the account of the plaintiff with Mills as such treasurer.

"There was no other evidence in regard to any affirmative acts of the Town in its town meetings assembled, which would constitute an agency in Mills, or raise an estoppel against the Town, other than those which are hereinbefore contained; and this comprised all the evidence in the case in regard to estoppel, ratification, or agency, the court having confined the plaintiff in its testimony to acts of the Town in town meetings, and excluded any acts or knowledge of the selectmen."

The plaintiff thereupon rested its case; and the defendant again objected to the admission in evidence of the notes sued on, and the vote of October, 1868, on the grounds above stated; also on the grounds "that no sufficient evidence [127] had been offered to prove a ratification by the Town of the said vote, or to establish any estoppel against the Town which would prevent it from setting up the invalidity of said vote, or in connection with said vote to prove a general authority given by the Town to Mills to borrow money for the Town and give notes therefor, sufficient to make the Town liable on the notes in question;" "that the Town, as a municipal corporation, had no inherent power to borrow money or give notes therefor, nor had any special authority therefor been proved; that even if it had such power, it could only exercise it by a vote specifying objects for borrowing money, which were within the duties of the Town to perform, and limiting the amount so to be borrowed; and that even if the Town had such power, it could not delegate to its treasurer power to borrow money, unlimited either in object or in amount;" "that by proper construction of said vote, it did not authorize any person who might thereafter be treasurer to borrow any sum of money which he might think fit, and make the Town liable therefor, and did not authorize Mills to borrow the money and give the notes in question;" and "that even if the Town had given authority to Mills to borrow, it had not given him power to give negotiable promissory notes like those in suit for the money so borrowed."

But the court overruled the objections, and admitted the notes and the vote in evidence; and to this ruling the defendant excepted.

The defendant then introduced evidence tending to show that the warning of the town meeting of October 5, 1868, did not, in fact, contain any notice that the matter of authorizing the treasurer to borrow money would come before the meeting; and also evidence tending to show that Mills, during all the time from 1869 to 1879, was largely in default to the Town, having embezzled large sums of money belonging to the Town, in addition to the sums obtained by him from the plaintiff, and that the moneys obtained by him from the plaintiff were not used to pay debts of the Town, or, if so used in part, only to pay debts for the payment of which the Town had furnished him sufficient money, which he had embezzled as aforesaid, [126] and so were in fact obtained and used by him for his own purposes, to cover such embezzlement.

The defendant also put in sundry votes passed by the Town in 1862, 1863 and 1864, authorizing the selectmen to borrow money to pay bounties to soldiers, and to give orders on the town treasurer or notes of the Town therefor, which votes had been ratified and confirmed by the Legislature of Connecticut before the town meeting of October 5, 1868, as well as evidence that at the meeting of May 29, 1880, and before the passing of the vote above mentioned, one of the selectmen read to the meeting a list of the notes signed by Mills as treasurer, either alone or with other officers of the Town, which contained no notes given by Mills to the plaintiff.

Before the charge to the jury, the defendant renewed its objections by requests for instructions, which the court refused to give.

The court instructed the jury that in the absence of all testimony there was no presumption that the warning of the town meeting of October 5, 1868, specified the subject of giving authority to borrow money; and that the vote of that meeting, "standing alone, did not give general authority to borrow money and to act as general agent in that regard;" but submitted the evidence in the case to the jury as sufficient to authorize them to find that the defendant, by continuous and affirmative action and conduct in its town meetings, knowing that its treasurer had generally and freely borrowed money and given notes under that vote, had made him in fact its general agent for that purpose, had held him out to the plaintiff as such, and had ratified his acts, and was estopped to deny their validity.

The defendant excepted to the refusal to instruct as requested, and to the instructions given, and sued out this writ of error.

Messrs. C. E. Perkins and A. F. Eggleston, for plaintiff in error:

It has always been held by the courts of Connecticut that votes on subjects not mentioned in the warning were absolutely void, and not admissible in evidence; and, moreover, that before any vote of a town meeting would be received in evidence, the person presenting it must show affirmatively that the warning did in fact contain such a notice as authorized such vote to be passed. It was a condition precedent to the power of the meeting to pass the vote; and without it a vote of any town meeting on a subject not specified in the warning, however regularly called or met for the consideration of other matters, was no more than a vote of so many men met for a clam bake.

There was no estoppel upon the Town which would prevent it from denying the authority of Mills.

The most essential element of estoppel is that a person has acted upon his knowledge of the words or acts of another, in reliance upon their truth; and so here to make the acts of the subsequent town meetings an estoppel, it is necessary that the Bank should have known of them, and acted in reliance upon them, in loaning the money in question.

Mr. Alvan P. Hyde, for defendant in error:

The vote having been spread on the public records of the Town and suffered to remain, and the plaintiff having acted on the faith of its being a valid vote, the burden of proof rested on the defendants to show that the vote was invalid under the warning.

In Hayden v. Noyes, 5 Conn. 391, no question as to the burden of proof arose. The warning was in evidence, and its construction only before the court; while in our case, the plaintiff having acted on the faith of the validity of the vote which the Town had caused to be spread upon its public records, it would seem that if the Town would repudiate the vote it should furnish the evidence, which was entirely in its control of its invalidity.

N. H. M. & W. R. R. Co. v. Chatham, 42 Conn. 465.

Mr. Justice Gray, after stating the case as above reported, delivered the opinion of the court: [129]

We have not found it necessary to consider how far a town in Connecticut has the power to give promissory notes, because in our opinion the evidence in this case is incompetent to prove that this Town ever authorized its treasurer to make the notes in suit, or did any act which made them binding on the Town.

Towns in Connecticut, as in the other New England States, differ from trading companies, and even from municipal corporations elsewhere. They are territorial corporations, into which the State is divided by the Legislature, from time to time, at its discretion, for political purposes and the convenient administration of government; they have those powers only, which have been expressly conferred upon them by statute, or which are necessary for conducting municipal affairs; and all the inhabitants of a town are members of the quasi corporation. 1 Swift's System, 116, 117; Granby v. Thurston, 23 Conn. 416; Webster v. Harwinton, 32 Conn. 131; Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 28–30.

In Connecticut, as in Massachusetts and Maine, by common law or immemorial usage, the property of any inhabitant may be taken on execution upon a judgment against the town. Atwater v. Woodbridge, 6 Conn. 223, 228; McLoud v. Selby, 10 Conn. 390; Beardsley v. Smith, 16 Conn. 368; 5 Dane, Abr. 158; Chase v. Merrimack Bank, 19 Pick. 564, 569; Gaskill v. Dudley, 6 Met. 546; Adams v. Wiscasset Bank, 1 Greenl. 361; Fernald v. Lewis, 6 Greenl. 264. See also Hopkins v. Elmore, 49 Vt. 176; Rev. Stat. N. H. 1878, chap. 289, § 8.

A town cannot make a contract, or authorize any officer or agent to make one in its behalf, except by vote in a town meeting duly notified or warned; and the notice or warning must specify the matter to be acted on, in order that all the inhabitants (whose property will be subject to be taken on execution to satisfy the obligations of the town) may know in advance what business is to be transacted at the meeting. If the subject of the vote is not specified in the notice or warning, the vote has no legal effect, and binds neither the town nor the inhabitants. No one can rely upon a vote as giving him any rights against the town, without [130] proving a sufficient notice or warning of the meeting at which the vote was passed. Reynolds v. New Salem, 6 Met. 340; Stoughton School Dist. v. Atherton, 12 Met. 105; Moor v. Newfield, 4 Greenl. 44; Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 266–268.

Upon this point the statutes and decisions of Connecticut are perfectly clear.

The statutes require the annual town meetings to be held in October, November or December, and permit special meetings to be convened when the selectmen deem it necessary, or on the application of twenty inhabitants qualified to vote in town meetings; and provide for notifying or warning both annual and special meetings as follows: "When town meetings are to be held, a notification, either written or printed, specifying the objects for which they are to be held, signed by the selectmen, or a majority of them, set upon the sign post or sign posts in the towns, at least five days inclusively before the meeting is to be held, shall be sufficient notice to the inhabitants to attend such meeting." Rev. Stat. 1866, tit. 7, §§ 19, 21; 1821, tit. 103, § 2. They also provide that "The warning of every meeting of any borough, city, ecclesiastical society, school society, school district, or other public community, shall specify the objects for which such meeting is to be held." Rev. Stat. 1866, tit. 7, § 282.

Whenever a town meeting is warned agreeably to the provision above quoted, the statutes, with a view to preserving the best evidence of the contents of the notice or warning, make it the duty of the selectmen to cause a copy or duplicate thereof to be left with the town clerk before the meeting, and the duty of the clerk to record it. Rev. Stat. 1866, title 7, § 19. But these duties are imposed on the selectmen and the clerk as public officers, not as agents of the town. They are not made duties of the inhabitants of the town in their corporate capacity, but official duties of those charged with their performance. The neglect of the officers to file or to record a sufficient notice of a town meeting is theirs only, and not the neglect of [131] the town. So far as the town is concerned, the utmost effect of an omission to record the notice is to authorize its contents to be proved by other evidence. Brunswick First Parish v. McKean, 4 Greenl. 508.

The annual election of town officers, or any other act which the statutes require to be done by the inhabitants at each annual meeting, might perhaps be sufficiently proved by the record of what was done at the meeting, without proving a special notice of it in the warning. Thayer v. Stearns, 1 Pick. 109; Gilmore v. Holt, 4 Pick. 258. But, with those exceptions, such a notice is a necessary prerequisite to the validity of any act of the town, either at the annual meeting or at a special meeting.

The statutes, for instance, provide that "The inhabitants of the respective towns, in legal meetings assembled, shall have power" to make certain by-laws for the welfare of the towns. Rev. Stat. 1866, tit. 7, § 31; 1821, tit. 103, § 6. But it has always been held that no by-law, though passed at an annual meeting, is valid, without a previous notice thereof in the warning.

In the leading case, decided in 1824, of Hayden v. Noyes, 5 Conn. 391, where the annual meeting of a town was warned to choose town officers, "and to do any other business then thought proper by said meeting," the supreme court of errors decided that by-laws passed at that meeting, to regulate the shell fishery of the town, were void; and Chief Justice Hosmer, delivering judgment, said:

"By the act concerning towns, the mode of warning town meetings is specially prescribed. There is to be a notification in writing, 'specifying the objects for which they are to be held,' signed by the selectmen, and set upon the public sign post or posts in the town, at least five days before the meeting. A meeting not warned agreeably to the mode designated is no legal congregation of the town; and its acts in that capacity are void. If the object be to regulate the clam and oyster fisheries, that object must be specified in the warning, in an intelligible manner. A notification to assemble a town meeting for a lawful purpose, duly specified, and to do other town business, is, except as to the specification, as entirely exceptionable as if the town were warned to meet and do any business they should think proper. It is the purpose of the law, not to prescribe a frivolous form, but to give substantial information. If the object of the meeting is specified, it will present a motive to the inhabitants to be present, and they will leave business, even if it be pressing, provided they feel an interest in the subject to be determined. On the other hand, if the subject is unimportant, and any of the inhabitants should feel no concern in the result, they may with safety pursue their ordinary business; and this certainly is matter of convenience." "The warning, in the case before us, neither conforms to the words nor spirit of the law, and, if sanctioned, would repeal the statute." 5 Conn. 395, 396.

In a similar case in 1880, that decision was followed, and it was adjudged, reversing the judgment of a lower court, that it was incumbent on the party offering the vote of the town in evidence, and seeking to avail himself of it, to prove that the meeting was duly warned, although the vote purported on its face to have been passed by the town "in legal meeting assembled;" and the court said: "The borough and the town are, confessedly, inferior corporations. They act not by any inherent right of legislation, like the Legislature of the State; but their authority is delegated; and their powers, therefore, must be strictly pursued. Within the limits of their charter, their acts are valid; without it, they are void. It having been established, in the case of Hayden v. Noyes, above cited, that to render an act of a town, precisely of this character, valid, it must appear that the meeting of the town had been specially warned for that purpose; and this not appearing on the doings of the town, in this case, nor from any proof aliunde to establish the fact, the judgment is erroneous. Perhaps it should appear on the face of the proceedings; but, at least, he who seeks to enforce the act should prove such warning to have been given." Willard v. Killingworth, 8 Conn. 247, 254.

There is nothing in the later decisions of that court, which tends to shake the rules thus established.

[133] In Brownell v. Palmer, 22 Conn. 107, the vote of the town, which was presumed to be valid, without proof of the warning, was a vote passed at an annual meeting twenty-five years before, accepting a discontinuance in due form, by the selectmen, of an ancient highway which was proved to have been disused ever since some time before that vote, and which there was strong ground therefore for presuming to have been discontinued. See Avery v. Stewart, 1 Cush. 496; Fletcher v. Fuller, 120 U. S. 534 [ante, 759]. In the case of a recent vote, the rule is otherwise. For instance, in State v. Taff, 37 Conn. 392, a vote of a town, fifteen years before, accepting the laying out of a highway by the selectmen, was held insufficient for want of any proof of the warning; and the highway was established upon the independent ground of dedication.

In Isbell v. New York & N. H. R. R. 25 Conn. 556, the town clerk's record of the meeting at which the by-law in question was passed recited that the meeting was "legally warned and held for the purpose of making a by-law" upon the particular subject; and the case was thus reconciled with that of Willard v. Killingworth, above cited. The record made by the clerk in the performance of his legal duty was sufficient, and perhaps conclusive, evidence of the fact recorded. Thayer v. Stearns, 1 Pick. 109.

In Society for Savings v. New London, 29 Conn. 174, the sufficiency of the warning was not questioned.

In Baldwin v. North Branford, 32 Conn. 47, a vote passed upon an insufficient warning, and therefore invalid, was upheld because it had been ratified by the town at a subsequent meeting duly warned and held under a confirmatory Act of the Legislature.

The two remaining Connecticut cases, cited at the bar, were suits to compel towns to guaranty the bonds of a railroad corporation, in accordance with votes passed under authority conferred by statute.

In the one, the vote was passed at a meeting duly warned and held; and the decision was that the vote as recorded by the town, taken in connection with the warning, which was also recorded, appeared to have been taken by ballot, as required by law, and that the town was [134] estopped to show, by an amendment of the record, made after the railroad corporation and its contractors had acted upon the vote for three years, that the vote was not so taken. New Haven, M. & W. R. R. Co. v. Chatham, 42 Conn. 465. The case is an exceptional one, depending on its peculiar circumstances. Dill. Mun. Corp, § 164, note.

But in the other case, in which the warning, as recorded, showed that it had been posted less than the requisite number of days before the meeting at which the town voted to guaranty the bonds on certain conditions, it was adjudged that the vote was invalid; and that the town was not estopped to prove the defect in the warning, and the consequent invalidity of the vote by a recital in the record that the vote was passed at a meeting "legally warned and held," or by subsequent proceedings, after the railroad corporation had substantially complied with those conditions, by which the town, under a warning to determine what disposition should be made of the bonds of the railroad corporation held by the town, and to pay interest on its bonds, and to take such action as to secure the completion of the railroad, voted to let the conditions of the former vote remain as they were. The court said: "The assembled voters are without power to act for or bind the town, unless they have been called together in the statutory way and at the statutory time;" and also, after observing that "every voter who read the call" for the second meeting "might safely absent himself from the meeting in the certainty that under the call it could not impose the burden of a guaranty upon the town," added, "We cannot order the town to guaranty any bonds, unless it is made clear that at a lawful meeting, so called as to give the voters full knowledge of its purpose, they have assumed the burden; it is not to be placed upon them by inference." Brooklyn Trust Co. v. Hebron, 51 Conn. 22, 29, 30.

It follows that the vote passed at the annual meeting of the Town of Bloomfield in 1868, purporting to authorize the town treasurer to borrow money for the use of the Town, was invalid, for want of any evidence that the subject was specified in the warning. The statement in the record of the meeting, that it was "legal [135] ly warned," shows only that it had been duly warned for some purposes, not for what purposes.

The circuit court ruled that this vote did not of itself authorize the treasurer to borrow money; but submitted the vote, with the other evidence in the case, to the jury, as sufficient to authorize them to find either that the Town had made him its general agent to borrow money, or that it had ratified his acts, or that it was estopped to deny their validity.

That evidence consisted only: 1. Of forty-four notes made by the treasurer to sundry individuals after the passage of that vote; 2. Of the reports made in print by the selectmen and treasurer to the annual meetings of the Town from 1869 to 1878 inclusive, showing various sums received or paid "on town notes," and a gradually increasing "indebtedness of the Town by notes;" and the records of those meetings, showing that in 1869 such reports "were read and accepted," and that in after years no action on them was taken by the Town; 3. Of a vote passed by the Town in 1880, authorizing the selectmen to make notes in behalf of the Town to take up and cancel certain memoranda of indebtedness, made by officers of the Town, dated July 1, 1879, for money lent to the Town by various persons; and the acts of the selectmen pursuant to that vote.

Any ratification of an act previously unauthorized must, in order to bind the principal, be with full knowledge of all the material facts. Owings v. Hull, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 607 [9:246]; Bennecke v. Insurance Co., 105 U. S. 355 [26: 990]. And no estoppel in pais can be created, except by conduct which the person setting up the estoppel has the right to rely upon, and does in fact rely and act upon. Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20 [27:359]; Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143 [26:968]; Brant v. Virginia C. & I. Co. 93 U. S. 326 [23: 927].

The vote of those who attend a town meeting being of no validity against the town or its inhabitants, unless the object of the vote is set forth in the notice or warning of the meeting, the town can no more ratify an act afterwards, than authorize it beforehand, except by vote passed pursuant to a previous notice specifying the object. Without the indispensable prerequisite of such a notice, those present at a town [136] meeting have no greater power to bind the town indirectly by ratification or estoppel than they have to bind it directly by an original vote. Marsh v. Fulton Co. 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 676 [19:1040]; Daviess County v. Dickinson, 117 U. S. 657 [29:1026]; Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U. S. 425 [ante, 178]; Pratt v. Swanton, 15 Vt. 147; Lander v. Smithfield School Dist. 33 Me. 239; American Tube Works v. Boston Machine Co. 139 Mass. 5.

By the Statutes of Connecticut, it is made the duty of the selectmen to superintend the concerns of the town, to adjust and settle all claims against it, and to draw orders on the treasurer for their payment; to keep a true and regular account of all the expenditures of the town, and to exhibit the same at the annual meeting; and it is the duty of the treasurer to receive all the money belonging to the town for taxes, fines, forfeitures, debts or otherwise, and to make an annual statement of the receipts of money into the treasury, and the expenditures, which shall be adjusted by the selectmen, and laid before the town at the annual meeting. Rev. Stat. 1866, tit. 7, §§ 45, 67; 1821, tit. 103, § 8, tit. 105, § 20. But neither the selectmen nor the treasurer have any general power to make contracts, to borrow money, or to incur new debts, in behalf of the town, except for particular objects having no relation to this case. Sharon v. Salisbury, 29 Conn. 113; Ladd v. Franklin, 37 Conn. 53; Goff v. Rehoboth, 12 Met. 26.

The reports made by the selectmen and the treasurer to the annual meetings, in performance of the duties imposed upon those officers by statute, were not, unless expressly approved or acted on by the Town at a meeting duly held upon sufficient warning, evidence to charge the Town with liability for debts which those officers had no authority to contract. The only reports of the selectmen and treasurer upon which the Town took any action were those of 1869. The acceptance by the Town of those reports might be a ratification of the debts and payments therein stated, but could have no further effect. Burlington v. New Haven & N. Co. 26 Conn. 51; Benoit v. Conway, 10 Allen, 528; Dickinson v. Conway, 12 Allen, 487; Arlington v. Pierce, 122 Mass. 270; Bean v. Hyde Park, 143 Mass. 245. In Kinsley v. Norris, 60 N. H. 131, cited for the plaintiff, the town, under an appropriate article in the warrant, had voted not only to accept the report of the doings of an agent, but also to give him additional powers. [137]

There is nothing in the case at bar which tends to show that any of the promissory notes to individuals, offered in evidence, or of the notes mentioned in the annual reports of the selectmen and treasuner accepted by the Town in 1869, or in the vote of the Town in 1880, were held by the plaintiff. The bill of exceptions explicitly states that no evidence was offered that the Town in town meeting assembled knew that its treasurer kept his bank account with the plaintiff, or was borrowing of the plaintiff the money represented by the notes in suit, or by notes of which these were renewals; and also states that the plaintiff disclaimed any advantage by virtue of being the indorsee, instead of being the payee, of the notes in suit.

The bill of exceptions does state that it appeared by the evidence that the plaintiff, from the beginning of its account with Mills as treasurer, "supposed or thought that Mills was authorized to borrow money for the use of the Town and give its notes therefor." But it contains nothing tending to show that the supposition was based upon anything but false representations of the treasurer, which would not bind the Town. Railroad Bank v. Lowell, 109 Mass. 214; Agawam Nat. Bank v. South Hadley, 128 Mass. 503. Nor was there any evidence that the plaintiff, at the time of lending money to the treasurer, knew of any acts of the Town or of the selectmen since the vote of 1868; and the vote of 1880, and the acts of the selectmen under it, took place after the notes in suit had been made and delivered to the plaintiff, and therefore could not have influenced it in taking them.

Upon the whole case, there was no proof of original authority, or of subsequent ratification, or of estoppel, to bind the defendant Town; none of original authority, for want of any vote passed pursuant to due notice in the warning; none of ratification, for the same reason, as well as because it was not shown that the acts proved were done with intent to ratify the acts of the treasurer in issuing the notes sued on, or with [138] knowledge of all the material facts attending their issue; none of estoppel because there was no evidence of any acts of the Town, which the plaintiff had a legal right to rely upon, or did in fact rely upon, in taking these notes. The jury having been instructed otherwise, the judgment must be reversed, and the case re- manded to the Circuit Court, with directions to set aside the verdict and to order a new trial.

v.

EZRA KELSEY AND HENRY A. LANMAN, EXRS. of WILLIAM KELSEY, Deceased, ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 383-387.)

Liability of innkeepers for loss of merchandise for sale or sample belonging to guest—Missouri Act—strictly construed—written notice.

1. If a guest applies for a room in an inn for a purpose of business distinct from his accommodation as a guest, the particular responsibility of the innkeeper does not extend to goods lost or stolen from that room.

2. Under the Missouri Act of April 1, 1872, an innkeeper in that State is not liable for the loss of any merchandise for sale or sample belonging to a guest, unless the guest shall have given written notice of having such merchandise for sale or sample in his possession after entering the inn, or unless such loss shall be caused by fire intentionally produced by the innkeeper or his servants, or by the theft of himself or servants. Express knowledge that a guest has such merchandise in his possession is not sufficient to charge the innkeeper, in the absence of the written notice required by the statute.

Argued and submitted March 30, 1887. Decided April 11, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. Opinion below, 16 Fed. Rep. 71. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Chester H. Krum, for plaintiffs in error:

Prevailing authorities make innkeepers insurers of the property committed to their care, against anything but the act of God, or the public enemy, or the neglect or fraud of the owner of the property.

Such being the state of the law, in the absence of the statute upon which they rely, the record clearly establishes a liability on the part of the defendants in error.

No objection to the reception of the goods having been made by the proprietors, it is not material whether the goods lost were baggage, within the legal meaning of the term, or whether they were only merchandise. By suffering them to remain in the hotel, after knowledge of their nature, the proprietor comes within the rule of Hannibal R. R. v. Swift, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 262 (20: 423).

Had there been no statute covering the case it would have been allowed to go to the jury.

There is nothing in the situation under the statute which renders inapplicable general doctrines with reference to waiver.

Had the statute defined the meaning of the term "baggage," and provided that an innkeeper should not be liable for loss of property other than such baggage, surely an innkeeper, who knowingly received a guest with property other than baggage, would be liable for its loss, unless within common-law exceptions.

Hannibal R. R. v. Swift, supra.

The statute is to be construed with reference to the intention of the Legislature. The object of the statute is merely to give notice to an innkeeper as to the nature of the property. Where he has personal knowledge the purpose of the statute is satisfied.

Purvis v. Coleman, 21 N. Y. 111.

A party may waive a right created in his favor by statute.

Messrs. John W. Noble, R. Orrick and W. H. Phillips, for defendants in error:

The statute was express, demanding written notice; each party acted on knowledge of this statute; and until the plaintiff moved, by giving statutory notice, the conduct of the defendants could not be said to be inconsistent with their right to notice. It may be likened to the conduct of one relying on a verbal contract for the sale of land. No equity arises upon it. A complainant has no reason to rely upon it.

Dunphy v. Ryan, 116 U. S. 491 (29:708); Browne, Stat. Frauds, 4th ed. § 115, a.

The statute requires the written notice after entering the inn, without qualification, before the party shall be able to establish such a relation to the proprietors as will put the merchandise for sale or sample at the innkeeper's risk, because it also enacts that the innkeeper shall not be compelled to receive such guest.

The rule is a reasonable one. It was in support of the rule laid down by many authorities. Some of these had held that an innkeeper should be liable only for articles of wearing apparel, and for personal use and convenience, such as travelers ordinarily carry with them.

Giles v. Fauntleroy, 18 Md. 126; Pettigrew v. Barnum, 11 Md. 434; Treiber v. Burrows, 27 Md. 180; Sassen v. Clark, 37 Ga. 242; Jalie v. Cardinal, 35 Wis. 118.

Others had held that if a guest take a room for business, distinct from his accommodation as a guest, the special responsibility did not extend to goods lost or stolen from that room.

Burgess v. Clements, 4 Maule & S. 306; Farnworth v. Packwood, 1 Holt, N. P. 209; S. C. 1 Starkie, N. P. 249; Carter v. Hobbs, 12 Mich. 57; Jalie v. Cardinal, 35 Wis. 118; Myers v. Cottrill, 5 Biss. 465.

The right given to the innkeeper to refuse to receive the guest, if he gave the notice upon entering the inn, was itself destructive of the old rule as held by the stricter authorities; for the obligation of the innkeeper to respond for any injury to or loss of the guest's property depended upon the obligation to receive him.

Mower v. Fethers, 61 N. Y. 34; Ingallsbee v. Wood, 33 N. Y. 577.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

By the General Statutes of Missouri, of 1865, chapter 99, it was provided that—

Sec 1. "No innkeeper in this State, who shall constantly have in his inn an iron safe, in good order, and suitable for the safe custody of money, jewelry, and articles of gold and silver manufacture, and of the like, and who shall keep a copy of this chapter printed by itself, [384] in large, plain English type, and framed, constantly and conspicuously suspended in the office, bar room, saloon, reading, sitting, and parlor room of his inn, and also a copy printed by itself in ordinary size plain English type posted upon the inside of the entrance door of every public sleeping room of his inn, shall be liable for the loss of any such articles aforesaid suffered by any guest, unless such guest shall have first offered to deliver such property lost by him to such innkeeper for custody in such iron safe, and such innkeeper shall have refused or omitted to take it and deposit it in such safe for its custody, and to give such guest a receipt therefor.

Sec. 2. "No innkeeper in this State shall be liable for the loss of any baggage or other property of a guest caused by fire not intentionally produced by the innkeeper or his servants; but innkeepers shall be liable for the losses of their guests caused by the theft or negligence of the innkeeper, or of his servants, anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding."

The last section was amended by an Act approved April 1, 1872, so as to read: "No innkeeper in this State shall be liable for the loss of any baggage or other property of a guest caused by fire not intentionally produced by the innkeeper or his servants; nor shall he be liable for the loss of any merchandise for sale or sample belonging to a guest, unless the guest shall have given written notice of having such merchandise for sale or sample in his possession after entering the inn; nor shall the innkeeper be compelled to receive such guest with merchandise for sale or sample. But innkeepers shall be liable for the losses of their guests caused by the theft of such innkeeper, or his servants, anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding."

William M. Fisher, having in his possession, as a traveling salesman for the firm of which he was a member, certain goods, consisting mainly of gold chains, chain trimmings, and necklaces, was received, with his goods, into the Planters' House, in St. Louis—a public inn kept by the defendants in error—and was supplied, at his own request, with a room in which such articles could be exhibited to customers.
[385] During his occupancy of the room for that purpose, $12,696.32 in value of the articles were, without his knowledge, taken and carried away, so that they could not be recovered. It does not appear that the loss was attributable to the neglect either of Fisher or of the innkeepers. Although the nature of his business was well known to the defendants, and they were aware that the articles in question were brought into the hotel to be exhibited for sale, in a room to be occupied for that purpose, written notice was not served upon them that Fisher had "such merchandise for sale or sample in his possession after entering the inn." In this action, brought to recover the value of the goods stolen or lost, the court held that such a notice was required, by the Statutes of Missouri, in order to fix liability upon the innkeeper. The jury having been so instructed, there was a verdict and judgment for the defendants.

Although Fisher was received by the defendants into their hotel, as a guest, with knowledge that his trunks contained articles having no connection with his comfort or convenience as a mere traveler or wayfarer, but which, at his request, were to be placed on exhibition or for sale, in a room assigned to him for that purpose, they would not, under the doctrines of the common law, be held to the same degree of care and responsibility, in respect to the safety of such articles, as is required in reference to baggage or other personal property carried by travelers. He was entitled, as a traveler, to a room for lodging; but he could not, of right, demand to be supplied with apartments in which to conduct his business as a salesman or merchant. The defendants, being the owners or managers of the hotel, were at liberty to permit the use by Fisher of one of their rooms for such business purposes; but they would not, for that reason and without other circumstances, be held to have had his goods in their custody, or to have undertaken to well and safely keep them as constituting part of the property which he had with him in his capacity as guest. Kent says that "If a guest applies for a room in an inn, for a purpose of business distinct from his accommodation as a guest, the particular responsibility does not extend to goods lost or stolen from [386] that room." 2 Kent, 596. See also Myers v. Cottrill, 5 Biss. 470, Drummond, J.; Story, Bailm. § 476; Burgess v. Clements, 4 Maule & S. 306; Redfield, Carriers & Bailees, 443; Addison, Law Cont. 6th ed. 360.

Such, we think, was the state of the law in Missouri prior to the passage of the Act of 1872. That Act prescribes the conditions upon which an innkeeper in that State may be made liable for the loss of merchandise belonging to a guest, and brought into the hotel only to be exhibited or sold. In view of the large and constantly increasing business transacted by traveling salesmen, the Legislature of Missouri deemed it just to all concerned that their relations with innkeepers, in respect to goods carried by them, should be clearly defined and not left to depend upon mere inference or usage. The statute makes the innkeeper responsible, in every event, for the loss of baggage or other property of the guest by fire intentionally produced by the innkeeper or his servants, or by the theft of himself or servants. But since the innkeeper is not ordinarily bound to the same care for the safety of goods, in the possession of a guest for the purpose merely of being exhibited or sold, as for articles carried by the latter for his comfort or convenience as a traveler, the statute changed the rule so as to make his responsibility the same in both cases; provided, in the former case, the person received as a guest gives written notice that he has merchandise for sale or sample in his possession in the hotel; leaving the innkeeper, upon such notice, to elect whether he will permit the guest to remain in the hotel with such merchandise for sale or sample. Notice in this form, when the guest is permitted to remain in the hotel with merchandise in his possession "for sale or sample," is made by the statute evidence that the innkeeper has assumed responsibility for the safety of such merchandise, to the full extent that he is bound by the settled principles of law for the safety of the baggage or other articles brought by guests into the hotels.

It is suggested that the purpose of the Act of 1872 was to protect innkeepers; and, therefore, actual knowledge that a guest has in his posses- [387] sion merchandise for sale, or, at least, the consent of the innkeeper to the guest's use of a room in his hotel for such purpose, should be deemed sufficient to fasten upon the innkeeper responsibility for the safety of such merchandise. It seems to us that the statute is equally for the benefit of traveling salesmen. Be this as it may, as the law in regard to the liability of an innkeeper is one of extreme rigor, he should not be held to any responsibility beyond that arising from the relation of innkeeper and guest, unless, at least, the circumstances show that he distinctly agreed to assume such additional responsibility. There is no pretense in this case that the defendants made an express agreement of that character. Nor can such an agreement be implied merely from the knowledge on the part of the innkeeper that a guest has in his possession in the hotel, for exhibition or sale, merchandise for the safe custody of which he is not ordinarily responsible. Such knowledge implies nothing more upon the part of the innkeeper than his assent to the use of his rooms for purposes of that kind.

If, as to such merchandise, it is intended to hold the innkeeper to the strict liability imposed at the common law, in respect to the baggage or other personal property of a guest, the statute indicates the mode in which that intention must be manifested. The guest must give notice of such intention. And as the notice is expressly required to be in writing, no other form of notice can be deemed a compliance with the statute. Porter v. Gilkey, 57 Mo. 237. With the reasons which induced the Legislature to prescribe a written notice, in order to fix upon the innkeeper responsibility for the safety of merchandise carried by traveling salesmen for sale or sample, we have nothing to do. The law of Missouri is so written, and it is our duty to give it effect according to the fair meaning of the words employed.

It results that the court below did not err in refusing the instruction asked by the plaintiffs, but correctly held that the absence of the written notice required by the Act of 1872 was fatal to their right to recover.

The judgment is affirmed.

v.
THEODORE WRIGHT.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 201-215.)

Bill to quiet title—judicial sale of lands of West Virginia corporation—construction of Virginia Statutes—Code of 1849—railroads—abandonment—parties—jurisdiction of United States Courts, independent of state legislation—adequate remedy at law.

1. Upon a bill filed by appellee to quiet his title to a strip of land in West Virginia, which he derived from the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company, a corporation of that State, through a judicial sale, said land having been obtained by the company through judicial proceedings for the purpose of a railroad to connect its mining lands with the Kanawha River, it is held: that the complainant, by virtue of the decree of the state court ordering the sale at which he purchased, is vested with whatever title the company had; that the appellants, who are the representatives of the original owner of the land in question, are not proper parties to complain of any irregularity or fraud in connection with the proceedings in the state court, especially as a judgment in favor of the original owner, for the amount awarded him for the land in question, was paid from the proceeds of said sale; that the title of the company had not failed, by force of the statute under which it was acquired, prior to the judicial sale to the complainant; that the provisions of section 20, of the Act of March 11, 1837, relating to forfeiture for abandonment or non-user, apply only to railroads for the general transaction of persons and property, and were not adopted as part of the charter of said company; that the Virginia Code of 1849, which, although passed before, did not go into operation until after the passage of the charter of said company, operated on said charter when it went into effect and controlled the distribution of the company's assets; and that no forfeiture of the title on the ground of fraud can be enforced except by the State.

2. The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is independent of state legislation; and it cannot be impaired or diminished by the statutes of the several States regulating the practice of their own courts.

3. The adequate remedy at law, which is the test of the equitable jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, is that which existed when the Judiciary Act of 1789 was adopted, unless subsequently changed by Act of Congress.

Argued March 21, 22, 1887. Decided April 11, 1887.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the District of West Virginia. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. F. Brown, for appellants.

Messrs. E. B. Knight and R. C. McMurtrie, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant in this case, Theodore Wright, the appellee, a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania, filed his bill in equity September 24, 1881, against the appellants, citizens of the State of West Virginia, the object and prayer of which were to quiet his title to certain real estate described therein. The title of the complainant to the premises in controversy is derived from the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company, a corporation of the State of West Virginia. That company was chartered by a special Act of the Legislature of Virginia, February 16, 1850, and made a body politic "for the purpose of exploring, digging, mining, raising, and transporting coal and other minerals and substances, and for manufacturing mineral, vegetable, and other articles in and from the Counties of Kanawha and Boone, and such other counties as may hereafter be created out of parts of said counties." [202]

The third section of its charter is as follows: "That it shall and may be lawful for the said company to erect and construct a slack-water navigation from some convenient point on Kanawha or Coal Rivers, contiguous to their said lands, and along the bed of the said Coal River to the Great Kanawha; Provided, however, That nothing in this Act contained shall be so construed as to prevent the said rivers from being and remaining public highways free for the navigation of all the citizens of this Commonwealth; and also to construct such railroad or railroads from any point on their said lands to the Great Kanawha River, or any other navigable stream in the valley of the Kanawha River and its branches, or to connect with any other railroad or improvement which is now or may hereafter be authorized by the State of Virginia in the said valley of the Kanawha and its branches; and to enable the said company to carry out the provisions in this section contained, they are hereby invested with all the rights, powers, and privileges, and subjected to all the limitations and restrictions, contained in an Act entitled 'An Act Prescribing Certain General Regulations for the Incorporation of Railroad Companies,' passed March 11, 1837, so far as the same are applicable to and not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act."

By the second section of the charter the company was authorized to purchase and hold lands, [203] not exceeding 10,000 acres at any one time, in the said Counties of Kanawha and Boone, or in any new counties that had been or might thereafter be formed and created out of parts of said counties.

In pursuance of the authority given by its charter the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company of Virginia, on the 8th of January, 1858, acquired by deed a title in fee simple to a tract of land containing about 10,000 acres. John McConihay owned land between this tract and the Kanawha River. For the purpose of acquiring a right of way for a railroad, and a depot on the banks of the Kanawha River, in order to transport its coal, the Winifrede Company, by judicial proceedings, appropriated a tract through the lands of McConihay, being a narrow strip four or five miles long, connecting its tract of coal land with the bank of the river. That strip, appropriated in that way and for that purpose, is the subject of the controversy in this suit. A demurrer interposed by the defendants was overruled, and the case was heard finally upon bill, answer, replication and proofs. A decree was rendered in favor of the complainant, from which the defendants prosecute the present appeal.

The first error assigned is that the case is not one of equitable jurisdiction, it being contended that the complainant below had a complete and adequate remedy at law. The bill sufficiently alleges that the complainant is in possession of the premises in controversy, and in this respect is supported by the proofs. The prayer of the bill is that the defendants may be required to assert and declare the rights and title claimed by them in and to the premises, and that in the meantime they may be enjoined "from interfering with or hindering or obstructing your orator, his agents or employés, in any manner in the use and enjoyment of said way and depot until the further order of said court," and for general relief. The contention of the appellants, however, is, that by the Statute of West Virginia the complainant might have maintained an action of ejectment. Reference is [206] made in support of this contention to the West Virginia Code of 1868, chapter 90, to show that an action of ejectment in that State will lie against one claiming title to or interest in land, although not in possession. Admitting this to be so, it, nevertheless, cannot have the effect to oust the jurisdiction in equity of the courts of the United States as previously established. That jurisdiction, as has often been decided, is vested as a part of the judicial power of the United States in its courts by the Constitution and Acts of Congress in execution thereof. Without the assent of Congress that jurisdiction cannot be impaired or diminished by the statutes of the several States regulating the practice of their own courts. Bills quia timet, such as the present, belong to the ancient jurisdiction in equity; and no change in state legislation giving, in like cases, a remedy by action at law, can of itself, curtail the jurisdiction in equity of the courts of the United States. The adequate remedy at law, which is the test of equitable jurisdiction in these courts, is that which existed when the Judiciary Act of 1789 was adopted, unless subsequently changed by Act of Congress.

The next assignment of error is that the proof fails to sustain the title set up by the appellee. That title is based upon two judicial sales. The first of these was a sale to Henry A. Cram, in a proceeding commenced in 1860 by the Bank of Virginia and other judgment creditors against the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company, the object of which was to marshal the assets of that corporation and apply them to the payment of its debts. A decree was rendered therein on January 26, 1861, ascertaining the debts of the company and their priority as liens, and ordering a sale of its property for their satisfaction. That decree directed the sale of "that ten thousand acre tract of land belonging to the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company, fully set out and described in the bill and exhibits and other proceedings in this cause, and lying on Kanawha and Coal Rivers and on Field's Creek, in the Counties of Kanawha and Boone, together with all improvements thereon used in the mining, transporting, and shipping of coal, including railroad iron, picks, shovels, cars, engines, and whatever other tools and implements there may be upon the property belonging to said company." The sale to Cram was duly confirmed [207] by the court, and a deed conveying the property made to him by the commissioner. Subsequently, in 1878, Henry A. Cram, the purchaser, filed his bill in equity against Edward A. Bibby and others, in which he alleged that the purchase made by him at the sale under the decree in favor of the Bank of Virginia was made in trust on behalf of himself and others. The object and prayer of his bill were that the trusts arising out of the agreements set forth therein, in pursuance of which the purchase was made, might be administered and carried out under the direction of the court, and an account taken of the expenditures of the complainant, the property sold, and the proceeds divided among the parties in interest. By an amendment, the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company was made a party to the bill; and in a second amendment it was alleged that at the sale made under the decree in the Bank of Virginia case, the railroad track and roadbed leading from the Kanawha River to the ten thousand acre tract, some five miles long, more or less, was sold and should have been conveyed by the commissioner in his deed to the complainant, but by mistake was left out and not embraced in the conveyance. The complainant, therefore, prayed that the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company, and all parties named as defendants in the original bill, be made defendants to the amended bill; and that the court would treat the roadway as a part of the property embraced in the deed to the complainant; adding that it was a coal property, that the road and roadbed and rails cost some $800,000, and that the property was valueless without this roadway, and the court was asked to sell the property, including the roadway, as an entirety. To this amended bill an answer was filed in the name and on behalf of the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company, admitting the allegations of the bill and amendments to be true, and particularly that the property, including the roadbed and the ten thousand acre tract and rails, was sold as an entirety, and as such purchased by Cram, and should have been included in the deed from the commissioner to him as purchaser. In this suit a final decree was passed ordering a sale of the [208] property as prayed for and described. It was declared in that decree that "The legal title to the tract of 10,180 acres of land, more or less, situated on Field's Creek and Big Coal River, West Virginia, and in the bill and amended bills more particularly described, together with the roadbed and right of way from the same to the Kanawha River, including the front property," was vested in the complainant, Henry A. Cram, and the property as thus described was ordered to be sold. At this sale Theodore Wright, the appellee, became the purchaser for the sum of $120,000. This sale was confirmed by the court and a deed ordered to be made, upon payment of the purchase money.

The objection of the appellants, that these proceedings do not vest in Theodore Wright, the appellee, the title which was in the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company to the premises in dispute, cannot be sustained. It could avail the appellants as a defense only by showing that the legal title was still outstanding in the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company, and that as between that company and Wright the latter was wrongfully in possession; but that question has already been adjudged as between the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company and Cram, to whose title Wright succeeds by the decree of the Kanawha Circuit Court, as against which that company can no longer assert any title, either at law or in equity, to the property in controversy. Wright is now vested by virtue of that decree with whatever title the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company had to the premises, as completely as if that title had been conveyed to him by the company by a deed under its corporate seal. It is said, however, by the appellants, that the decree rendered in the suit in which Cram was a complainant was collusive and fraudulent, because it appears upon the face of the record that the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company appeared without process and answered, but not under its corporate seal, by the same counsel who represented Cram. This, however, is not proof of fraud, but only of a consent to do what it appears to have been perfectly [209] proper to do; that is, to make good an imperfect conveyance. Were it otherwise the imputed fraud is not one of which the appellants are the proper party to complain, being strangers to the transaction.

The third assignment of error is that, before the decree in the Cram suit, the title originally acquired by the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company had failed and ceased, and by force of the statute under which it was acquired had reverted to the appellants as heirs at law and assigns of John McConihay. It will be remembered that the charter of the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company, having authorized it to construct a railroad from its lands to the Great Kanawha River, for that purpose invested the company with all the rights, powers, and privileges, and subjected it to all the limitations and restrictions contained in the Act entitled "An Act Prescribing Certain General Regulations for the Incorporation of Railroad Companies," passed March 11, 1837, "so far as the same are applicable to and not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act."

The Act of March 11, 1837, thus referred to, contained provisions in reference to the organization of railroad companies generally, defining the powers of directors, conferring power to condemn land for right of way and depot purposes, and providing for the assessment of damages therefor. In prescribing the mode in which the freeholders appointed to ascertain the damages payable to the proprietor of the lands, by reason of the condemnation thereof for the use of the company, should act, it declares that "They shall consider the proprietor of the land as being the owner of the whole fee simple interest therein, they shall take into consideration the quantity and quality of the land to be condemned, the additional fencing which will be required thereby, and all other inconveniences which will result to the proprietor from the condemnation thereof; and shall combine therewith a just regard to the advantages which the owner of the land will derive from the construction of the railroad for the use of which his land is condemned; Provided, That not less than the actual value of the land, without reference to the location and construction of the road, shall be given by the [210] commissioners."

It also provided for rendering judgment in favor of the proprietor for the amount of the damages awarded to him, and said: "And when such judgment shall be satisfied by the payment of the money into court or otherwise, the title of the land for which such damages were assessed shall be vested in the company, in the same manner as if the proprietor had sold and conveyed it to them."

The 20th section of the Act is as follows: "The works of the company shall be executed with diligence; and if they be not commenced within two years after the passage of the Act of incorporation, and finished within the period which may be therein prescribed, and in case the company at any time after the said road is completed shall abandon the same, or cease to use and keep it in proper repair, so that it shall fail to afford the intended accommodation to the public, for three successive years, then and in that case also their charter shall be annulled as to the company, and the State of Virginia may take possession of the said railroad and works, and the title thereto shall be vested in the said State so long as it shall maintain the same in the state and manner required by said charter; otherwise, the lands over which the said road shall pass shall revert to and be vested in the person or persons from whom they were taken by concession or inquisition as aforesaid, or their heirs or assigns."

The 35th section of the same Act provides that "Any part of any charter or Act of incorporation granted agreeably to the provisions of this Act shall be subject to be altered, amended, or modified by any future Legislature as to them shall seem proper; except so much thereof as prescribes the rate of compensation or tolls for transportation; Provided, That the rights of property acquired under this Act, or any other Act adopting the provisions of this Act, shall not be taken away or impaired by any future Act of the Legislature."

The contention on the part of the appellants is that by virtue of the 20th section of the Act of March 11, 1837, above quoted, the premises in dispute reverted to them as the heirs and assigns of John McConihay, having been appro- [211] priated to the use of the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company under the provisions of that Act, and having been abandoned by the company for more than three successive years for the uses for which the appropriation had taken place, and the State of Virginia not having interposed in its own behalf.

It further appears, however, that in August, 1849, a general code of laws, known as the Code of 1849, was passed by the Legislature of Virginia, to take effect on July 1, 1850. Section 1, chapter 61, of that Code, is as follows: "Every company which is governed by the Act passed on the 7th day of February, 1817, prescribing certain general regulations for the incorporation of turnpike companies, or by the Act passed on the 11th day of March, 1837, prescribing certain general regulations for the incorporation of railroad companies, and every company which after the commencement of this Act shall be incorporated to construct any work of internal improvement, shall be governed by the provisions contained in the 57th chapter and in this chapter, so far as they can apply to such company without violating its charter."

By section 11, title 17, of that Act, it is provided, in reference to the damages awarded for compensation to the proprietor for lands taken for the use of corporations, that "Upon such payment the title to that part of the land for which such compensation is allowed shall be absolutely vested in the company, county or town in fee simple." And section 28 is as follows: "When any corporation shall expire or be dissolved, or its corporate rights and privileges shall have ceased, all its works and property, and debts due to it, shall be subject to the payment of debts due by it, and then to distribution among the members according to their respective interests; and such corporation may sue and be sued as before, for the purpose of collecting debts due to it, prosecuting rights under previous contracts with it, and enforcing its liabilities and distributing the proceeds of its works, property, and debts among those entitled thereto."

The proceedings between the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company and John McConihay for the appropriation of the lands in controversy for right of way and depot pur- [212] poses for its railroad took place in 1853, and whatever title he acquired by virtue of those proceedings vested after the Code of 1849 took effect. It is contended on the part of the appellee that the nature and character of that title are determined by that Act, and not by the Act of March 11, 1837; although it is also insisted that if the Act of 1837 remained in force for that purpose, nevertheless there has been no failure of title by reason of its conditions.

In our opinion the case is not governed by the 20th section of the Act of March 11, 1837. The Act to incorporate the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company does not adopt all the provisions of that Act in every particular as a part of its charter, but only "so far as the same are applicable to and not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act." A manifest difference exists between such a road as that constructed under the charter of the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company for the purpose of transporting coal from the mines to a navigable river or other railroad, and such railroads as were within the purview of the Act of March 11, 1837, which were railroads for the general transportation of persons and property between distant points. It is in reference to the latter alone that we think the provisions of section 20 apply; the railroads referred to in that section plainly being such that, in case of abandonment by the company owning the same, the State of Virginia might take possession thereof and maintain them in the state and manner required by the charter of the company. The provisions of that section, in our opinion, are not applicable to the case of such a road as that of the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company.

Were it otherwise, however, we are satisfied that the charter of the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company, in this particular, was altered by the operation of the Code of 1849. Chapter 61 of that Act applies to companies incorporated to construct and carry on works of internal improvement, including railroads. The first section declares that "Every company which is govered by the Act passed on the 7th day of February, 1817, prescribing [213] certain general regulations for the incorporation of turnpike companies, or by the Act passed on the 11th day of March, 1837, prescribing certain general regulations for the incorporation of railroad companies, and every company which, after the commencement of this Act, shall be incorporated to construct any work of internal improvement, shall be governed by the provisions contained in the 57th chapter and in this chapter, so far as they can apply to such company without violating its charter." By the express terms of this section every company previously incorporated, but in existence when that Act went into operation, and which, by the terms of its charter, was governed by the Act of March 11, 1837, thenceforward was to be governed by the provisions contained in the Code. This includes the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company, which, on July 1, 1850, when the Code took effect, was such a corporation. The Code of 1849 contained no such provision as that embraced within the terms of section 20 of the Act of March 11,

1887. On the contrary, it provides, in section 31, that, "If the works of any company be not commenced and completed within the time prescribed by its Act of incorporation, or if after such works be completed the company shall abandon the same, or for three consecutive years cease to use and keep them in good repair, in each of these cases the State may either proceed by quo warranto or take possession of the works and property of such company; and, in case of so taking possession, shall keep the same in good repair, and have all the rights and privileges previously vested in the company. But the State shall pay the company for such works and property the full value of the same at the time it takes possession thereof."

The twenty-eighth section of title 17 is as follows: "When any corporation shall expire or be dissolved, or its corporate rights and privileges shall have ceased, all its works and property and debts due to it shall be subject to the payment of debts due by it, and then to distribution among the members according to their respective interests; and such corporation may sue and be sued as before for the purpose of collecting debts due to it, prosecuting rights under previous contracts with it, and enforcing its liabilities, and distributing the proceeds of its works, property, and debts among those entitled thereto."

[214] The appellants rely upon the circumstance that the charter of the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company was passed after the enactment of the Code of 1849, but before it went into operation, as taking it out of the provisions of the Code when it did go into effect; but this circumstance seems to us entirely immaterial. When the Code went into effect on July 1, 1850, the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company was an existing corporation, governed in certain particulars by the Act of March 11, 1887. The Code when it went into effect operated upon this company, and from that time became a part of its charter. The title which it afterwards acquired in 1858 was, therefore, not affected by the provisions of the Act of March 11, 1887, but was held by it in accordance with the provisions of the Code of 1849.

It is argued, however, by the appellants, that by the general principles of the common law, the title of the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company was forfeited by the abandonment of the property, and a cesser of the uses for which only it could have been acquired, so that it reverted to John McConihay and his heirs and assigns. There was, however, no intentional abandonment of the property by the company for the uses for which it was acquired. The company became insolvent, unable to pay its debts, and to carry on its business. Its property was taken in execution by judgment creditors; a bill in equity was filed by them for the purpose of subjecting its assets to the payment of their claims. To that suit John McConihay was a party as a judgment creditor, holding a judgment for the amount of the compensation awarded to him for the premises in controversy. That judgment, among others, was paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the very property which his heirs and assigns now seek to recover. Having thus obtained the benefit of the sale on which the title of the appellee is founded by receiving a portion of its proceeds, it is not open to them to question the effect of that sale as a conveyance of the subsisting title of the Winifrede Mining and Manufacturing Company to the land in controversy. It is sufficient, however, to say that the Code of 1849, which governs the case, expressly devotes the property of the company, [215] including this right of way, to the payment of its debts, and that no forfeiture of the title, on the ground of an abandonment, can be enforced, except by the State, and on payment to the company of the value of the property, of which, in consequence of such abandonment, it takes possession.

We find no error in the decree of the District Court, and it is accordingly affirmed.

AMASA SPRAGUE; WILLIAM SPRAGUE, Individually; FANNY SPRAGUE, Individually and as Admrx. of AMASA SPRAGUE, Deceased; MARY SPRAGUE, Individually and as Admrx. of WILLIAM SPRAGUE, Deceased; THE A. & W. SPRAGUE MANUFACTURING COMPANY, AND ZACHARIAH CHAFEE, Trustee, etc.

Guardian and ward—conveyance of minor's interest in partnership property to corporation—Statute of Rhode Island—debt of partnership to minor becomes debt of corporation—lien—lunacy—power of guardian.

1. Where the guardian of minor heirs conveys, under proper legislative authority, their interest in the property of a partnership to a corporation, which assumes all the debts of the partnership, the business of which it was organized to continue, a debt due the minors from the partnership becomes a general debt of the corporation, and does not continue to be a lien upon the property.

2. The Act of the Legislature of Rhode Island, authorizing such a transfer in the case presented, was as efficacious in relation to the estate of a minor, who was subsequently duly declared to have been of unsound mind from his birth, as it was in relation to the estate of the other children.

3. An ordinary guardian is a sufficient custodian of the person and property of a minor of unsound mind.

The fact that the complainant was a non-resident minor, whose property in Rhode Island was under guardianship, in accordance with the laws of Rhode Island, is nowhere disputed. The validity of the appointment of a guardian under those laws, and the power of such guardian over the disposition of the ward's property in Rhode Island, has been fully settled in the cases of Hoyt v. Sprague and Francklyn v. Sprague, 103 U. S. 613-637 (26: 585-595).

[216] Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

All the essential facts on which this case is based are the same as those involved in the cases of Hoyt v. Sprague, and Francklyn v. Sprague, reported in 103 U. S. 613 [26: 585]. The evidence used in those cases was imported into this by agreement of the parties, and only one new feature has been added: this is the mental incapacity of the present complainant, Edwin Hoyt, called Edwin Hoyt, Jr., in the former cases. The bill of complaint contains substantially the same statements as the bills in those cases, with the addition of an averment that the complainant, by certain proceedings had in the Supreme Court of New York in April, 1874, commonly called a commission of lunacy, was declared to be of unsound mind, incapable of taking care of himself or his property; that he had been in that condition during all his life; and that said Charles G. Francklyn and William S. Hoyt were appointed the committee of his person and estate. The principal facts out of which the litigation grew are stated in the report referred to; but it is proper to restate such of them here as may have a special bearing upon the questions growing out of the alleged incapacity of the complainant.

The brothers, Amasa and William Sprague the elder, were engaged as manufacturers in Rhode Island under the firm of A. & W. Sprague, for many years prior to December, 1843, when Amasa Sprague died, leaving a widow, Fanny Sprague, two sons, Amasa and William the younger, and two or three daughters. William, the survivor, with the consent of his brother's widow, who became administratrix of his estate, continued the business under the same partnership name, for the joint benefit of himself and his brother's family, until October, 1856, when he died, leaving a widow, Mary Sprague, a son, Byron Sprague, and four grandchildren, being the children of a deceased daughter, Susan S. Hoyt, wife of Edwin Hoyt, of New York. This daughter had died in October, 1853, and her children [217] were Sarah Hoyt, Susan S. Hoyt, born October, 1845, William S. Hoyt, born January 1, 1847, and Edwin Hoyt, the complainant, born July 16, 1849. Shortly prior to the death of William Sprague the elder, he had taken into the firm as partners with him, his son Byron, and his two nephews, Amasa and William Sprague the younger; so that at the death of William Sprague, in October, 1856, these young men were the surviving partners of the firm. By the enterprise of William Sprague, the property of the joint concern had greatly accumulated, being estimated at the time of his death at several millions of dollars. His widow, Mary, took out letters of administration on his estate; and, on the petition of her son-in-law, Edwin Hoyt, she was appointed guardian of the property and estate, in Rhode Island, of each of her grandchildren, who were the children of the said Edwin Hoyt, and all under fourteen years of age. This was done in February, 1857.

The parties then interested in the joint property of A. & W. Sprague were the two families of Amasa and William Sprague the elder in equal parts; that of the former being represented by Fanny Sprague, widow and administratrix, and her two sons Amasa and William (who had purchased the interest of their sisters); and that of the latter being represented by Mary Sprague, widow and administratrix, her son Byron, and her four grandchildren, the Hoyts, whose interests were represented by her as guardian of their property and estate. This made the property divisible into six equal shares: each widow being entitled to one third of her husband's part, and the two sons of Amasa being each entitled to a third of his interest; Byron Sprague being entitled to one third of his father's interest, and the Hoyt children being entitled to the remaining third. As the factories were in successful operation, and as a division of the property was deemed undesirable, all the parties concerned capable of exercising judgment, including Edwin Hoyt, the father of the four minors, were agreed upon the expediency of continuing the operation of the works as a joint concern for the benefit of all, in proportion to their several interests; and it was so done, the factories and operations being conducted by Amasa and William Sprague the younger, and Byron Sprague. In 1862 Byron Sprague sold out his interest to his cousins Amasa and William for $600,000, which gave to each of the latter a share and a half of the entire six shares.

Soon after this, two charters were obtained from the Legislature of Rhode Island, for the purpose of vesting the property of the concern in corporate bodies, one to be called the A. & W. Sprague Manufacturing Company, and the other the Quidnick Company.

In January, 1863, Mary Sprague, as guardian of the estate of her four minor grandchildren, together with their father, Edwin Hoyt, presented a petition to the Legislature of Rhode Island, representing that they deemed it advisable and expedient that the interests of the said minors should be vested in such corporation or corporations as should be organized under and in accordance with the charters granted as aforesaid, and praying as follows:

"Wherefore, your petitioners pray that whenever any corporation or corporations shall be organized under either or any of the charters aforesaid, and conveyance or conveyances shall become necessary to vest the title of the parties interested in any of said property in any such corporation or corporations, upon the execution by said Mary and Edwin as principals of every such bond or bonds in such penal sum or sums, and with such sureties, as the Court of Probate of Warwick shall require, conditioned for the investment of the amount of the full value of the interests hereinafter prayed to be conveyed in the capital stock of any such corporation or corporations to which such interests shall be conveyed as hereinafter prayed, in the names and for the use and benefit of said minors; and on the delivery of such bond or bonds to said court of probate, the said Mary in her capacity as guardian may make, execute, seal, acknowledge, stamp, and deliver all and any such conveyance and conveyances to any such corporation or corporations as shall be necessary to vest the title of the said minors in and to said property in any such corporation or corporations; and that any such conveyance [219] or conveyances, so executed, acknowledged, stamped, and delivered, shall be deemed and held as valid and effectual in law and equity to vest the title of said minors in any such corporation or corporations as though the same were executed, acknowledged, and delivered by said minors after attaining their majority; and as in duty bound will ever pray.

EDWIN HOYT."

In pursuance of this petition, the Legislature, on the 9th of March, 1863, passed a Resolution, having the effect of a law, by which it was enacted as follows:

"Voted and resolved, That the prayer of said petition be, and the same is hereby, granted; and the said Mary Sprague, in her capacity as guardian of the estate of Edwin Hoyt, Jr., Susan S. Hoyt, Sarah Hoyt, and Wm. S. Hoyt, is hereby authorized and fully empowered, whenever any corporation or corporations shall be organized under either or any of the charters heretofore granted by the General Assembly of this State, and conveyance or conveyances shall become necessary to vest the title of the parties interested in any of said property so held, owned, or managed by the firm of A. & W. Sprague in any such corporation or corporations, to make, execute, seal, acknowledge, stamp and deliver all and any such conveyance and conveyances to any such corporation or corporations as shall be necessary to vest the right, title and interest of the said minors in and to said property, or any portion thereof, in any such corporation or corporations; and that any such conveyance or conveyances, so executed, acknowledged, stamped and delivered, shall be deemed and held as valid and effectual in law and in equity to vest the title of said minors in any such corporation or corporations as though the same were executed, acknowledged, stamped and delivered by said minors after attaining their majority; Provided, That before the delivery of any such conveyance or conveyances the said Mary shall have executed and delivered to the Court of Probate of Warwick every such bond or bonds with herself in her said capacity and said Edwin Hoyt as principals, in such penal sum or sums and with such [220] sureties as said probate court shall require, conditioned for the investment of the amount of the full value of the interests of said minors which she shall then be about to convey in the capital stock of any such corporation or corporations to which the same shall be conveyed in the names and for the use and benefit of said minors."

This legislative Act was adjudged by this court, in the cases of Hoyt and Francklyn v. Sprague, before mentioned, to be valid and effective to authorize Mary Sprague, as guardian of the estate of the four minors, to convey their interests in the A. & W. Sprague property to the corporations named.

The terms of the Act were duly complied with, and by an agreement executed on the first of April, 1865, by and between all the parties interested in the property, in their various capacities, including Edwin Hoyt, as father of the four minor children, and Mary Sprague, as the guardian of their estate, and as administratrix of her husband's estate, referees were appointed to appraise the entire property and to report the amount of each one's interest therein, with a view to adjust the several shares of capital stock in the corporations to be formed to which each would be entitled. This duty was performed by the referees, who brought the accounts down to the 31st day of March, 1865, and reported that on that day the cash value of the whole property and assets, exclusive of the Quidnick Company property (which was appraised by itself in consequence of outside parties having some interest therein), was $6,782,906.69, and that the liabilities amounted to $2,871,921.79, leaving the net value of the estate equal to $3,860,984.90. The different interests in this amount they reported to be as follows:

Mary Sprague's individual interest	$624,984 69
Fanny Sprague's interest	625,511 69
William Sprague's interest	978,867 42
Amasa Sprague's interest	978,867 42
Mary Sprague, guardian of children of Susan Hoyt	652,753 68

[221] They then stated the result of the individual accounts of the several parties with the firm, showing what each was indebted thereto, and what was due to each; and, in this connection, the sum of $188,333.33 was credited as due from the firm to Mary Sprague, guardian of the heirs of Susan Hoyt, to equalize the amounts drawn out of the firm by the two Rhode Island families for their family expenses.

The stock of the A. & W. Sprague Manufacturing Company was awarded by the referees to the various parties, according to the value of their respective interests in the property, independently of the amounts due from or to them respectively, which last amounts remained as debts due to or from the Company. When the property was conveyed to the Corporation, as hereinafter mentioned, it was stipulated, as an express condition, that the Corporation was to assume all the liabilities of the firm of A. & W. Sprague. There being found due to Mary Sprague, as administratrix, for a dividend previously made by the firm, the sum of $164,250.26, she elected to take stock for that, instead of the liability of the Company; which increased the total amount of the stock to the sum of $4,025,235.16. This being divided into 10,000 shares, made each share equal in value to $402.52, and gave to Mary Sprague, as guardian of her grandchildren, including their portion of the shares allotted to her as administratrix, 1751 shares, or 439 shares each.

The Quidnick property was valued at $776,065, and divided into 5000 shares, of which 489 shares were allotted to Mary Sprague as guardian of her grandchildren, including their portion of the shares allotted to her as administratrix, being 122 shares to each.

The precise interests of the parties having thus been ascertained, in August, 1865, Mary Sprague, as guardian of the Hoyt children, applied to the Probate Court of Warwick (the proper jurisdiction) for an order to authorize her, in pursuance of the Act of Assembly, to convey to the respective corporations the interest of her wards in the properties of the firm of A. & W. Sprague, and of the Quidnick Company, in exchange for the shares to which they were entitled by the report of the referees. On [222] the 5th of August, 1865, an order was made accordingly; and on the 9th of August, 1865, an instrument was executed by all the parties, including Mary Sprague, as guardian of the Hoyt children, by which, after reciting the powers given to her by the Act of Assembly and the order of the probate court, they conveyed and transferred to the A. & W. Sprague Manufacturing Company all their respective right, title and interest in the entire property of A. & W. Sprague, except the Quidnick property, including all the right, title and interest of said minors, with the following stipulation, to wit: "It being expressly understood that this conveyance is made upon condition that the grantees are to assume the liabilities of said firm of A. & W. Sprague, in accordance with said agreement of reference hereinbefore referred to."

A similar deed of conveyance was made to the Quidnick Company (corporation) for the Quidnick property and assets.

Thereupon, after adjusting the fractional shares, each party was credited, on the stock ledgers of the respective companies, with the shares to which they were severally entitled, the Hoyt children being each credited with 439 shares of the A. & W. Sprague Manufacturing Company, and 122 shares of the Quidnick Company.

In June, 1866, Mary Sprague, as guardian of her said grandchildren, presented to the probate court a petition for the appointment of appraisers, to appraise the property of her wards in her hands, in order that she might return an inventory thereof. Appraisers were accordingly appointed, and performed the duty required of them, and presented inventories and appraisements of each ward's estate, which were sworn to by Mary Sprague, and filed, and approved by the court on the 13th of August, 1866. That of Edwin Hoyt, Jr., with which the others substantially corresponded, was as follows, to wit:

124 shares National Bank of Commerce, $51	$	6,324 00
1 U. S. 6 per cent bond		108 50
2 N. Y. Prov. & Boston R. R. bonds, $950		1,900 00
439 shares A. & W. Sprague Mf'g Co. stock, 402$^{5}/_{8}$		176,707 82
122 shares Quidnick Co. stock		18,935 98
Cash		387 44
		$304,363 74
Dividend due from A. & W. Sprague, as cash, March 31, 1865, with interest from that date		47,083 34
		$351,447 08

Mary Sprague, in her answer states that the bank stock and bonds had been purchased by her, before the organization of the corporations, with moneys drawn by her from time to time, as guardian, from the firm of A. & W. Sprague. The dividend of $47,083.34, "due from A. & W. Sprague, as cash, March 31, 1865," was one fourth of the sum of $188,333.33 allowed to the Hoyt children, as before stated.

At the same time, Mary Sprague presented her account, as guardian, with each of her wards, based on the appraisement, notice of such presentation having been duly published in pursuance of a previous order; and the accounts were severally allowed on the same 13th of August, 1866.

After these proceedings were had, Mary Hoyt resigned her guardianship, which resignation was accepted by the court; and on the application of Edwin Hoyt, the father, stating that it was the desire of his three younger children, Susan S. Hoyt, William S. Hoyt, and Edwin Hoyt, Jr., that William Sprague should be appointed guardian of their estate in Rhode Island (Sarah having become of age), the appointment was made as requested, and William

Sprague, as guardian of the estate of the three younger children, on the 1st of September, 1866, gave the requisite bonds, and filed an inventory in each case, the same as had been presented and filed by Mary Sprague, with the addition of a further dividend made by the corporations on the 1st of September, less amounts [224] paid for the benefit of the wards repectively. The account in the case of Edwin Hoyt, Jr., the complainant in this case, duly verified by appraisers, and by the oath of William Sprague, guardian, was as follows, to wit:

124 shares National Bank of Commerce $51		$ 6,324 00
1 U. S. 6 per cent bond		108 50
2 N. Y., Prov. & Boston R. R. bonds, 950		1,900 00

Dividend due from A. & W. Sprague, as cash, March 31, 1865		47,088 34
Dividends due from A. & W. Sprague M'f'g Co., cash, Sept. 1, 1866	$6,585 00

		$255,885 04

At this time Edwin Hoyt, Jr., the now complainant, was seventeen years of age, Susan nearly twenty-one, and William S., nineteen.

The record shows various accounts rendered to Susan and William after they became of age, and various amounts paid them. Whether any further sums were advanced on Edwin's account beyond the $2,979.60 charged in the inventory does not appear. He lived with his father in New York, who was a member of the firm of Hoyt, Sprague & Co., a firm intimately connected with the Rhode Island Companies, and may have had no occasion for advances on account of his interest.

In the fall of 1873 the A. & W. Sprague Manufacturing Company became embarrassed and suspended payment, and on the first of November, 1873, the said Company, together with Amasa and William Sprague, and the said Fanny and Mary Sprague, made an assignment to Zachariah Chafee, of all the property, real and personal, of said Company and of the said parties individually, and of the firm of A. & W. Sprague (excepting shares of capital stock in any corporation) in trust for the benefit of such creditors as should accept, in payment of their debts, the notes of the Company payable in three years from January 1, 1874, with interest. Subsequently, on the 6th of April, 1874, a further assignment was made by said A. & W. Sprague and the A. & W Sprague Manufacturing Company, to said Chafee, of all of said property, in trust, first, for the benefit of such creditors as should come in and take said notes in payment of their debts: and secondly, the residue for the benefit of all other creditors of said parties.

In December, 1873, Susan S. Hoyt, who came of age in October, 1866, and who afterwards married Charles G. Francklyn, received from her guardian, William Sprague, the stocks and bonds mentioned in his inventory of her estate before referred to (except the shares in the A. & W. Sprague Manufacturing Company, which were probably deemed worthless); and William S. Hoyt received the stocks and bonds mentioned in the like inventory of his estate. It is also to be inferred from the pleadings and evidence that Edwin Hoyt, Jr., the complainant, at the same time received the stocks and bonds mentioned in the like inventory of his estate. The bill admits that William Sprague, the guardian, delivered to the complainant (Edwin Hoyt, Jr.,) "123 shares in the Quidnick Company, and certain other shares of stock," to which he informed the said Francklyn and William S. Hoyt the said Edwin was entitled. It also appears that, on the 9th of December, 1873, Edwin Hoyt, Jr., by an instrument executed by him, sold and assigned his Quidnick Company stock (122 shares) to said Charles G. Francklyn, for the sum of $34,000; and on the same day executed a power of attorney to his father, Edwin Hoyt, to transfer the same. Both of these instruments were acknowledged by said Edwin Hoyt, Jr., before a commissioner for the State of Rhode Island, in the City of New York. A week previously to this; namely, on the first of December, 1873, William S. Hoyt went to Providence to get the various stocks transferred by the guardian to the parties for whom they were held, but, not finding him there, wrote him the following letter, to wit:

"PROVIDENCE, Dec. 1, 1873. [226]

"Hon. WILLIAM SPRAGUE:

"DEAR SIR: I come here to get you to transfer to the respective owners the Quidnick and bank stock which you hold as guardian for my sister, brother, and me; but, as you are absent, I leave with Mr. Greene the power appointing me attorney for my brother and sister, and enclose power appointing Mr. Greene attorney to make the necessary transfer, which please execute, and send to him by return mail.

"Yours Truly, W. S. HOYT."

From these statements and proofs it is not only fairly to be inferred that the complainant actually received the bonds and stocks held for him by his guardian, William Sprague, but that his father and the said Charles G. Francklyn and William S. Hoyt his brother-in-law and brother, who now appear as his committee in this suit, dealt with him as a person capable of transacting business as late as December, 1873.

Indeed, in view of the decision of this court in the cases of Hoyt v. Sprague and Francklyn v. Sprague, 103 U. S. 613 [supra], the appellant, by his said committee, does not claim, before this court, anything but his one fourth part of the sum of $188,333.33, which was allowed to the Hoyt children by way of compensation for the amounts drawn out of the concern by the Rhode Island families for their family expenses. The contention is (and that is the matter now presented for consideration), that this sum was never converted into the stock of the Corporation, but remained a lien on the partnership property, and followed it as such in the hands of the Corporation with priority over all other claims against it, except the debts of the firm then due and owing. Can this proposition be maintained? There is no doubt that in 1865, before the property of A. & W. Sprague was conveyed to the Corporation, Mary Sprague, as administratrix of her husband's estate, had a lien on the partnership property (subject to the debts then due) for the whole amount of her interest therein; and it was then in her power, had she thought fit, to have demanded a settlement and distribution of the partnership property according to the [227] several equities of the parties concerned, including the just share of herself and her wards, and, in that share, and as a part of it, the said sum of $188,333.33. But she deemed it more for their advantage (as well as her own) that the property should be kept together, and vested in the corporations proposed to be formed; and in this view she was supported by the opinion and advice of Edwin Hoyt, father of the minors. The Act of the Legislature of March 9, 1863, gave her power to convey all the right, title, and interest of the said minors in and to the property, to the respective corporations. And this she did. By her conveyance, and that of the other interested parties, the entire property and assets of the partnership were conveyed to, and vested in, the corporations, those of A. & W. Sprague in the A. & W. Sprague Manufacturing Company, and those of the Quidnick Company in the Quidnick Corporation, subject, however, to the debts and liabilities of every kind and description. The debts and liabilities of the firm of A. & W. Sprague thereupon became the debts and liabilities of the A. & W. Sprague Manufacturing Company. The property ceased to be partnership property and became consolidated in a unity of interest in the Corporation. The partners ceased to be partners, and became holders of shares in the capital stock of the Company. Their lien as partners ceased when their character of stockholders began. The mutual accounts showed that various sums were due to the several partners from the firm, or from them to the firm. They might have adjusted these individual balances by stock, adding an equivalent in stock to those who had balances of credit, and deducting an equivalent of stock from those whose balances were against them. But they preferred that these balances should stand as debits and credits against or in favor of the Corporation when organized, and they were all disposed of in that way, except one item due to Mary Sprague, as administratrix, for a dividend formerly made by the firm, as before stated. This she preferred to take in stock, and the others consented to it; and she afterwards allotted to her wards their proper share of it. The sum of $188,333.33 which had been credited to Mary Sprague as [228] guardian of her grandchildren, to equalize the sums drawn out by the other parties for family expenses, she preferred to stand as a debt of the Corporation, as it had been a debt of the firm. It was so arranged. The Corporation, by the terms of the transfer of all the property, succeeded to and assumed all the debts and liabilities of the firm, this amongst the rest. This liability was treated exactly like all others, whether due to the partners or to strangers. It was treated as a debt.

Now, can it be justly contended that these debts due to the several partners, when they became the assumed debts of the Corporation, continued to be liens upon the property, as they had been when it was partnership property? We think not. This would have been subversive of the whole plan. The relation of the parties to the property was entirely changed. Their lien as partners, as well as their character of partners, was extinguished. A conveyance or release of property by one who has a lien on it, necessarily extinguishes the lien. Mary Sprague, as administratrix and guardian, after conveying to the Corporation all her interest and the interest of her wards in the property, parted with all right in it, and accepted in lieu of it shares for her aliquot part in the body of it, and the assumption and engagement of the Corporation to pay the balance due to her on the accounts. Having conveyed and parted with the property by virtue of an authority conferred by law, her lien upon it was gone; and those who claim through and under her cannot set up any such lien.

It cannot be said that she sacrificed the interests of her wards by retaining the claim as a debt instead of taking stock for it, as she might have done; because a debt always has priorty over capital stock, and is a more favored claim in the law.

The argument that the Corporation, being the creature of the partners, was not a bona fide purchaser, and must be considered as having taken the property subject to all partnership equities against it, is not a sound one. The constitution of the Corporation, and the transfer to it of the property, were authorized by law, and were intended to settle and extinguish these equities, and to place the concern on a new footing; and the very parties entitled to equities [229] were the ones who organized the Corporation, and made the conveyance to it. Besides, it is not the Corporation alone which is concerned in the transfer, but the creditors who trusted it after it was formed. They, or at least the great mass of them, certainly stand in the position of bona fide claimants against its property and assets. They may not be able to claim any precedency over the former partners having debts due to them, but they stand on an equal footing with them.

With these views as to the effect of the conveyance of the interest of the Hoyt children to the A. & W. Sprague Manufacturing Company, the proceedings taken in 1874 by C. G. Francklyn and Wm. S Hoyt, to have the complainant in this case declared to be of unsound mind from his birth, cannot have any effect to change the conclusion which we reached in the former cases. Whether he was of unsound mind or not, Mary Sprague was the lawful guardian of his property and estate in Rhode Island from the time of her first appointment in 1857, when he was seven years old, and continued such, with all the rights and powers of a guardian, until she resigned that charge in 1866; and the Act of the Legislature was just as efficacious in relation to his estate as it was in relation to that of the other children. As long as he was a minor, an ordinary guardian was all the custodian of either his person or estate that was required. It was only after he became of age and the power and functions of the guardian ceased, that a committee to take charge of his person and estate was needed.

In Shelford on Lunacy it is said: "It seems that a commission of lunacy may issue against an infant; but as the court of chancery has power over infant wards of court and their estates, such a proceeding seems unnecessary during the minority of the ward, except under particular circumstances, when the more ample powers given in lunacy may be required for managing their estates." In Stock on Non Compotes Mentis, it is also said, that "Infancy is not a ground for withholding [a commission of lunacy], except in so far as it renders such a proceeding unnecessary, by subjecting the infant to another protective power of the Chancellor." Both writers refer to a case cited in [230] argument in Ex parte Hals, 2 Ves. Sr. 403. In the present case, no word of the complainant's imbecility was ever heard until after the insolvency of the company; and even if it had appeared whilst he was a minor that he was of unsound mind, the legislative Act gave full power to the guardian to dispose of his estate, in the manner she did, and removed all objections on that score.

The decree of the Circuit Court is, therefore, affirmed.

CITY OF JOLIET. Appt., v. JOSEPH HILLER FOSTER ET AL.

122 US 639

The decree of the court below enjoining the City of Joliet, Illinois, its officers and employés, from interfering with the appellees in completing, maintaining, operating and repairing the system of water works owned by them, is affirmed by a divided court.

[No. 1114.]

Submitted Feb. 7, 1887. Decided March 21, 1887. Rehearing denied April 11, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Affirmed.

The bill in this case was filed by the appellees to perpetually enjoin the appellant, its officers and employés, from interfering with the complainants in maintaining, operating and repairing a system of water works in the City of Joliet, Illinois, to which the complainants derive title as successors of one Jesse W. Starr, Jr., who held under certain contracts with said City. The court below held that the complainants by virtue of certain foreclosure proceedings had succeeded to all the rights of said Starr, and the City of Joliet Water Works Company, including all of the rights acquired by said Starr under the original contract and the supplemental contracts with the City of Joliet; that said system of water works was completed in substantial compliance with the requirements of said contracts, except as to the covenants of said Starr concerning the sinking of artesian wells, the construction of a receiving reservoir, and the capacity to throw five streams of water to a height of one hundred feet; that the complainants were entitled to complete and maintain said system of water works in accordance with the provisions of said contracts; that said contracts and the rights of the complainants thereunder were not forfeited by the resolutions of the city council of said City, of December 18, 1881; and that said City was not, under the circumstances of the case, at the date of said resolutions nor at the date of the hearing in said court, entitled to declare or enforce a forfeiture of said contracts or of the rights of the complainants thereunder. The decree enjoined said City, its officers and employés from interfering with the complainants in the enjoyment of their said rights, provided that they should, within a time named, comply with the conditions of said contracts as respects the artesian wells, the receiving reservoir and the capacity of their works to throw five streams of water to a height of one hundred feet. For the opinion of the court below, fully stating the case, see Foster v. City of Joliet, 27 Fed. Rep. 899.

Messrs. Thomas Dent and Melville W. Fuller, for appellant.

Mr. J. L. High, for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite announced that the decree of the court below is affirmed by a divided court.

Petition for rehearing denied.

THATCHER HEATING COMPANY ET AL., Appts., v. JOHN H. BURTIS ET AL. [286]

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 286-295.)

Patent law—fireplace heaters—claim for combination, void for want of novelty.

The claim for a combination, no matter how or by what means it is or may be effected, in letters patent No. 104376, for improvements in fireplace heaters, is void for want of novelty.

[No. 150.]

Argued April 5, 1887. Decided April 18, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Opinion below, 12 Fed. Rep. 569. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. B. F. Lee, for appellants.

Mr. A. J. Todd, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opin- [287] ion of the court:

This is a bill in equity filed December 18, 1875, by the appellants, as assignees of John M. Thatcher, to restrain the alleged infringement of letters patent No. 104376, dated June 14, 1870, granted to John M. Thatcher for certain new and useful improvements in fireplace heaters. There was a decree below dismissing the bill, from which the complainants prosecute the present appeal.

The patentee in his specification describes his invention as follows:

"My invention consists, first, of a base burning fireplace stove, in which are combined the following elements, namely: A cylinder or body projecting outward from the mantel or frame, a fuel magazine or feeder within the said cylinder, and an opening through which the said magazine can be fed from above. The object of this part of my invention is to increase the capacity of the fuel magazine; secondly, of a base burning fireplace stove or heater in which the magazine or feeder is extended to the feed opening of the outer casing, so that there may be no open space across which to project the fuel on feeding the magazine; thirdly, in the combination, with a fireplace stove or heater, of a feeder or magazine projecting above the top of the heater, so as to increase the capacity of the said magazine.

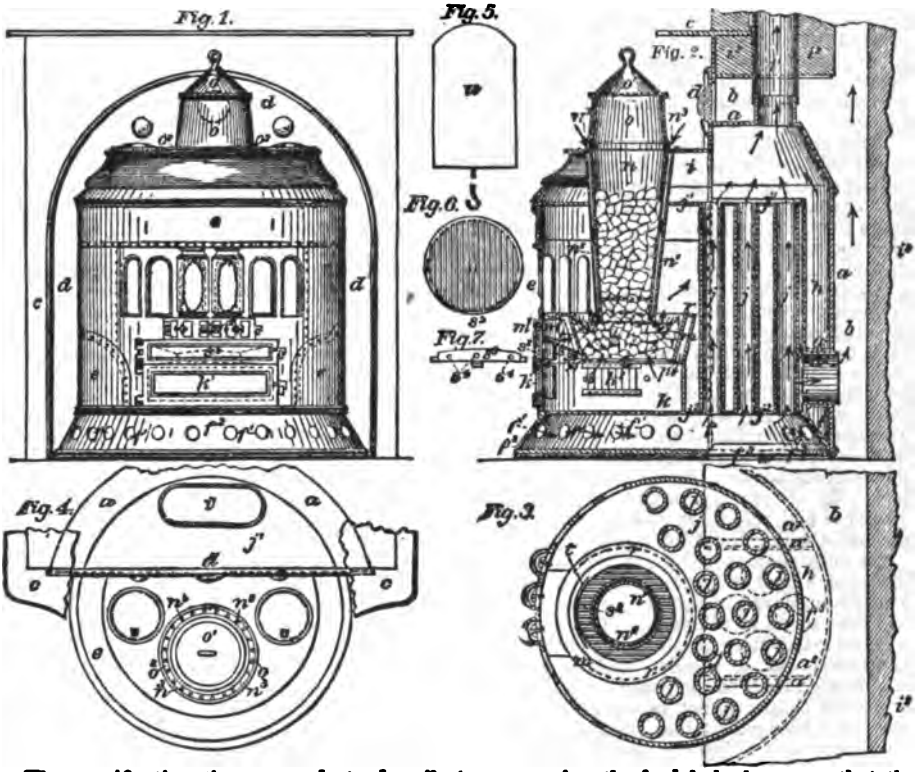
"Figure 1 is a front view of my improved [288] fireplace heater; Fig. 2, a vertical section of the same; Fig. 8, a sectional plan; Fig. 4, a plan view with part of the mantel removed; Fig. 5, a view of the "slicer" or plate to be introduced into the fire pot under the "feeder," for the purpose of holding up the coal which is unconsumed when the clinkers, ashes, etc., in the lower part of the fireplace have to be removed; Fig. 6 is a plan view of the grate, and Fig. 7 an edge view of the grate."

relate especially to the top feeding arrangements of a fireplace stove or heater. I will now refer more particularly to these improvements. [289]

"In constructing my improved heater I have so combined three elements or features as to produce an important result. These features are as follows: First, a cylinder or body of the heater projecting outward from the frame or mantel; second, a feeder or fuel magazine within the cylinder; and, thirdly, an opening through which the said magazine can be fed from above.

"While fireplace stoves or heaters with protuberant cylinders and feeders or magazines were known prior to the date of my invention, I am not aware that the above combination of three features above referred to—namely, a top feeding arrangement, a protuberant cylinder permitting such an arrangement, and a magazine within the cylinder—has ever been known or used prior to my invention of the same.

"It has been the practice to so construct base-burning fireplace stoves or heaters that the fuel had to be introduced into the feeder or magazine through a doorway in front; hence the magazine was of a very limited capacity. By



The specification then proceeds to describe in detail the various parts and arrangements of the heater, but as that portion is not material to a determination of the questions arising in the case it is omitted. The specification then proceeds as follows:

"A more minute description of my improved heater than that given above will be unnecessary, as several of the parts described and illustrated in the drawings form the subjects of other patents, and my present improvements so arranging the feed hole, however, that the fuel can be introduced into the magazine from above, the capacity of the magazine is increased—a result which I especially aimed at in adopting the first part of my invention; namely, the above mentioned combination, and in the production of my top-feeding, base-burning fireplace stove.

"The second part of my invention consists in extending the feeder or magazine to the feed hole of fireplace stoves. This not only increases the capacity of the magazine to some extent, but an uninterrupted passage or guide is afforded for the introduction of fuel into the magazine through the opening in the outer casing.

"The capacity of the magazine is still further increased, in the present instance, by carrying the feeder up above the top of the heater, by placing thereon a movable section, o, furnished with a cover, o^1, which has to be lifted off when coal has to be introduced into the magazine."

The first and second claims, which are alone involved in this controversy, are as follows:

"1. A base burning, fireplace stove, in which are combined the following elements; namely, a cylinder or body projecting outward from the mantel or frame, a fuel magazine or feeder [290] within the cylinder, and an opening through which the said magazine can be fed from above.

"2. A fireplace stove or heater, in which the magazine is extended to the feed opening of the outer casing."

The case turned in the circuit court on the question of the validity of the patent on the ground of want of novelty in the invention in view of the state of the art at its date. In passing upon this question on final hearing, Judge Wallace, in his opinion, stated the grounds of his decree dismissing the bill, as follows:

"It is conceded that these claims are to be construed broadly, so as to cover the combination of a fireplace heater having a body projecting outwards from the mantel or frame, and a furnace like portion in the chimney behind the mantel, with a fuel receptacle within the cylinder of the heater, which will preserve a supply of unignited coal while the heater is in operation, and an opening through which the magazine can be fed from above, the magazine extending to this opening. Inasmuch as the heater was old, and the fuel receptacle with the described opening was old when located within an ordinary coal stove, what Thatcher accomplished was merely the advantageous location of the fuel receptacle within the fireplace heater. As the complainants' expert, Mr. Brevoort, states: 'The problem Thatcher had before him was to place the fuel magazine within the Bibb & Augee heater.'

"It must be conceded that it was not obvious that such a fuel magazine could be advantageously employed in such a heater. Attempts had been made by others to do the same thing without satisfactory result, but Thatcher's organization was a success, and immediately commended itself to the public But Thatcher's broad claims cannot be sustained. There may have been patentable novelty in the means he employed to adjust the parts in the new organization, but there was none in merely bringing those parts together. They did not perform any new function in the new arrange-[291] ment. The fuel magazine does just the same work in the new structure it did in the ordinary coal stove. All the other parts of the fireplace heater operate precisely as they would if the ordinary fuel pot were used instead of the substituted magazine. The parts do not co-operate to produce a new result. By their aggregation the new structure contains all the advantages which resided before separately in several structures. The new heater is, therefore, a better heater than any which preceded it, but it does not present a patentable combination, irrespective of the means employed to adjust the several parts into efficient relations to each other.

"As, concededly, the claims of the patent are not to be limited to any such combination, they must be held void for want of patentable novelty." 12 Fed. Rep. 569.

On this appeal, counsel for the appellants contest the accuracy of the positions of the circuit court on which its decree is founded, and in opposition thereto contend: First. That it was sufficient to support the patent that Thatcher found out that the fuel magazine was useful in its new situation, and that its use in this new situation was not obvious to those skilled in the art; in other words, that Thatcher having succeeded in making a better fireplace heater than any that had gone before it, by doing something that was not obvious to those skilled in the art, what he did involved invention as distinguished from mere mechanical skill. Second. That as regards fireplace heaters, the fuel magazine did perform a new function, because its use was never before known in such structures. Third. That the parts of the combination stated in the claims did not constitute a mere aggregation, but co-operated to produce a new result. This new result, it is claimed, consisted in securing in fireplace heaters a uniform and steady heat that could be regulated for their own purposes by the occupants of the upper rooms, heated by means of furnace registers, at the same time furnishing heat for the room in which it was situated by means of a heater that did not require frequent attention. The result of the contention on these points as claimed is that the fireplace heater of the patent, containing a magazine extending to the outer casing of the heater, capable of holding a supply of unignited coal, and feeding the same to the fire, was patentable as [292] a new article of manufacture.

Mr. Brevoort, the principal expert on behalf of the appellants, states the case on their part in his testimony as follows:

"The problem which Thatcher had before him was to place the magazine of his patent within the Bibb & Augee fireplace heater, or rather, his invention may be said to have consisted in the conception of the idea of taking out the fuel chamber or pot of the Bibb & Augee device, and substituting therefor a magazine of the kind shown in the Thatcher patent, the execution of which conception, if successful, had for its object to confer upon the fireplace heater the regularity and steadiness of action which alone could be secured by the use of a magazine standing ready always to automatically feed the fire whenever it may become necessary. Now, it was not at all an obvious thing that this large mass of unignited coal could be put within the comparatively limited compass necessary for the ordinary fireplace heater in place of the incandescent coal contained in the pot or fuel chamber of the Bibb & Augee heater, and still leave a heater which would be successful. Indeed, one of the defendants' witnesses in this case placed a magazine in a fireplace heater, tried it, and abandoned it as useless and as a positive injury, rather than, as future experiments have shown, a great benefit, to the structure. Another witness seems to have introduced a magazine into one of his fireplace heaters at about the date of Thatcher's patent. This witness says that he did not think it was important, but says that had he known anything of its importance he would have got a patent for it. These two witnesses clearly show that the putting of a magazine into a fireplace heater was not obviously a good method of improving the old Bibb & Augee heater, and that even after a magazine had been introduced, that its utility was not manifest without experiment and careful trial, and this testimony is given by men who apparently were thoroughly skilled in the art and had had much and long experience in the fireplace heater business. A consideration of the old Nott structure, if it ever [293] existed, as testified to, would have deterred rather than encouraged anyone from introducing such a fuel receptacle as was there shown into a fireplace heater which was required to heat rooms above and below simultaneously. For the reasons above given I think that it required invention to introduce a magazine extending to the top or outer casing of the stove into a fireplace heater having a protuberant front for heating the room in which the heater stood, and a furnace like back for heating the air for the rooms above. Most assuredly, the parts referred to in the first and second claims of the Thatcher patent coact when in action in the production of the result desired. The protuberant body heats the lower room. The mantel or frame separates one portion of the heater from the other, so that the protuberant body may perform its function while the furnace like back may perform its function. The fuel magazine holds the fuel in readiness to supply the fire which is to heat both back and front alike with steadiness and uniformity, the magazine being fed through a hole in the outer casing directly, thus obviating the opening of any doors into the combustion chamber when the fire is to be fed and the consequent cooling off of the heater by admitting fresh air into the device above the grate. By the bringing together of these parts and their joint action one with the other a fireplace heater is formed having advantages over any heater that went before, and which form of heater has gone so extensively and largely into use that it has practically superseded all other forms, as I am informed."

This statement must be considered in connection with the well established and admitted facts in respect to the prior use of fuel magazines in base burning outstanding stoves, so classified as stoves standing detached in the room to be heated, to distinguish them from fireplace stoves or heaters which are partially enclosed by the chimney-piece. Thatcher makes no claim in his patent for the fuel magazine, as long prior to the date of his applica- [294] tion, such a magazine was in common use in what are known as base burning stoves. In construction and in position, with relation both to the burning mass in the pit of the stove and to the outer casing through which it opened, either on the top or at the side of the stove itself, the fuel magazine of the outstanding stove is the same as the fuel magazine when placed in the fireplace heater according to Thatcher's patent. It is admitted that what Thatcher did, and all that he did, was to transfer this well known fuel magazine from its use in an outstanding base burning stove to a fireplace heater, equally well known and in common use as to its arrangement, construction, position, and mode of operation. When this fuel magazine was thus transferred from one kind of stove to another, in its new situation it performed precisely the same function, with respect to the fuel and the fire, as it had always been accustomed to perform in its old place, and the fireplace heater into which it was thus newly placed, so far as the generation and transmission of heat and heated air are concerned, operated precisely as it had habitually done before.

It is true that such a fireplace heater, by reason of the fuel magazine, was a better heater than before, just as the outstanding stove with its similar fuel magazine was a better heater than a similar stove without such a fuel magazine. But the improvement in the fireplace heater was the result merely of the single change produced by the introduction of the fuel magazine, but one element in the combination. The new and improved result in the utility of a fireplace heater cannot be said to be due to anything in the combination of the elements which compose it, in any other sense than that it arises from bringing together old and well known separate elements, which, when thus brought together, operate separately, each in its own old way. There is no specific quality of the result which cannot be definitely assigned to the independent action of a single element. There is, therefore, no patentable novelty in the aggregation of the several elements, considered in itself.

If, however, to adapt these separate elements to each other, so that they can act together in one organization, required the use of means not within the range of mere mechanical skill, then it would be true that the invention of such means for effecting a mutual arrangement of the parts would be patentable. If, in [295] the present case, owing to the necessary form, size, structure and situation of a fireplace heater as ordinarily made and used, there were ascertained difficulties in uniting such a fuel magazine as Thatcher adopted from its known use in outstanding base burning stoves, and those difficulties were overcome by something more than mere mechanical ingenuity, he might have been entitled to a patent, not for the combination, however made, of the fuel magazine and the fireplace heater, but for the means which he had invented for effecting it. Nothing of that, however, appears in this case. The invention described is not of any such device for effecting the combination; no claim is made of that character. The claim made is for the combination, no matter how or by what means it is, or may be effected.

In this view of the case, it is impossible to distinguish it, so far as the rule of decision is concerned, from the cases of Hailes v. Van Wormer, 20 Wall. 87 U. S. 353 [22: 241]; Heald v. Rice, 104 U. S. 737, 754 [26: 910, 916]; Penn. R. R. Co. v. Locomotive etc. Truck Co. 110 U S. 490 [28: 222]; Morris v. McMillin, 112 U. S 244 [28: 702]; Hollister v. Benedict Mfg. Co. 113 U. S. 59 [28: 901]; Thompson v. Boisselier, 114 U. S. 1 [29: 76]; Beecher Mfg. Co. v. Atwater Mfg. Co. 114 U. S. 523 [29: 232]; Gardner v. Herz, 118 U. S. 180 [ante, 158].

There is no escape, we think, from the conclusions reached by the Circuit Court. Its decree is therefore affirmed.

UNITED STATES, Piff.,
v.
BAPTISTE LE BRIS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 278-280.)

Indian Country—introduction of liquors into Indian Reservation—Revised Statutes—construction of.

1. The Reservation of the Red Lake and Pembina Indians, in Polk County, Minnesota, is Indian country within the meaning of section 2139, R. S., prohibiting trade with the Indians in the Indian country without authority.

2. Sections of a statute which are re-enacted in the Revised Statutes are to be given the same meaning they had in the original, unless a contrary intention is clearly manifested. The repeal of a section which defines a term does not of itself change the meaning of the term when found elsewhere in the original connection, and the section so repealed may be referred to to determine the meaning of the term.

[No. 205.]

Submitted April 7, 1887. Decided April 18, 1887.

ON a certificate of division in opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. William A. Maury, Assist. Atty-Gen., for plaintiff.

No counsel appeared for defendant.

[279] Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an information against Baptiste Le Bris under section 2139 of the Revised Statutes, for introducing spirituous liquors, "from some place and territory outside of the Indian country, into the Indian country; to wit, into that part thereof lying and being in the County of Polk in said district, and being and known as the Red Lake and Pembina Indian Reservation." Le Bris demurred to the information, and the judges holding the circuit court have certified to us that, upon the hearing of the issues of law thus presented, their opinions were opposed upon the following questions:

1. Is the Reservation of the Red Lake and Pembina Indians in Polk County, Minnesota, Indian country, within the meaning of section 2139 of the Revised Statutes of the United States?

2. What is meant by Indian country in the heading of chapter 4, title 28, of the Revised Statutes, and in the sections in that chapter which define crimes committed in Indian country?

3. Does section 5596 of the Revised Statutes repeal and abolish the definition of Indian country found in section 1 of the Trade and Intercourse Act of June 30, 1834, 4 Stat. at L. 729?

4. If it does, are all the provisions of chapter 4, title 28, for punishment of crime in Indian country, nugatory?

5. If the provisions of chapter 4, title 28 of the Revised Statutes are not rendered nugatory by section 5596, to what locality do they apply?

The important inquiry is whether the Red Lake and Pembina Indian Reservation has been "Indian country" within the meaning of section 2139 since the Revised Statutes went [280] into effect. That section is a re-enactment in part of section 20 of the Act of June 30, 1834, chap. 161, 4 Stat. at L. 732, as amended by the Act of March 15, 1864, chap. 33, 13 Stat. at L. 29; and it was decided by this court in United States v. 43 Gallons Whisky, 93 U. S. 188 [23: 846], and 108 U. S. 491 [27: 808], that this Reservation was "Indian country" before the revision of the statutes. At that time section 1 of the Act of June 30, 1834, supra, was in force, which defined the Indian country as follows:

"That all that part of the United States west of the Mississippi, and not within the States of Missouri and Louisiana, or the Territory of Arkansas, and also that part of the United States east of the Mississippi River, and not within any State to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, for the purposes of this Act, be taken and deemed to be the Indian country."

This section was not re-enacted in the Revised Statutes, though other parts of the statute were. Consequently the section was repealed by section 5596 of the revision; but still we held in Ex parte Crow Dog, 109 U. S. 556, 561 [27: 1030, 1032], that it might be referred to for the purpose of determining what was meant by the term "Indian country," when found in sections of the Revised Statutes which were re-enactments of other sections of this statute. That decision was made since this case was heard below, and upon its authority we answer the first question certified in the affirmative. The repeal of this section does not of itself change the meaning of the term it defines when found elsewhere in the original connection. The re-enacted sections are to be given the same meaning they had in the original statute, unless a contrary intention is plainly manifested.

As the answer to the first question in the affirmative necessarily covers all that is material in the others, they need not be further referred to, and it is consequently ordered that it be certified to the court below that the first question is answered in the affirmative, and that a further answer to the others is deemed unnecessary.

Practice—affirmance, for want of prosecution of writs of error

This court affirms the judgments of the court below under section 4 of Rule 21 for want of due prosecution of the writs of error, there being no assignments of error as required by section 997 R. S., and no appearance of counsel for plaintiffs in error.

[Nos. 207, 208.]

Submitted April 7, 11, 1887. Decided April 18, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama. Affirmed.

These actions were brought in a state court to recover possession of certain tracts of land with damages for their detention. The trials resulted in verdicts and judgments for the defendant; and on appeal these judgments were affirmed by the court below on the authority of the case of Taylor v. Dugger, 66 Ala. 444; whereupon, the plaintiffs sued out these writs of error.

No counsel appeared for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. James T. Jones, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

These are writs of error brought for the review of judgments of the Supreme Court of Alabama. No assignment of errors was returned with the writ in either of the cases, as required by section 997 of the Revised Statutes. No counsel has appeared for the plaintiffs in error, but the cases have both been submitted by the defendant in error on briefs, without any specification of errors by the plaintiffs, as required by Rule 21, section 2. We therefore affirm the judgment in each case, under section 4 of the same rule, for want of a due prosecution of the writs of error.

Affirmed.

JOHN NASH ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 404-410.)

Jurisdiction—transfer of note to cut off defense—parties — transfer by bank—review of evidence—jurisdiction sustained and bona fide character of transfer denied.

1. The transfer of a note, not to give jurisdiction to the courts of the United States, but to create an ownership which will cut off an anticipated defense, is not of itself enough to make it proper for such courts to refuse to take jurisdiction, if the transfer is complete and such as to enable the assignee to maintain a suit in his own name.

2. In a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage, it is held, upon a review of the evidence, that the facts established thereby show such a transfer of the note secured by the mortgage as to enable the plaintiffs to maintain suit in their own names, but not to entitle them to protection as bona fide holders; said note having been transferred by the holder, a bank, with a separate special guaranty of collection and with directions, given both before and after maturity, in respect to the course to be taken for its collection.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Lawrence Maxwell, Jr., Rufus King and Samuel J. Thompson, for appellants.

Messrs. John Coffey and David S. Hounshell, for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage made by John Nash and Ellen Nash, his wife, to Hugh Colville, under date of December 4, 1876, on certain lands in Logan County, Ohio, the separate property of the wife, to secure a note of the husband for $18,000, payable to the order of Colville, in three years from date, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually; and the chief controversy on the appeal is as to the amount that is due. In the view we take of the case little else is involved except questions of fact. From the testimony we find that for many years prior to July 4, 1879, the Commercial Bank of Cincinnati was an unincorporated banking association, having its office in Cincinnati, Ohio. John Nash, a manufacturer, doing business in that city, either alone or with [405] others, under the name of John Nash & Co., had long been a customer of the bank, making deposits and getting discounts of his business paper as occasion required.

Some days before December 4, 1876, Nash being in want of $12,000 to settle a debt which he owed for iron, and to meet some other liabilities, applied to Colville, the cashier of the bank, for a loan of that amount on real estate as collateral. Colville, after consultation with the directors, agreed to let him have the money, and he thereupon procured the execution by his wife of the mortgage now in suit, and another on a house and lot she owned in Cincinnati to secure another note of his for $7,000, payable to the order of Colville in three years from date, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually. He then took the two notes and mortgages to the bank and placed them as collateral security for his own note for $12,000 at sixty days, which was discounted and placed to his credit in account. At the time this was done it was hoped and expected that Nash would get some one to lend him the money on the mortgages, and thus enable him to take up his note to the bank.

When this arrangement was made, Nash or his firm was indebted to the bank for notes of his customers that had been discounted and not paid at maturity to an amount between $4,000 and $5,000. As the notes which had been discounted were protested and came back, he gave his own notes or those of his firm for the same amount, payable at a future day, which were discounted and the old paper retained as collateral. An effort has been made in this case to show that, at the time the $12,000 was lent, it was agreed that the mortgages should be placed as collateral to the old debt as well as the new; but the preponderance of the evidence is decidedly the other way, and we have no hesitation in finding that no such agreement has been proven.

Nash continued in business until January, 1878, when he failed and made an assignment. In the meantime he had borrowed from the bank another $1,000, which it is conceded was secured by a pledge of the notes and mortgages [406] as collateral. He renewed all his notes to the bank as they became due, until near the time of his failure, paying the interest thereon at each renewal. No payment of interest was ever made, however, on the mortgage notes, and on the 10th of May, 1879, a suit was begun by Colville, who was a citizen of Kentucky, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, for the foreclosure of that for $7,000, on account of default in the payment of interest. While this suit was pending a corporation was organized under the name of the Commercial Bank of Cincinnati, which became in fact the successor of the old bank by taking its good assets and assuming its liabilities. Among the other assets transferred to the corporation were the debts of Nash and his firm, and their collaterals. In making this transfer Colville indorsed the note for $13,000 in blank, and the note and the mortgage for its security were delivered to the new bank. He also made an assignment of his interest in the suit then pending on the other note and mortgage. The president and cashier of the new bank were different from those of the old bank, but some, if not all, the directors of the new were the same as those in the old.

On the 30th of August, 1879, a decree pro confesso was entered in the suit for the foreclosure of the $7,000 mortgage, under which a sale of the mortgaged property was made, which realized $6,532.72 over and above the costs and expenses, and this amount was paid to the new bank on the 28th of November, 1879.

The note of $13,000 fell due December 7, 1879, and on the 12th of November next before its maturity, it was sent by the president of the new bank to Winslow, Lanier & Co., the plaintiffs in this suit, inclosed in a letter, of which [407] the following is a copy:

"CINCINNATI, O., Nov. 12, 1879.

"Mess. Winslow, Lanier & Co., New York.

"GENTS: I enclose herewith note of John Nash with mortgage, dated Dec. 4, 1876, at 3 years, with interest at 8 per cent, for $13,000; the first two years' interest paid.

"I will thank you to place this note to the credit of the bank under discount, and oblige,

"Yours, Very Resp'y,

"(Signed) CHAS. B. FOOTE, Pr's't."

Accompanying the note when sent was this guaranty written on a separate piece of paper:

"The Commercial Bank of Cincinnati hereby guarantees collection and payment of the note of John Nash to the order of Hugh Colville, dated Dec. 4, 1876, for $13,000, at 3 years, with interest at 8 per cent annually, and the mortgage securing the same, if purchased by Mess. Winslow, Lanier & Co. The first two years' interest has been paid.

"(Signed) CHAS. B. FOOTE, Pres't."

Winslow, Lanier & Co. were bankers in the City of New York, and had been for many years the correspondents of the old bank in that city, and the new bank continued the same business relations with them on its organization. On the receipt of the note the credit was given for the amount of the note and one year's interest, less the discount until maturity, as requested. Afterwards the president of the Commercial Bank wrote Winslow, Lanier & Co. as follows:

"COMMERCIAL BANK, CINCINNATI, O.,

"Nov. 28, 1879.

"Mess. Winslow, Lanier & Co., New York.

"GENTS: I have to ask you to notify John Nash and wife (West Liberty, Logan County, Ohio), immediately by letter that you hold the note and mortgage for $13,000 and int., requesting payment accordingly at maturity.

"In your letter to them please say nothing concerning the first two years' interest, as the sum collected by us from other collections may not prove to be sufficient to pay the entire two years' interest, as it was supposed it would. In case this debt should not be paid at maturity I have further to ask that you do not charge it to our ac., but hold it so that suit can be brought by you if necessary. I enclose a letter to me from our att'ys King, Thompson & Maxwell, which please read and return to me.

"Very Respectfully.

CHAS. B. FOOTE, P's."

"CINCINNATI, Dec. 8, 1879. [408]

"Mess. Winslow, Lanier & Co., New York.

"GENTS: I have your favor of 1st inst. It was intended that the guaranty of this bank for the collection and payment of the note of Jno. Nash, dated Dec. 4, 1876, at 3 yrs., with 8 per cent interest, should continue in full force until the final collection of the debt. This guaranty is hereby confirmed and continued in full force until the final collection of the note. I enclose confirmation from Mr. Sherlock to the same effect. "Very Resp't.

"(Signed) CHAS. B. FOOTE, Pres."

"COMMERCIAL BANK, CINCINNATI, OHIO,

Dec. 10, 1879.

"Mess. Winslow, Lanier & Co., New York.

"GENTS: I have your favor of 8th inst. inclosing copy of a letter from Mess. Avery & L'Hommedieu, attorneys for John Nash. I shall be obliged if you will reply to Mess. Avery & L'Hommedieu, notifying them that unless the debt is immediately paid or satisfactorily arranged the note and mortgage will be put in suit by you.

"In case suit becomes necessary I will thank you to place the paper in the hands of the Hon. R. P. Ranney, Cleveland, Ohio (unless you prefer other counsel), with instructions [to] bring suit in U. S. Circuit Court to foreclose the mortgage in your name.

"You will please refer Judge Ranney to Mess. King, Thompson & Maxwell, our att'ys, for any information required for the suit.

"Of course we bear all the expenses.

"Very Resp't,

"(Signed) CHAS. B. FOOTE, Pres."

"COMMERCIAL BANK, CINCINNATI, O.,

"Feb. 20, 1880.

"Mess. Winslow, Lanier & Co., New York.

"GENTS: Your favor of the 19th inst. is at hand. I will thank you to send the note and mortgage of John Nash to Judge Ranney, of Cleveland, in accordance with the terms of my letter of the 10th of Dec.

"Very Resp't,

"(Signed) CHAS. B. FOOTE, Pres't."

[409] In accordance with these directions the note and mortgage were sent to Mr. Ranney, who began this suit for the foreclosure March 19, 1880. Both Nash and his wife answered the bill, denying that the plaintiffs were the holders and owners of the note, and claiming that if they were they took them subject to all defenses which would have been good against Colville, the payee and mortgagee, and that the amount realized from the sale of the property covered by the $7,000 mortgage should be allowed as a credit on the other.

The circuit court sustained this defense and gave a decree accordingly. From that decree this appeal was taken.

The facts established by the evidence, taken together, show, as we think, that when the suit was begun Winslow, Lanier & Co. had such a title to and interest in the note and mortgage as gave them the right to sue therefor in their own names. They had actually discounted the note and placed the proceeds to the credit of the bank in their general account, and it does not appear that this credit had ever been canceled when the suit was brought. But it is equally apparent that they are not either in law or equity entitled to protection as innocent holders for value against the defenses of Nash and wife to the note and mortgage in the hand of Colville or the old bank. As between the old bank and the new we entertain no doubt that the new bank is to be treated in all respects as the successor of the old, taking the assets that were turned over as they stood and assuming the liabilities. All the knowledge of the old bank as to the rights of the parties to the securities transferred is chargeable in law on the new.

The transfer from the new bank to Winslow, Lanier & Co. shows on its face that it was not made in the usual course of business between a western bank and its New York correspondent. The note, which was originally for three years, and secured by mortgage, had less than thirty days to run, and was payable at the Cincinnati bank. It was not even indorsed by the bank in the usual way, but instead, a formal guaranty of collection and payment, on a separate paper, was sent forward to take effect if the purchase was made. The letter accompanying the papers contained not a word of explanation, and even before the maturity of the [410] note the bank began to give directions in respect to the course to be taken for its collection, accompanied by a request that if payment was not made the note should not be charged back in account, but held "so that suit can be brought by you if necessary." These directions were continued after maturity, and so far as appears always followed, even to the time and manner of commencing suit. Under these circumstances we cannot look on Winslow, Lanier & Co. in any other light than as trustees for the bank, and proceeding for the collection on its account; the avails to be credited when realized.

In this court it was claimed in argument that the transfer was collusive for the purpose of creating a case cognizable by the Circuit Court of the United States, and, therefore, should have been dismissed below under the authority of section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470; but we find no sufficient evidence to justify us in reversing the decree and sending the suit back for a dismissal. The transfer was undoubtedly made for the purpose of putting it in the power of Winslow, Lanier & Co. to bring a suit; but this, for anything that now appears might as well have been begun in a state as in a federal court. The object of the bank seems to have been not to give jurisdiction to the courts of the United States, but to create an ownership which would cut off the anticipated defenses of the mortgagors. That of itself is not enough to make it proper for the courts of the United States to refuse to take jurisdiction if the title made by the transfer is complete, and such as will enable the assignee to maintain a suit in his own name at all. To justify a dismissal it must appear that the object was to create a case cognizable under the Act of 1875.

This disposes of the whole case, and the decree is consequently affirmed.

UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
THE MAXWELL LAND-GRANT COMPANY; DENVER AND RIO GRANDE RAILWAY COMPANY; PUEBLO AND ARKANSAS VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY; AND ATCHISON, TOPEKA AND SANTA FÉ RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 325–332.)

Public lands—control of, vested in Congress by Constitution—jurisdiction of courts of equity as to patents, or other evidences of title obtained from the United States by fraud or mistake—testimony must be clear, unequivocal and convincing—presumption of regularity—Mexican grant to Beaubien and Miranda—limitation—confirmance by Congress.

*1. It does not satisfactorily appear that the grant of Governor Armijo of 1841 to Beaubien and Miranda, since ascertained to amount to 1,714,764.94 acres, was of that character which, by the decree of the Mexican Congress of 1824, was limited to eleven square leagues of land for each grantee.

2. It does appear that, though the attention of Congress was turned to this question, it confirmed the grant in the Act of June 21, 1860, to the full extent of the boundaries as described in the petition of claimants.

3. In such case the courts have no jurisdiction to limit the grant, as the Constitution, by article IV, section 1, vests the control of the public lands in Congress. Tameling v. U. S. Freehold & E. Co. 98 U. S. 644 [23: 998].

4. While courts of equity have the power to set aside, cancel, or correct patents or other evidences of title obtained from the United States by fraud or mistake, and to correct under proper circumstances such mistakes, this can only be done on specific averments of the mistake or the fraud, supported by clear and satisfactory proof.

5. The general doctrine on this subject is that, when in a court of equity it is proposed to set aside, to annul, or correct a written instrument, for fraud or mistake in the execution of the instrument itself, the testimony on which this is done must be clear, unequivocal and convincing; and it cannot be done upon a bare preponderance of evidence which leaves the issue in doubt.

6. Where the purpose is to annul a patent, a grant, or other formal evidence of title from the United States, the respect due to such an instrument, the presumption that all the preceding steps required by law had been observed, the importance and necessity of the stability of titles dependent on these official instruments, demand that the effort to set them aside should be successful only when the allegations on which this attempt is made are clearly stated and fully proved.

7. In this case the evidence produces no conviction in the judicial mind of the mistakes or frauds alleged in the bill; and the decree of the circuit court dismissing it is affirmed.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case fully appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. William A. Maury, Asst. Atty-Gen., and J. A. Bentley, Special Assistant, for appellant.

Messrs. Frank Springer and Charles E. Gast, for appellees.

[357] Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

The case before us is an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado.

The decree from which this appeal is taken dismissed a bill brought in that court by the United States against the Maxwell Land-Grant Company, the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company, the Pueblo and Arkansas Valley Railroad Company, and the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company. It was brought by the Attorney-General of the United States, and its purpose was to have a decree setting aside and declaring void a patent from the United States granting to Charles Beaubien and Guadalupe Miranda, their heirs and assigns, a tract of land described in a very extensive survey, which is made a part of the patent. It is stated in the brief of the Assistant Attorney-General in this court that the patent conveys 1,714,764$\frac{74}{100}$ acres of land, lying partly in the Territory of New Mexico and partly in the State of Colorado. This patent is dated May 19, 1879, and seems to be regular on its face in every particular. The bill to set this patent aside was filed in the Colorado Circuit Court on August 25, 1882, which was a little over three years after the patent was issued. By virtue of certain mesne conveyances, and other transactions not necessary to be recited here, it may be stated that the title conveyed by the patent to Beaubien and Miranda inured immediately upon its being issued to the benefit of the Maxwell Land-Grant Company, a corporation which has the beneficial interest in the grant, so far as appears in this record; and the contest is mainly if not exclusively between the United States and that Company.

[358] The original bill filed in the case assailed the grant mainly upon the ground that the patent was issued by the Executive Department of the Government upon the false representations of the defendant, the Maxwell Land-Grant Company, and those whose estate the Company has in the land, and of whose fraudulent actings and doings in the premises the Company had notice at the time it acquired the title. This bill recites the original grant of January 10, 1841, by the Republic of Mexico, which it declares was in due form of law, made to Beaubien and Miranda, citizens of said Republic, and it gives the description of the land and its boundaries which is here the subject of controversy. The bill also declares that said grant and the proceedings had in regard thereto were in due form of law and in accordance with the usages and customs of that country, as more fully appeared by reference to the grant and Act of possession, copies of which were annexed thereto, and that it was duly accepted by the grantees, who immediately thereupon entered into possession of the premises, and that they, and those holding under them, have ever since been in the quiet, peaceable, and exclusive possession thereof.

The bill then declares that the Surveyor-General of the Territory of New Mexico, under the Act of 1854, made a report in favor of this grant; that on June 21, 1860, the Congress of the United States confirmed and ratified it as recommended; and that the patent was afterwards issued upon a survey made by order of the Government under the instructions of the Surveyor-General of New Mexico, approved by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, which patent is made an exhibit to the bill. This original bill then goes on to charge that the survey on which this patent was issued was falsely and fraudulently made, and that the Maxwell Land-Grant Company, and certain parties who made this survey under a contract with the Government, conspired to cheat and defraud the Government of the United States by including a larger amount of land than was intended to be embraced by the original grant of the Republic of Mexico; and it especially charged that about 265,000 acres; to wit, all the [359] lands lying and being in the County of Las Animas, in the State of Colorado, were fraudulently included in this survey, and were of the value of $2,000,000. The main purpose of the bill, and the only specific prayer for relief, is that the survey may be declared void so far as it includes lands within the State of Colorado, though it concludes by praying for general relief.

It is quite obvious that the ground of relief set out in this bill is that the excess of 265,000 acres lying within the present State of Colorado was included within the survey by fraud, and that this fraud should be remedied. No attempt is made in the bill to assail the remainder of the grant or to point out any reason why the patent should not be good for all the lands in New Mexico. After answers had been filed to this bill, and a large amount of testimony taken, there was filed, on the 5th day of December, 1883, an amended bill, which it is now insisted, is substituted for the original bill. In this amended bill, for the first time, it is set up, as a ground for setting aside the patent and survey on which it was made, and having them declared void, that, under the laws of Mexico, at the time it was made, no such grant could exceed eleven square leagues to each individual, and that by virtue of those laws, therefore, the grant to Beaubien and Miranda could not exceed 22 leagues, the equivalent of which is 97,424 acres. The bill then sets out, with something more of particularity, the errors supposed to exist in the survey on which the patent from the United States was based, and the frauds connected with that survey by which the officers of the Government were imposed upon and induced to issue the patent. Much of the testimony, and perhaps most of it, was taken before this amendment was filed; and it is strongly insisted in the brief of the appellees, that the reason for filing it was that the testimony taken in regard to the frauds; and in regard to the mistake of the officer of the Government in running the boundaries of the grant, had failed to establish such fraud and mistake.

Answers and replications were filed in due time, and a large amount of testimony taken, [360] which, with the pleadings, documents and proceedings of the court, and other public bodies, constitute a printed record of nearly nine hundred pages.

The questions which are presented by this record and which demand our consideration may be divided into three:

First. Do the colonization laws of Mexico, in force at the time the grant was made to Beaubien and Miranda, namely, the decree of the Mexican Congress of August 18, 1824, and the general rules and regulations for the colonization of the Territories of the Republic of Mexico of November 21, 1828, render this grant void, notwithstanding its confirmation by the Congress of the United States?

Second. If the grant be valid, is there such a mistake in the survey on which the patent of the United States was issued as justifies the court in setting aside both patent and survey?

Third. Was there such actual fraud in procuring this survey to be made and the patent to be issued upon it as requires that the patent be set aside and annulled?

As regards the first of these propositions, it is undoubtedly true that the decree of the Mexican Congress of 1824, in regard to grants of the public lands, declared, by article 12, that, "It shall not be permitted to unite, in the same hands with the right of property, more than one league square of land suitable for irrigation, four square leagues in superficies of arable land without the facilities of irrigation, and six square leagues in superficies of grazing land."

It has been repeatedly decided by this court that it was the practice of the Government of Mexico, under that article, to limit its grants of public lands in the Territories to eleven square leagues for each individual.

But article 14 of the same decree speaks of "the contracts which the empresarios make with the families which they bring, at their own expense, provided they are not contrary to the laws;" and article 7 of the Rules and Regulations of 1828 speaks of "grants made to empresarios, for them to colonize with many families." It is a well known matter of Mexican history that, by reason of there being vast quantities of unoccupied and unprofitable public land, owned by that government in its ter- [361] ritories, contracts were made with individuals called empresarios, by which they were given very large bodies of land without any regard at all to the eleven league limitation, in consideration that they should bring emigrants into the country and settle them upon these lands with a view of increasing the population, and securing the protection thus afforded against the wild Indian Tribes on the Mexican borders.

There are many things in the history of this grant to Beaubien and Miranda which would seem to indicate that it was understood by the Mexican authorities to be a grant of the class just described.

In the petition of Beaubien and Miranda to Governor Armijo, on which the grant was founded, dated January 8, 1841, there is a very animated description of the condition of the Territory of New Mexico and its natural advantages, which were undeveloped for want of an industrious population. It also contains a description of the land, by its boundaries, which was granted by the Governor in compliance with this petition, and as this description and its true construction is the foundation of the controversy in this suit with regard to the accuracy of the surveys, it is given here:

"The tract of land we petition for to be divided equally between us commences below the junction of the Rayado River with the Colorado, and in a direct line towards the east to the first hills, and from there running parallel with said River Colorado in a northerly direction to opposite the point of the Uña de Gato, following the same river along the same hills to continue to the east of said Uña de Gato River to the summit of the table land (mesa); from whence, turning northwest to follow along said summit until it reaches the top of the mountain which divides the waters of the rivers running towards the east from those running towards the west, and from thence following the line of said mountain in a southwardly direction until it intersects the first hills south of the Rayado River, and following the summit of said hills towards the east to the place of beginning."

The authoritative grant of Governor Armijo, dated three days later, is in the following language: [362]

"SANTA FÉ, January 11, 1841.

"In view of the request of the petitioners, and what they state therein being apparent, this government, in conformity with law, has seen proper to grant and donate to the individuals subscribed the land therein expressed, in order that they make the proper use of it which the law allows. "ARMIJO."

Looking to this question of the nature of the grant, as to whether it was an ordinary grant, it appears by the record that Beaubien made application in April, 1844, to the Governor of the Department, stating that a curate named Martinez was seeking to invade and dispute the rights of the said Beaubien and Miranda in a part of the lands included in their grant. In this petition, remonstrating against a recognition of the claim of Martinez which had been made by the territorial government, he says:

"And not only does the suspension of labor on those lands injure us, for the reason of having incurred heavy expenses, but also a considerable number of families and industrious men, who are willing and ready to settle upon those lands, and to whom we have given lands, a list of which individuals I accompany in order that Your Excellency, seeing their number, may determine what may be proper."

This shows that the grantees were engaged in settling families within the boundaries of their grant.

This matter was referred to the Departmental Assembly, who made a report upon the subject, confirming the grant of the Governor to Beaubien and Miranda, and deciding against the claim of Martinez and his associates. The Assembly in making their report upon this subject declare the statements by which Martinez and his associates had obtained certain privileges within the boundaries of the grant to have been false, and proceed as follows: "And in view of the documents which accredit the legitimate possession of Miranda and Beaubien, and their desires that their colony shall increase in prosperity and industry, for which purpose he has presented a long list of persons to whom they have offered land for cultivation, and who shall enjoy the same rights as the owners of the lands; that the government, having dictated the step for the sole object of ascertaining the truth, that the truth having been ascertained, and the right of the party established, is of the opinion that the aforesaid superior decree be declared null and void, and that Miranda and Beaubien be protected in their property, as having been asked for and obtained according to law."

To this the Governor ordered the response to be made, that, in accordance with the opinion of the Departmental Assembly, thus certified to him, "the order of the 27th of February, issued by this government, forbidding the free use of the land in question, is repealed, and Messrs. Beaubein and Miranda are fully authorized to establish their colony according to the offers made by them when they petitioned for the land which has been granted to them."

It would seem from these orders, decrees, and resolutions of the Governor and Departmental Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, that they must have supposed that the grant was intended for families to be settled upon, and was not one of those in which an individual could only receive a definite quantity of land for the purpose of his own settlement and cultivation. There would have been little cause for the frequent use of the words "colony" and "colonization" and such expressions as "settling families" in the colony, unless such was the view which the granting power took of the nature of the grant.

The effect of the action of the Departmental Assembly in regard to these grants of land within the territories over which they had jurisdiction is one which has been frequently considered in this court, and the importance of their action fully stated. Hornsby v. U. S. 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 224 [19: 900]; U. S. v. Osio, 64 U. S. 23 How. 273 [16: 457].

The final confirmation of this grant by the Congress of the United States in 1860 affords strong ground to believe that that body viewed it as one of this character, and not one governed by the limitation of eleven square leagues to each grantee. The Act by which that was [364] done was approved June 21, 1860, and is entitled "An Act to Confirm Certain Private Land Claims in the Territory of New Mexico." 12 Stat. at L. 71. These claims having been reported favorably to Congress for confirmation by the Surveyor-General of the Territory of New Mexico, were numbered in consecutive order, and referred to in that Act by their numbers. The one now under consideration was number fifteen. The first section of that Act reads as follows:

"That the private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico, as recommended for confirmation by the Surveyor-General of the Territory, and in his letter to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, of the twelfth of January, eighteen hundred and fifty eight, designated as numbers one, three, four, six, eight, nine, ten, twelve, fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, seventeen, and eighteen, and the claim of E. W. Eaton, not entered on the corrected list of numbers, but standing on the original docket and abstract returns of the Surveyor-General as number sixteen, be, and they are hereby, confirmed: Provided, That the claim number nine, in the name of John Scolley and others, shall not be confirmed for more than five square leagues; and that the claim number seventeen, in the name of Cornelio Vigil and Ceran St. Vrain, shall not be confirmed for more than eleven square leagues to each of said claimants."

It will be very clearly perceived by the proviso of this Act that the attention of the framers of the statute was turned to the law of Mexico which limited the ordinary grant of land to each individual to eleven square leagues; for, in regard to claim number seventeen, it was expressly provided that it should not be confirmed for more than eleven square leagues to each of the claimants. As the claim of Beaubien and Miranda was like that of Vigil and St. Vrain in number seventeen, a grant to two persons, it must be obvious that the attention of the framers of the Act was called to the fact that, in the one instance, however large the claim might be, it should only be confirmed for eleven square leagues to each grantee, according to the law of 1824, while in regard to the other, in a like grant to two persons, which the Surveyor-General and the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, as well as the Congress of the United States, must [365] have known included many times eleven square leagues, they made no such restriction.

The second section of the Act of 1860 declares: "That in surveying the claim of said John Scolley it shall be lawful for him to locate the five square leagues confirmed to him in a square body in any part of the tract of twenty-five square leagues claimed by him; and that in surveying the claims of said Cornelio Vigil and Ceran St. Vrain the location shall be made as follows, namely: the survey shall first be made of all tracts occupied by actual settlers, holding possession under titles or promises to settle, which have heretofore been given by said Vigil and St. Vrain, in the tracts claimed by them, and after deducting the area of all such tracts from the area embraced in twenty-two square leagues, the remainder shall be located in two equal tracts, each of square form, in any part of the tract claimed by the said Vigil and St. Vrain selected by them; and it shall be the duty of the Surveyor-General of New Mexico immediately to proceed to make the surveys and locations authorized and required by the terms of this section."

The fair inference from all this is that Congress, in passing this statute, considered some of the grants as being of the character to which the limitation applied, and did not so consider others, though they included immense areas.

But whether, as a matter of fact, this was a grant, not limited in quantity by the Mexican decree of 1824, or whether it was a grant which in strict law would have been held by the Mexican Government, if it had continued in the ownership of the property, to have been subject to that limitation, it is not necessary to decide at this time. By the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, under which the United States acquired the right of property in all the public lands of that portion of New Mexico which was ceded to this country, it became its right, it had the authority, and it engaged itself by that treaty to confirm valid Mexican grants. If, therefore, the great surplus which it is claimed was conveyed by its patent to Beaubien and Miranda was the property of the United States, and Congress, acting in its sovereign capacity upon the question of the validity of [366] the grant, chose to treat it as valid for the boundaries given to it by the Mexican Governor, it is not for the judicial department of this Government to controvert their power to do so. Tameling v. U. S. Freehold & E. Co. 93 U. S. 644 [23: 998].

This case of Tameling, while it cannot be said to be conclusive of the one now before us, for the reason that that was an action of ejectment founded upon a title confirmed by an Act of Congress, in which the title could not be collaterally assailed for fraud or mistake, and the present is a suit attacking the patent and the survey upon which it issued directly by a bill in chancery to set them aside for such fraud and mistake, still the opinion announces principles which, as applicable to this case and as regards the question of the extent of the grant, it would seem should govern it. The title in that case was confirmed to Tameling's predecessor in interest by the same Act which confirmed the grant now in question to Beaubien and Miranda, the one being number fourteen and the other number fifteen, as enumerated in the section of the statute already recited. In regard to that statute, and its effect upon the title confirmed by it, this court, p. 662 [1003] says: "No jurisdiction over such claims in New Mexico was conferred upon the courts; but the Surveyor-General, in the exercise of the authority with which he was invested, decides them in the first instance. The final action on each claim reserved to Congress is, of course, conclusive, and therefore not subject to review in this or any other forum. It is obviously not the duty of this court to sit in judgment upon either the recital of matters of fact by the Surveyor-General, or his decision declaring the validity of the grant. They are embodied in his report, which was laid before Congress for its consideration and action. * * * Congress acted upon the claim 'as recommended for confirmation by the Surveyor-General.' The confirma- [367] tion being absolute and unconditional, without any limitation as to quantity, we must regard it as effectual and operative for the entire tract. The plaintiff in error insists that, under the Mexican colonization laws in force when the grant was made, not more than eleven square leagues for each petitioner could be lawfully granted. As there were in the present instance but two petitioners, and the land within the boundaries in question is largely in excess of that quantity, the invalidity of the grant has been earnestly and elaborately pressed upon our attention. This was a matter for the consideration of Congress; and we deem ourselves concluded by the action of that body. The phraseology of the confirmatory Act is, in our opinion, explicit and unequivocal."

It will be seen that the same question was raised in that case, as in this, in regard to the effect of the decree of the Mexican Congress of 1824 in limiting the extent of the grant, which by its boundaries very largely exceeded the quantity which the two petitioners in that case, as in this, would be entitled to. The cases were numbers fourteen and fifteen out of a series of eighteen or twenty. They were confirmed by the same section of the same statute and were in immediate contiguity in the context. In both there were two claimants under the same grant, who would have been entitled, under the decree of 1824, if applicable to the case, to twenty-two square leagues, that is, to eleven square leagues each. They were recommended for confirmation by the same surveyor-general who had investigated the titles and who was authorized by the statute which created his office to pass upon the extent as well as the validity of the grants. The question was, therefore, in the Tameling Case precisely the same as in the present, and it is not perceived how the questions of reforming the grant by a direct proceeding in chancery, and giving a construction to it in an action of ejectment, can be decided upon any different principles. If the Mexican Government had no power to grant anything beyond twenty-two square leagues in either case, the excess of the grant beyond that was void. This objection could as well be taken in an action of ejectment, where no particular twenty-two leagues had been set apart out of the much larger grant covered by the boundaries, as it could by a bill in chancery to set aside or correct the patent. The principles of law applicable to the issue are the same in [368] both cases, and the declaration of the court in the Tameling Case, that this was matter for the consideration of Congress, and it deemed itself concluded by the action of that body, is as applicable to the present case as it was to that.

The argument is here much pressed that the power of the Surveyor-General of New Mexico, in investigating and reporting upon these Mexican grants, was limited to ascertaining the validity of the claim as a grant by the Mexican Government, and not to its extent, and that the Act of Congress confirming the report of that officer and confirming the grant was not intended to be conclusive in regard to the boundaries or the quantity. But section eight of the Act of July 22, 1854, 10 Stat. at L. 308, under which the report of the Surveyor-General was made in regard to these claims, directs him to ascertain the extent, as well as other elements of the claims to be referred to him. The language of that section is as follows:

"That it shall be the duty of the Surveyor-General, under such instructions as may be given by the Secretary of the Interior, to ascertain the origin, nature, character, and extent of all claims to lands under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and Mexico, and for this purpose may issue notices, summon witnesses, administer oaths, and do and perform all other necessary acts in the premises. He shall make a full report on all such claims as originated before the cession of the territory to the United States by the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, of eighteen hundred and forty-eight, denoting the various grades of title, with his decision as to the validity or invalidity of each of the same under the laws, usages, and customs of the country before its cession to the United States."

1. Sketch from the Desiño of the Beaubien and Miranda Grant, extended on the lines of the United States surveys.

In the present case the Surveyor-General had before him, not only the original grant of Armijo to Beaubien and Miranda, but he had the record of the juridical possession delivered to the grantees, according to the laws of Mexico on that subject, made by the justice of the peace, Cornelio Vigil, accompanied by a map [369] or diseño, laying down with at least attempted particularity and precision the complete boundaries of this tract of land. So that the Surveyor-General not only had the authority to determine the extent of the grant, as well as its validity, but he had the means of ascertaining it. Upon what argument, therefore, it can be held that the Surveyor-General, with this entire matter before him, and with the means of ascertaining or describing with precision the extent of the grant to these parties, should be held not to have passed upon it, but simply upon the validity of the original transaction with Armijo, is not readily to be perceived. The Surveyor-General was not certainly of the class of officers to whom would have been confided by law the mere question of the legal validity of a grant made by a Mexican governor to a Mexican citizen. Others could do that as well as he when the facts were laid before them. But as his office was a surveying office, and was designed to ascertain the location and the extent of grants by an examination of the maps and surveys, and making new surveys if necessary, a function pre-eminently appurtenant to his office, he must be supposed to have reported upon all that was proper for consideration in its confirmation. And when the Congress of the United States, after a full investigation, and elaborate reports by its committees, confirmed these grants "as recommended for confirmation by the Surveyor-General" of the Territory, we must suppose that it was intended to be a full and complete confirmation, as regards the legal validity, fairness, and honesty of the grant, as well as its extent. This is made the more emphatic by the two or three cases in which the extent and location of the grant are specially limited in the very Act of confirmation, included in the same section and the same sentence.

It is observable that, in the argument of the counsel for the United States in this case, the boundaries of this tract of land are constantly spoken of as outboundaries, within which a smaller quantity of land may be located, as the real grant in this case. This phrase, "outboundary," has its proper use in regard to certain classes of Mexican grants, but it is wholly inapplicable and misleading as referring to the [372] one now under consideration. There were grants made by officers of the Mexican Government which were limited in quantity by the terms of the grant, and which the grantee might locate at any place he chose inside of a much larger quantity of land the limits of which were correctly described as "outboundaries." In such cases the use of the term, as describing the larger and greater tract within which the smaller and more limited quantity might be selected by the grantee, had its just and well-understood meaning. Grants of that class were quite numerous, and sometimes half a dozen grants to different individuals would be made within the same outboundaries, and occasionally there are cases where these smaller portions must include a dwelling or some improvement held by the grantee at the time. The whole of this subject is very well considered and explained by Justice Field in the opinion of this court in the case of Hornsby v. U. S. 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 224 [19: 900]. He says: "As we have had occasion to observe in several instances" [referring to Higueras v. U. S. 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 828 [18: 469]; Alviso v. U. S. 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 339 [19: 305]: "grants of the public domain of Mexico, made by Governors of the Department of California, were of three kinds: 1, grants by specific boundaries, where the donee was entitled to the entire tract described; 2, grants by quantity, as of one or more leagues situated at some designated place, or within a larger tract described by outboundaries, where the donee was entitled out of the general tract only to the quantity specified; and 3, grants of places by name, where the donee was entitled to the tract named according to the limits, as shown by its settlement and possession, or other competent evidence."

It is entirely clear that the grant to Beaubien and Miranda was a grant of the first class, a grant by specific boundaries, where the donee was entitled to the entire tract described. There is nothing in the language of the grant, nor in the petition, nor in anything connected with it, nor in the act of juridical possession, to indicate that either Governor Armijo or Beaubien and Miranda, or the officer who delivered the juridical possession to them, had any idea or conception that the grantees were not to have all the land within the boundaries established by that juridical possession. Hence the idea of counsel that there were only twenty-two square [373] leagues, or 97,424$\frac{4}{6}$ acres, granted within this great boundary is entirely unsupported, the case not being one of a grant of a more limited quantity within a larger outboundary. While the argument, whether sound or unsound, that the grant could only be upheld for the twenty-two square leagues, may be pressed now against the validity of the grant in excess of that amount, there was evidently no such thought in the minds of the parties when it was made.

It is not inappropriate here to allude to an argument suggested, but not much pressed, by counsel, that, in the petition of Beaubien against the intrusion of the priest Martinez, he speaks of his own grant as being only about fifteen leagues. We think a critical examination of that petition will show that he is speaking of the claim of Martinez and his associates as amounting in all to about fifteen leagues, and not of his own claim under the grant.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the extent of this grant, as confirmed by Congress, is not limited to the twenty-two square leagues, according to the argument of counsel, and that the Act of Congress makes valid the title under the patent of the United States, unless proved to be otherwise, by reason of error or mistake in the survey, or fraud in its procurement.

As regards the survey on which the patent was issued, and which is made a part of the patent, under the seal of the United States and the signature of the President, it is to be observed that the evidence shows that the General Land-Office made every effort to have it accurate. The survey was made by authority of the commissioner of that office, under the supervision of the Surveyor-General of New Mexico. A survey had been previously made by W. W. Griffin, who was employed by the claimants to make it, because the then Secretary of the Interior had declined to order a survey. This survey was completed during the year 1870, and though purely a private enterprise and unofficial, the plat and field notes were deposited in the General Land-Office by [374] the claimant, presumably for the information of the Government as to the exact location of the exterior lines as claimed by the owners of the grant. The Land-Office having afterwards, under the influence of the decision of the supreme court in Tameling v. U. S. Freehold & E. Co., supra, determined that it was its duty to ascertain the extent of this grant and to issue a patent for it, was about issuing orders to the Surveyor-General of New Mexico to have this grant surveyed, when it was suggested by the claimants that the commissioner should adopt the survey of Griffin, above referred to. He, however, declined to pursue this course; first, because he did not think it was a proper procedure; and second, because he did not think that the eastern and northern boundaries had been correctly located by the Griffin survey. The Surveyor-General thereupon made a contract for the work with Elkins and Marmon, and the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, in approving this contract, gave his own directions as to how these boundaries should be located, and furnished for the guidance of the surveyors an explanatory diagram. This survey was made in the autumn of 1877. The map or plat of it is a part of the record, together with the proofs taken by the surveyors to establish the calls of the grant. Contests were initiated before the Surveyor-General upon the validity of this survey by parties who were interested against it, and the case was fully heard on testimony, which testimony was filed with the Commissioner of the General Land-Office. He finally approved the survey and the patent was issued in accordance with it on May 19, 1879.

It is attempted in argument here to point out

2. Boundaries of the Beaubien and Miranda grant, as surveyed and patented.

many errors and mistakes as objections to the accuracy of this survey. There is no reason to doubt that the Surveyor-General and the officers employed by him, and the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, all of whom gave particular attention to this survey, were well informed on the subject. They knew that it was an immense tract of land, that it would be the subject of grave criticism, and they knew [375] more about it and were better capable of forming a judgment of the correctness of that survey than this court can be. We may add that, after all the research, industry, and ability of special counsel for the Government, when the testimony taken in the case to prove these errors, and the record of the juridical possession, have been considered with the best judgment that we can bring to them, we are not satisfied that the survey is in any essential particular incorrect, but, on the whole, we believe that it substantially conforms to the grant originally made by Governor Armijo.

The principal point in dispute to which the argument of counsel has been addressed is that the part of the land included in this survey, north of the present line, which divides the State of Colorado and the Territory of New Mexico, was improperly included within the survey. In other words, it is argued that this northern line of the survey should have been run from the east to the west upon the summits of the Raton Mountains. This range of hills, rather than mountains, seems to project itself as a spur from the great range running north and south which divides the waters that flow east from those which flow west. Running almost due east as you ascend along the foot of this range of hills, on their south side, is the stream called the Colorado River, which seems to spring from the great mountain range before mentioned. The language descriptive of the land in the petition of Beaubien and Miranda, which was granted and donated to them by Governor Armijo, as "therein expressed," is as follows:

"The tract of land we petition for to be divided equally between us commences below the junction of the Rayado River with the Colorado, and in a direct line towards the east to the first hills" (about which there does not seem to be much difficulty), "and from there running parallel with said River Colorado, in a northerly direction to opposite the point of the Uña de Gato, following the same river along the same hills to continue to the east of said Uña de Gato River to the summit of the table land (mesa), from whence, turning northwest, to follow along said summit until it reaches the top of the mountain which divides the waters of the rivers running towards the east from those running towards the west, and from thence following the line of said mountain in a southwardly direction until it intersects the first hills south of the Rayado River, [376] and following the summit of said hills towards the east to the place of beginning."

Now, it is this northeastern corner whence the course turns to the northwest which is the great subject of controversy, the line following the summit of the mesa, or table land, to the summit of the mountain. This part of the Colorado River is a natural object which could not be mistaken and which it is now claimed is the true course of the line, except that it is asserted that it should have followed the summit of the Raton Mountains, which are just north of it, and running parallel with the river. That range is also a natural object, easily ascertained, and it would seem but reasonable that one or the other of those objects should have been selected by the grantor as descriptive of the place where this northern line should be located. Instead of this, however, it is said to run to the "summit of the table land, from whence turning northwest, to follow along said summit" (which evidently means the summit of the table land), "until it reaches the top of the mountain." The longest line of the survey is from the southeast corner, in a northerly direction, parallel with the Colorado River; and if the line now contended for by appellant was the true east and west line, it need only have been stated in the grant that it should follow the course of that river to its origin, in the same mountain, which separates the waters of the rivers running east and west. But instead of speaking either of that river in its course from west to east, or of the Raton Mountains, as the natural object which constituted the northerly boundary of the grant, it requires the boundary line to leave the Colorado River at the junction of the Uña de Gato River with it, and continuing along a range of hills, "to the east of the Uña de Gato River to the summit of the table land." This is not only a strong indication that the northern boundary was not where it is claimed to be by counsel for appellant, but that it was somewhere else; that it was not a range of hills nor a river already mentioned in the grant, but that it was something else called the "summit, of the table land," north of both of [377] these. And although there is some contrariety of opinion about this "summit of the table land" which is to constitute the northeastern corner of the grant, we are of opinion, upon a consideration of all the evidence before us, that the survey was located as nearly in accordance with the terms of the grant as it is possible now to ascertain them.

Without going into this evidence more minutely, we are content to say that, while in favor of the correctness of this survey, in the points assailed, it is as strong or stronger than that for any other survey which could be made, or which has been suggested by the counsel for the United States, we are very clear that it is not the province of this court to set aside and declare null and void these surveys and patents approved by the officers of the Government whose duty it was to consider them, and who evidently did consider them with great attention, upon the mere possibility or a bare probability that some other survey would more accurately represent the terms of the grant.

The question of fraud in the location of this survey, which is about all the allegation there is of actual fraud in the title of the defendants, is not deserving of much consideration. We are compelled to say that we do not see any satisfactory evidence of an attempt to commit a fraud, and still less of its consummation. As to the principal officers of the Government who were connected with that survey, to wit: the Commissioner of the General Land-Office and the Surveyor-General of the Territory of New Mexico, there is not the slightest evidence that they were governed by any fraudulent or improper motive in their acts in regard to this survey, or that they displayed any leaning towards the grantees in ascertaining the true boundaries of the grant. Nor is there any serious attack upon the subordinates of those officers, or any of the persons actually engaged in making the survey, in regard to their honesty of purpose or interest in the result. The principal argument of counsel upon this subject is based upon the Griffin survey, already mentioned, which was deposited by the claimants in the office of the Surveyor-General of New Mexico. It is argued, in the first place, that 378 this survey was a very incorrect one, and that it included much more land than was granted by Governor Armijo; secondly, it is insisted that in this respect it was an intentional departure from a correct survey; and thirdly, that it was designed and intended by the claimants to impose this incorrect and fraudulent survey upon the Commissioner of the General Land-Office and have him issue a patent for it.

As regards the first element of this allegation of fraud, the incorrectness of the survey, and that it included more land than the grant authorized, the only minute and careful survey with which it can be compared is the one upon which the patent finally issued, and we must say, with the light we have upon the subject and the time we have been able to bestow upon its consideration, that it is by no means clear that the Griffin survey, in that respect, is not the most correct one. The defendants here are not in a condition to contest the final survey. It is their business and their duty, having accepted the patent upon it, to defend it. But if it were to their interest, or to anybody's interest, to show that the Griffin survey was the more correct one, it seems to us that arguments in its support would not be wanting.

In the second place, as to any intentional fraud on the part of Griffin or his assistants in the running of these boundary lines, there is not the slightest evidence. And lastly, as to the charge that the Maxwell Land-Grant Company knew this survey to be a false one, and that it included much more land than the Company was entitled to, but that they nevertheless endeavored to impose it upon the Commissioner of the General Land-Office as a correct survey, there are two emphatic answers: first, there is no evidence that they believed it to be a false survey, and they only asked, or seemed to ask, that this survey might be adopted, because the Government had not made, and would not then make, one for itself, in order that they might get the patent to which they were entitled; second, the commissioner was not imposed upon. If they attempted a fraudulent imposition, they were not successful; he rejected their survey altogether, caused another one to be made, and pointed out in his instructions to those who 379 executed the final survey the points of departure from that made by Griffin, upon which he insisted. It seems impossible, in the face of these circumstances, to assume that there was anything in the nature of fraud perpetrated in regard to the Griffin survey and its effect upon the final survey.

The great importance of this case, as regards the immense quantity of land involved and its value, reinforced by the circumstance of the number of cases coming before the courts, in which, under the directions of the Attorney-General, attempts are made to set aside the decrees of the courts, the patents issued by the Government, and, in this case, an Act of Congress, seems to call for some remarks as to the nature of the testimony and other circumstances which will justify a court in granting such relief. The cases of this character which have come to the Supreme Court of the United States have been so few in number that but little has been said in regard to the general principles which should govern their decision. There are decisions enough to guide us in cases where a patent or other title derived directly from the Government has been questioned in a collateral proceeding brought to enforce that title or to assert a defense under it; but the distinction between this class of cases, in which all the presumptions are in favor of the validity of the title, and in regard to which a wise policy has forbidden that they should be thus attacked, and those like the present, in which an action is brought in a court of chancery to vacate, to set aside, or to annul the patent itself, or other evidence of title from the United States, is very obvious. In either case, however, the deliberate action of the tribunals to which the law commits the determination of all preliminary questions and the control of the processes by which this evidence of title is issued to the grantee, demand that to annul such an instrument and destroy the title claimed under it, the facts on which this action is asked for must be clearly established by evidence entirely satisfactory to the court, and that the case itself must be within the class of causes for which such an instrument may be avoided. U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61 [25: 93].

In the case of United States v. Stone, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 525 [17: 765], this court said: "A 380 patent is the highest evidence of title, and is conclusive as against the Government, and all claiming under junior patents or titles, until it is set aside or annulled by some judicial proceeding. In England this was originally done by scire facias, but a bill in chancery is found a more convenient remedy." This was a chancery proceeding to set aside a patent for land.

In the case of Johnson v. Towsley, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 72 [20: 485], the court, considering the force and effect to be given to the actions of the officers of the Land Department of the Government, announces the doctrine that their decision, made within the scope of their authority on questions of this kind, is in general conclusive everywhere, except when reconsidered by way of appeal within that department; and that as to the facts on which their decision is based, in the absence of fraud or mistake, that decision is conclusive even in courts of justice when the title afterwards comes in question. But that in this class of cases, as in all others, there exists in the courts of equity the jurisdiction to correct mistakes, to relieve against frauds and impositions, and, in cases where it is clear that those officers have by a mistake of the law given to one man the land which on the undisputed facts belong to another, to give proper relief.

These propositions have been repeatedly reaffirmed in this court. Moore v. Robbins, 96 U.

S. 530 [24: 848]; Marquez v. Frisbie, 101 U. S. 473 [25: 800]; U. S. v. Atherton, 102 U. S. 372 [26: 213]; Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 330 [23: 424].

In the case of Atlantic Delaine Co. v. James, 94 U.S. 207 [24: 112], Mr. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, in regard to the power of courts of equity to cancel private contracts between individuals: "Canceling an executed contract is an exertion of the most extraordinary power of a court of equity. The power ought not to be exercised except in a clear case, and never for an alleged fraud, unless the fraud be made clearly to appear; never for alleged false representations, unless their falsity is certainly proved, and unless the complainant has been deceived and injured by [381] them." In Story's Equity Jurisprudence, section 157, it is said that relief will be granted in cases of written instruments only where there is a plain mistake clearly made out by satisfactory proofs. Chancellor Kent, in the case of Lyman v. United Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 632, which had reference to reforming a policy of insurance, says: "The cases which treat of this head of equity jurisdiction require the mistake to be made out in the most clear and decided manner, and to the entire satisfaction of the court." See also Stockbridge Iron Co. v. Hudson Iron Co. 107 Mass. 290.

We take the general doctrine to be that when in a court of equity it is proposed to set aside, to annul or to correct a written instrument, for fraud or mistake in the execution of the instrument itself, the testimony on which this is done must be clear, unequivocal, and convincing, and that it cannot be done upon a bare preponderance of evidence which leaves the issue in doubt. If the proposition, as thus laid down in the cases cited, is sound in regard to the ordinary contracts of private individuals, how much more should it be observed where the attempt is to annul the grants, the patents, and other solemn evidences of title emanating from the Government of the United States under its official seal. In this class of cases, the respect due to a patent, the presumptions that all the preceding steps required by the law had been observed before its issue, the immense importance and necessity of the stability of titles dependent upon these official instruments, demand that the effort to set them aside, to annul them, or to correct mistakes in them should only be successful when the allegations on which this is attempted are clearly stated and fully sustained by proof. It is not to be admitted that the titles by which so much property in this country and so many rights are held, purporting to emanate from the authoritative action of the officers of the Government, and, as in this case, under the seal and signature of the President of the United States himself, shall be dependent upon the hazard of successful resistance to the whims and caprices of every person who chooses to attack them in a court of justice; but it should be well understood that only that class of evidence which [382] commands respect, and that amount of it which produces conviction, shall make such an attempt successful.

The case before us is much stronger than the ordinary case of an attempt to set aside a patent, or even the judgment of a court, because it demands of us that we shall disregard or annul the deliberate action of the Congress of the United States. The Constitution declares (article IV, § 1), that "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, or other property, belonging to the United States." At the time that Congress passed upon the grant to Beaubien and Miranda, whatever interest there was in the land claimed which was not legally or equitably their property was the property of the United States; and Congress having the power to dispose of that property, and having, as we understand it, confirmed this grant, and thereby made such disposition of it, it is not easily to be perceived how the courts of the United States can set aside this action of Congress. Certainly the power of the courts can go no further than to make a construction of what Congress intended to do by the Act, which we have already considered, confirming this grant and others.

In regard to the questions concerning the surveys, as to their conformity to the original Mexican grant, and the frauds which are asserted to have had some influence in the making of those surveys, so far from their being established by that satisfactory and conclusive evidence which the rule we have here laid down requires, we are of opinion that if it were an open question, unaffected by the respect due to the official acts of the Government upon such a subject, depending upon the bare preponderance of evidence, there is an utter failure to establish either mistake or fraud.

For these reasons the decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 281, 282.)

Fifth Amendment — "infamous crime" — indictment — information — practice.

A prosecution for a crime, which is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary "for a period longer than one year," must be by indictment, and not by information, the crime being "infamous" within the Fifth Amendment.

[No. 227.]

Submitted April 15, 1887. Decided April 18, 1887.

ON a certificate of division in opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nevada. Reversed, Remanded.

The case is sufficiently stated by the court.

No counsel appeared for plaintiff in error.

Mr. William A. Maury, Assist. Atty-Gen., for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes here on a certificate by the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nevada, that they were opposed in opinion on certain questions which arose at the hearing of a writ of error for the review of the rulings of the district court of the district at the trial of Richard R. Parkinson, on an information by the district attorney, for unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously voting at an election for a representative in Congress from Nevada, and for unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously registering his name as an elector qualified to vote at such election. The prosecution was under sections 5511 and 5512 of the Revised Statutes, which made the offenses charged punishable by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment not more than three years, or both. As the imprisonment may be "for a period longer than one year," the court can order that it shall be in the penitentiary. Rev. Stat. § 5541. This makes the crime "infamous," within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and the prosecution should [282] have been by indictment and not by information. It was so decided by this court, after this case was certified up by the circuit court, in Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417 [29: 89], and Mackin v. U. S. 117 U. S. 348 [29: 909]. As the judgment of the district court must be reversed for this cause, the questions certified have become immaterial, and their determination unnecessary in the final disposition of the case. We, therefore, remand the case without answering them.

HELEN M. KELSEY ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 282-284.)

Constitutional law—"due process of law"—equity jurisdiction—obligation of contracts—impairment of—State Constitution, not a contract—jurisdiction.

1. The provision of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution that a State shall not "deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law" does not prevent a State from giving a court of equity the power to hear and determine a case requiring equitable relief.

2. A State Constitution is not a contract within the meaning of that clause of the Federal Constitution which prohibits the States from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts.

3. Upon writ of error to a state court, to give this court jurisdiction, it must appear that the question presented was actually presented to and decided by the court below adversely to the plaintiff in error.

[No. 1302.]

Submitted March 28, 1887. Decided April 18, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania.

On motion to dismiss, with which is united a motion to affirm under Rule 6, sec. 5. Affirmed.

Reported below, 4 Cent. Rep. 95, which see.

The case is sufficiently stated by the court.

Mr. Chapin Brown, for defendants in error, in support of motion:

It does not appear from the record that this court has jurisdiction in this case. The only claim to any right asserted under the Constitution of the United States is contained in the fifth section of the answer of the defendant below; but no clause of or any reference to any clause or article of the Constitution is set up in the record, and this should have been done. The court is not able to see from the record that any provision of the Constitution of the United States was relied on by the plaintiffs in error, and that the right thus claimed by them was denied.

Maxwell v. Newbold, 59 U. S. 18 How. 511 (15: 506); Lawler v. Walker, 55 U. S. 14 How. 149 (14: 364); Farney v. Towle, 1 Black, 66 U. S. 350 (17: 216); Hoyt v. Sheldon, Id. 518 (17: 65); Bridge Proprs. v. Hoboken Co. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 116 (17: 571).

The court below did not in this proceeding attempt to try the title to land; that had been settled by previous litigation between the parties in which the plaintiffs were adjudged to own five ninths, and defendants four ninths of the land; but even had it done so, no right of the plaintiffs in error, under the Constitution of the United States, would have been violated or denied. Due process of law, as laid down in the Constitution, is any process instituted by a State, for settlement of disputes where there is a plaintiff, defendant, issue joined, a competent tribunal, and a judgment.

Den v. Hoboken L. & I. Co. 59 U. S. 18 How. 272 (15: 372); Pearson v. Yewdall, 95 U. S. 294 (24: 436); Edwards v. Elliot, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 557 (22: 492); Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714 (24: 565).

Article VII of the Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, relating to jury trials, applies only to courts of the United States.

Edwards v. Elliott and Pearson v. Yewdall, supra.

Mr. A. Ricketts, for plaintiffs in error, contra:

The title of plaintiffs in error was and is purely legal. The conveyance was made by Letta Griffin to Charlotte Church, but the purcase money was wholly paid by Joseph Church, her husband; whether the title is to be considered in her or him is immaterial; in either case it was simply legal. When she died, whatever title she had descended to her son and heir, subject to the curtesy of her husband. And by the descent thus cast, the title became so vested that it could be devested by a proper action at law.

Gilbert, Tenures, 18; Co. Litt. 267 a, § 385.

This is the law of Pennsylvania.

Hoey v. Furman, 1 Pa. 295, 300.

The right to have and enjoy this legal title, unless deprived of it by a regular action at law, is a right which the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has declared no power in the State could take from them.

North Pa. Coal Co. v. Snowden, 42 Pa. 488, 492.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

If we understand correctly the questions on which, it is claimed, our jurisdiction in this case rests, they are: 1, That the provision in section 1, article XIV of the Amendments of the Constitution of the United States, that a State shall not "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," prevents the State of Pennsylvania from giving jurisdiction to a court of equity of a suit brought by [283] the owner of an equitable interest in land to establish his rights against the holder of the legal title because it deprives the holder of the legal title of the right to a trial by jury which he would have in a suit at law; and 2, That, as the Constitution of a State is the "fundamental contract made between the collective body of citizens of the State and each individual citizen," a state statute which violates a State Constitution is a "law impairing the obligation of contracts" within the meaning of that term, as used in article I, section 10, clause 1, of the Constitution of the United States.

It sufficiently appears from the record that the first of these questions was actually presented to and decided by the court below, adversely to the claim of the plaintiffs in error. That is sufficient to give us jurisdiction, but the decision was so clearly right that it is unnecessary to keep the case here for further argument. Certainly the provision of the Constitution referred to cannot have the effect of taking away from the States the power of giving a court of equity jurisdiction in cases requiring equitable relief. It may be true that in Pennsylvania "Equity powers have been doled out to the courts by the Legislature with a sparing hand," but there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which requires that this should always be so. The suit of which complaint is made in this case was brought to establish a trust in the holder of the legal title, which from time immemorial has been a proper subject of chancery jurisdiction. It is useless to contend that the Constitution of the United States prevents any State from giving a court of equity the power to hear and determine such a case. This has not been doubted in the courts of Pennsylvania, as we understand. North Pa. Coal Co. v. Snowden, 42 Pa. 488, 492.

We cannot find that the other question was actually presented to the state court for decision. Certainly it cannot be found in the record, in the form it has been stated in the brief of counsel here. But if it had been no argument would be needed to show that the objection was not well taken. A State Constitu-[284] tion is not a contract within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution of the United States which prohibits the States from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts. It is the fundamental law adopted by the people for their government in a State of the United States; and as such it may be construed and carried into effect by the courts of the State, without review by this court, except in cases where what is done comes, or is supposed to come, in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. Such is not the claim here, the only question under this branch of the case being whether the statute giving jurisdiction to the court of equity in a suit under which the defendants in error claim title is in violation of the Constitution of the State.

The motion to dismiss is overruled, and that to affirm granted.

Affirmed.

On motion to dismiss. Granted.

The case is sufficiently stated by the court.

Messrs. Thomas J. Semmes, and Alfred Goldthwaite, for defendants in error and appellees, in support of motion.

Mr. Henry C. Miller, for plaintiff in error and appellants, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opin- [285]
ion of the court:

This is a proceeding begun May 22, 1883, by Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines, then in life, to subject a certain sum of $40,000 on deposit in the Louisiana National Bank to the payment of a judgment in her favor against the City of New Orleans. There is no dispute about the fact that the money in question was on deposit when the proceeding was begun and the Bank served with process, but the Board of Liquidation of the City Debt has made claim to it as part of the fund appropriated by Act No. 133 of 1880 to the payment and liquidation of the bonded debt of the city. Pending the determination of the questions involved, the court, March 15, 1886, ordered the money paid into the registry of the court. From this order the Bank has appealed, and also sued out a writ of error, and the Board of Liquidation has likewise appealed. The representatives of Mrs. Gaines, who were made parties to the proceeding after her death, now move to dismiss both the writ of error and the appeals, because the order to be brought under review is not a final judgment or decree within the meaning of that term as used in the Acts of Congress giving this court jurisdiction on appeals and writs of error.

We have no hesitation in granting the motion. The court has not adjudicated the rights of the parties concerned. It has only ordered the fund into the registry of the court for preservation during the pendency of the litigation as to its ownership. Such an order it has always been held is interlocutory only and not a final decree. Forgay v. Conrad, 47 U. S. 6

How. 204 [12:405]; Grant v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 106 U. S. 431 [27:238]. If in the end it shall be found that the fund belongs to the Board of Liquidation, it can be paid from the registry accordingly, notwithstanding the order that has been made. The money when paid into the registry will be in the hands of the court for the benefit of whomsoever it shall in the end be found to belong.

Both the appeals and the writ of error are dismissed.

Bill to establish complainant's equities in stock and property of corporation—former adjudication—defective conveyance—right of complainant to redeem pledge of stock to bank—costs.

Upon a bill filed by the appellee to establish his equities in the capital stock and corporate property of the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association as against the claims of the State National Bank, it is held: that a former judgment by a state court, to the effect that a conveyance by the directors of said Association was defective to convey the legal title to the complainant, as against the Bank which held the capital stock as a pledge, is conclusive as between the parties and those in privity with them; that the Bank by an agreement to accept Northern Pacific Railroad bonds for its stock did not release said pledge; that the complainant's equity under said judgment consisted in a right to redeem the pledge to the Bank, and that he is entitled to enforce his said right against certain holders from the Bank, who appear from the evidence to be holders with notice of his equity.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Eugene M. Wilson, for appellants.

Messrs. C. E. Flandrau, George F. Edmunds and E. C. Palmer, for appellee.

[297]

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

The original bill in this case was filed August 14, 1877, by Thomas H. Canfield, a citizen of the State of Vermont, against the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association, a corporation created under the laws of the State of Minnesota, and the State National Bank of Minneapolis, a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, at Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota. Its general purpose was to establish the equities of the complainant in the capital stock and corporate property of the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association as against the claims of the State National Bank.

Prior to the filing of this bill, in October, 1873, an equitable action was commenced by the State National Bank and Rufus J. Baldwin, its cashier, in the District Court of the Fourth Judicial District for the County of Hennepin and State of Minnesota, against Canfield, involving, to a certain extent, the matters here in controversy. The proceedings and judgment in that case are relied upon as res judicata in the present litigation, and are conclusive so far as the same matters are drawn in question in both suits.

The facts found by the District Court in Minnesota, in the proceeding referred to, are substantially as follows:

That the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association in 1871 became a body corporate under the general laws of the State of Minnesota, for the purpose of promoting the agricultural and mechanical arts by holding fairs and other public exhibitions, with a capital stock of $40,000, divided into 800 shares of $50 each, all of which was paid up, and for which certificates were issued; that the government of said Association was vested in a board of directors of eleven persons, to be elected annually by the stockholders, and continue in office for one year, and until their successors were elected and qualified; that said Corporation became the owner in fee of certain described lands in the County of Hennepin, containing seventy acres, known as the Fair Grounds, on which it erected buildings and structures for the purpose of accommodating [298] the fairs which it proposed to hold, and for the other uses and purposes contemplated by their erection.

That on the 12th day of November, 1872, William S. King had become the owner of all the capital stock of the Association, and was in possession of its real estate, using the same as his own individual property, without interference on the part of the Corporation or its officers, the ordinary and lawful business of the Corporation having been wholly suspended and abandoned; that 200 shares of the stock King had purchased from George A. Brackett on credit, giving his notes for the purchase money, secured by a pledge of the stock itself, which notes and stock, thus pledged, Brackett, on April 8, 1873, transferred and delivered to the State National Bank of Minneapolis to secure the payment of a loan of $10,000 made by the Bank to Brackett; that 100 shares of said stock King had purchased from one Richard J. Mendenhall on credit, giving his promissory notes for the payment of the purchase money, secured by a pledge of the stock, which notes Mendenhall procured to be discounted for his benefit by the State National Bank, transferring to the Bank the stock so pledged as collateral security.

That on July 19, 1873, King delivered to Rufus J. Baldwin the remaining 500 shares of stock as collateral security for his obligation to return to Baldwin certain gas stock of the value of $10,000 borrowed by King from him, and authorized Baldwin also to hold the said stock as additional security for King's notes held by the Bank.

That on August 14, 1873, King agreed in writing to sell to Thomas H. Canfield, the complainant, the property known as the "Fair Grounds," in Minneapolis, excepting five acres subscribed to the stock of the Minneapolis Harvester Company, for the sum of $65,000, payable in 7-30 gold bonds of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company at the rate of ninety cents on the dollar, and the remainder in notes of Canfield, payable in equal installments of one, two, and three years from date, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, King agreeing to procure abstracts of title complete and perfect the same, and execute a [299] warranty deed at as early a day as possible; and it was then and there verbally agreed between King and Canfield that King would transfer all the capital stock of the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association to Canfield, and also procure a deed of said property from said Corporation to Canfield; that Canfield at the time of executing said agreement knew that the legal title to the property was in the Corporation, but had no knowledge that the State National Bank of Minneapolis, or Baldwin, or anyone else except King, had any interest in or claim to its capital stock.

That King informed Baldwin of his agreement to sell the fair grounds property to Canfield and its terms, and it was thereupon agreed between King and Baldwin, acting for himself and the Bank, that the Bank should take $36,000 par value of said Northern Pacific Railroad bonds to be paid to King by Canfield in exchange for the 800 shares of stock of the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association held by the Bank, the said stock to be sent to the National Park Bank in the City of New York, to be delivered to Canfield upon his delivering at said Bank to the order of Baldwin the Northern Pacific Railroad bonds to the amount of $36,000 par value, in exchange therefor.

That in pursuance of said agreement, King executed and delivered to Baldwin an order in writing on Canfield for the delivery of said bonds, which was indorsed by Baldwin, directing the delivery to the National Park Bank, and, on August 22, 1873, Baldwin sent the certificates for 800 shares of the stock, together with these orders to the National Park Bank, with instructions to deliver the stock to Canfield on receipt of the bonds in exchange therefor.

That after the execution of the agreement of August 14, 1873, between King and Canfield, King, in pursuance thereof and for the purpose of carrying out the same, caused a deed to be executed, in the name of the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association, for the fair grounds property, by R. J. Mendenhall, Thomas Lowry, W. D. Washburn, C. G. Goodrich, George F. Stevens, William S. King, Levi Butler, W. W. Eastman, W. F. Westfall, Dorilus Morrison, and George A. Brackett, who were all the directors of said Association, but [300] the execution of this deed was never authorized at or by any meeting of said directors, nor was any resolution ever passed by the said board of directors in reference to the execution of the same, or authorizing the seal of the Corporation to be attached thereto, or authorizing the sale or conveyance of said property in any way to said Canfield, the said deed having been executed by said parties separately and at different places, wherever said parties happened to be, at the request of said King or his attorney, for the purpose of enabling King to convey the property to Canfield. It was executed by Stevens at Utica, in the State of New York, by Morrison and Brackett in the City of New York, and by the other signers thereof in Hennepin County, Minnesota.

That said Brackett and said Morrison, at the time of signing said deed, having objected thereto on the ground that the stock was held by the State National Bank of Minneapolis, were informed of the agreement between King and Baldwin, whereby the said stock was to be delivered in exchange for Northern Pacific Railroad bonds, and thereupon executed the said deed.

That, at the time of the execution thereof by

Brackett and Morrison, Canfield was informed by King that the stock of the Association had been left as collateral to secure certain notes at the State National Bank of Minneapolis, and had been sent to the National Park Bank to be taken up by King with Northern Pacific Railroad bonds to be received by him from Canfield under said agreement.

That on September 12, 1873, in the City of New York, King delivered to Canfield the said deed, together with a warranty deed of the same property, duly executed and acknowledged by King, conveying the property in his own name; when and where Canfield delivered to King the said $65,000 in bonds of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and executed and delivered to him his notes for $6,500, as required by the terms of the agreement of August 14, 1873, which deeds were, on October 4, 1873, duly recorded in Hennepin County.

[301] That the orders in writing for the delivery of the bonds to the National Park Bank were never presented to Canfield, nor were any of the said bonds deposited at the National Park Bank, nor was the stock of the Association or any part of it ever delivered to Canfield, but was held by the Bank as collateral security for the payment of the notes and the return of the gas stock, as hereinbefore stated.

That King retained for his own use the railroad bonds and Canfield's notes received under the agreement of August 14, 1873, and that Canfield, through inadvertency, did not demand the delivery of the stock of the Association from King at the time of the delivery of said deed by King to him and the transfer of the bonds and notes by him to King, he, Canfield, supposing that the deeds delivered to him conveyed a complete title to the property.

That the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association had no corporate property except the said fair grounds, and that shortly after receiving said deeds from King, Canfield conveyed to the Minneapolis Harvester Works Company the five acres excepted out of the said property by the terms of the agreement of August 14, 1873, which said five acres had been previously to the execution of said agreement, subscribed to the stock of said company; and that shortly after receiving his deeds, Canfield took possession of the grounds and of the buildings remaining thereon, and remained in possession thereof at the time of the decree in said suit.

Upon these facts it was adjudged by the District Court of Minnesota that Canfield, by virtue of the deeds referred to, acquired no title to said real estate; that the State National Bank of Minneapolis was the bona fide holder of the whole amount of the capital stock as collateral security for the debts due to it, and by reason thereof had a right to have the property of the Corporation applied to its redemption, which right was prior and superior to any claim to or interest in said stock or real estate on the part of Canfield; but that Canfield, subject to the right and interest therein of the said Bank, was the owner in equity of the said stock. Neither King nor the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association were parties defendant [302] in that suit, and the relief, therefore, granted by the judgment therein was limited to declaring that the deed purporting to be executed by the Corporation to Canfield was null and void as against the State National Bank of Minneapolis, and to directing that said judgment be recorded in the office of the register of deeds in Hennepin County, so that said deed should not thereafter be a cloud upon the title of said Corporation to said real estate. This judgment was entered on March 17, 1877. An appeal was taken therefrom to the Supreme Court of Minnesota, the decision in which is reported in Baldwin v. Canfield, 26 Minn. 43.

In that case it was declared by the court that the deed purporting to be made by the Association was not the act and deed of such Association, and therefore did not convey the title to the premises in question to Canfield. The court further said: "The directors took no action as a board with reference to the sale of the premises, or the execution of any deed thereof. So far as in any way binding the Corporation is concerned, their action in executing the deed was a nullity. They could not bind it by their separate and individual action. Hence it follows that the so-called deed is not only ineffectual as a conveyance of real property, but equally so as a contract to convey."

The court also declared as follows: "Upon the facts found and the preceding conclusions of law, the plaintiffs, as holders of the stock, are interested in the preservation of the corporate property, and in preventing it from passing out of the hands of the Corporation. If this is so, they have a right to take legal means to preserve the property, to prevent it from being lost to the Corporation, or its value from being impaired. If such value is practically impaired by a cloud upon the title of the Corporation to real property, they have a right to have the cloud removed. Their ownership of the stock, either general or special, gives them a right to defend it, as in the case of any other property. This right is paramount to any right upon the part of King as the general owner of the stock, or of Canfield as equitable owner of it, for the reason that by the contract of pledge King has subordinated his rights to theirs, while Canfield's right to the stock accrued while [303] the stock was in the plaintiff's hands—while they were holding the certificates which are the evidence of its ownership. The certificates were not delivered to Canfield. This fact bound him to take notice of the rights of the plaintiffs as holders of them in pledge."

It was also held that, subject to the right and interest of the plaintiffs as thus defined, Canfield was in equity the owner of the whole 800 shares of said stock. This judgment was not rendered until May 5, 1879.

In the meantime, and subsequent to the rendition of the judgment in the District Court of the State, on the 10th of July, 1877, the State National Bank gave notice of an intention, on the 25th day of July, 1877, to sell at public auction the 800 shares of the capital stock of the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association for the payment of the Brackett notes and the Mendenhall notes made by King.

Said sale having in the meantime been postponed, Canfield filed the original bill in this cause against the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association and the State National Bank of Minneapolis, the object and prayer of which were, upon the facts alleged, to assert his equity as owner of the said 800 shares of stock and in the real estate of the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association, and in the meantime to enjoin the intended sale of said stock, which had been adjourned to August 15, 1877. On September 13, 1877, an application for an injunction to restrain the said sale, having been previously made and submitted, was denied; and on September 15, 1877, the said sale, originally advertised for July 25, 1877, adjourned to August 15, 1877, and again adjourned to September 15, 1877, took place, and the 800 shares of capital stock of the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association were struck off and sold to one J. M. Knight for the sum of $13,000, that being the highest bid for the same. This sum was the estimated amount due to the Bank for which it held the stock as collateral; the gas stock, or an equivalent, having in the meantime been returned. At the time of the sale, the State National Bank executed to Knight a guaranty of the title to the stock sold.

[304] On December 31, 1877, Knight sold to Dorilus Morrison 720 shares of his stock in consideration of $12,430.42. Morrison assumi[illegible] and agreeing "to pay the costs, expenses, and charges incurred and to be incurred in or about certain legal proceedings instituted in respect to the said shares of stock, and in respect to the real estate of said Association, in which the State National Bank of Minneapolis and R. J. Baldwin were parties." On February 23, 1878, the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association, by its board of directors and officers, executed a deed in fee simple of the seventy acres of land constituting the fair ground property to Dorilus Morrison and James M. Knight, nine tenths thereof to the former and one tenth to the latter. This deed was executed by the authority of the board of directors elected by Morrison and Knight, as sole stockholders, for that purpose. On October 22, 1878, Morrison conveyed by deed in fee simple to Jacob K. Sidle and Robert B. Langdon his undivided nine tenths of the said fair ground property; Morrison also conveyed to Sidle and Langdon his 720 shares of the capital stock of the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association and the guaranty of title to the same by the State National Bank of Minneapolis. The deed to Sidle and Langdon on its face is absolute, but the title was held by them in fact in trust for certain persons, as expressed in written declarations of trust given to each of the cestuis que trustent. The following is a copy of one of these declarations:

"MINNEAPOLIS, October 22, 1878.

"Whereas, Divers persons have advanced to us, J. K. Sidle and R. B. Langdon, sums of money amounting to twenty-nine thousand six hundred sixty-eight and $\frac{14}{100}$ dollars, wherewith we are to pay off and liquidate the indebtedness of the Northwestern Mechanical and Agricultural Association as to particular matters, and also to pay off certain incumbrances heretofore resting upon an undivided nine tenths of the fair grounds in the City of Minneapolis, of which sum W. D. Washburn, of said city, has advanced twenty-five hundred dollars; and whereas we have at this date received from 305] Dorilus Morrison and wife a deed of the same undivided nine tenths of the said fair grounds, the title to which is, however, in litigation; we therefore agree that, in case the result of the said litigation shall be to validate our title, we shall, as soon as may be reasonable after one year from the date hereof, sell said land, and from the proceeds of such sale pay the said advances to the persons severally making the same, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, if the sum realized from such sale shall be sufficient to cover such payment. But if the proceeds of such sale shall not be sufficient to pay such advances and interest in full, then we agree to pay and apply such proceeds in payment of such advances pro rata to each person in proportion to the amount of the advance by him made. This is the extent of our obligation in the matter, and if our title to the said land shall fail, then no duty or obligation rests upon us."

The circumstances in which the conveyance to Sidle and Langdon was made are shown in the proof and stated by counsel for the appellants in his brief, as follows:

"In the year 1878 a fair was held in Minneapolis, upon the same land, under the auspices of another organization, known as the Minnesota Agricultural and Mechanical Association. At the same time a rival fair was held at St. Paul. Minneapolis, at a large expense, secured the presence of the most famous racing horses and finest blooded bulls. St. Paul secured the attendance of the President of the United States and staff. The competition was great and costly. As is not unusual, the expenditures exceeded the receipts. The Minneapolis deficiency was $14,000 over and above all receipts and large amounts of private contributions. This was due for labor and material for buildings on the grounds, services in and about the fair, premiums, advertising, railroad freights, and such other like matters, as would occasion the greatest amount of complaint and public reproach if not paid. It was claimed that Morrison was, as the owner of the land, liable for the material and labor bestowed thereon, and liens were threatened to be filed on the same. Meetings were held by the leading citizens, and it was at last agreed that an amount of some $30,000 would be contributed, providing Morrison would convey his nine tenths in- [306] terest in the land and stock to appellants Sidle and Langdon, in trust for the contributors, in consideration of his being paid the money it had cost him and interest, and of having the taxes paid on said land, and of being relieved from the claims against him on account of labor and material so furnished. The amount of purchase money and interest then amounted to some $14,000; taxes due to over $2,000; and the said material and labor for which it was claimed Morrison and the land were liable to some $6,000 more,—in all some $22,000. It was also agreed that the trustees should bear all expense of defending the title against any litigation involving it. According to such agreement, Morrison conveyed the said nine tenths of said land and stock to said Sidle and Langdon, and they executed a written acknowledgment of the trust to each of the contributors. This paper stated the amount of each contribution, and the obligation to sell the land as soon as the title should be cleared from litigation, and pay the amount of advance and 10 per cent interest, if proceeds were sufficient, and if not to pay pro rata. No provision was made as to distribution in case of a surplus. Such was either not contemplated, or forgotten, or, as is very probable, it was hoped that some means might be developed to secure the land for a public fair ground for the city.

"Dorilus Morrison was one of the contributors to this general fund to the amount of $3,000. There were also contributions made by Farnham & Lovejoy, and three railroad companies, aggregating some $6,500, which were met by claims against Morrison and the 'Fair Association.' The remainder was contributed by citizens having no interest in the matter, except the reputation of the city, and among others appellant Langdon contributed $7,000 and appellant Sidle $2,500."

On August 14, 1880, the complainant, on leave, filed his supplemental and amended bill in this case, to which he made as additional parties defendant Knight, Morrison, Baldwin, [307] King, Sidle, Langdon, William D. Washburn, S. W. Farnham, James A. Lovejoy, and George A. Brackett, all citizens of Minnesota. This amended and supplemental bill, in substance, after reciting the original bill, charged that at the time of the pretended sale of the 800 shares of the capital stock of the State National Bank to Knight, the Bank had no rightful lien thereon by way of pledge for any unpaid debt, having in fact released the same by its agreement with King to accept from him $36,000 of the Northern Pacific Railroad bonds in satisfaction thereof. It further charges that the said pretended sale to Knight was no sale at all, but was merely a contrivance for the purpose of converting the title of the Bank as pledgee into an absolute title, in fraud of the complainant, and that consequently Knight, by virtue of said sale, acquired no better title than that previously held by the Bank. It is further claimed that Morrison as assignee of nine tenths of the said stock, and Sidle and Langdon as his assignees, purchased with full notice of all the equities of the complainant, and therefore are not purchasers in good faith. The amended and supplemental bill, therefore, seeks to charge Sidle, Langdon, and Knight as holders of the legal title to the stock and the property represented by it in trust for the benefit of the complainant, and prays for an account and a conveyance.

The cause was heard upon bill, answers, replication, exhibits, and testimony, and a final decree was rendered in favor of the complainant, establishing his equity as the owner of the stock and corporate property of the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association, subject to the payment to James M. Knight of the sum of $569.58, and to the payment to Jacob K. Sidle and Robert B. Langdon of the sum of $8,646.55. From that decree this appeal is prosecuted by the defendants below.

It was argued at the bar that Canfield acquired a complete equitable title to the real estate of the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association, by virtue of the sale thereof to him by King by the contract in writing of August 14, 1873, and by the deed in pursuance [308] thereof, purporting to be made by the Corporation, dated August 15, 1873. The ground of this contention is that in that negotiation and transaction King rightly represented the Corporation as its agent, and that the deed, if defective to convey the legal title, because not formally authorized by the directors at a meeting of the board, was such as equity would correct and reform so as to carry into effect the intention of the parties.

This view of the question, however, is not now open; the effect of that conveyance, both at law and in equity, having been finally adjudged between Canfield and the State National Bank by the Supreme Court of Minnesota. That judgment, as between those parties and those in privity with them, conclusively establishes, for the purposes of this case, that the deed was void at law, and that the equity of the State National Bank to the stock, and in the land as a pledge for the payment of the debt for which the stock had been hypothecated, was superior to that of Canfield. We must assume therefore, at the outset of our present inquiry, that at the date of the alleged sale of the stock to Knight, Canfield's equity consisted merely in a right to redeem the pledge, unless it had been previously released by the Bank. This, upon the evidence, we find not to be the case. The agreement between the Bank and King, claimed to have that effect, cannot operate as such. It was an agreement merely on the part of the Bank that it would exchange the stock for the agreed amount of Northern Pacific Railroad bonds, to take effect upon mutual deliveries. King was not the agent of the Bank to receive the bonds from Canfield; the title of the Bank to the stock was never relinquished by it.

On the other hand, we adopt the conclusion of the court below as to the nature of the alleged sale of the stock by the Bank to Knight. We are satisfied from the evidence that it was no sale at all; nothing was paid by Knight, and the stock was not delivered to him; it was not in fact a real transaction. The legal title of the stock was shifted from the Bank to Knight, but Knight acquired by the transaction no other or better right than that of the Bank; he still held it subject to Canfield's equitable right to redeem. Neither was Morrison, after the conveyance of nine tenths of the stock to him by Knight, in any better condition. He had full [309] notice of the complainant's equity, and, as we think, of the nature of Knight's title; consequently he and Knight thereafter, each for his own proportion, held the stock, and the real estate of which they had procured a conveyance from the Association, subject to the equity of Canfield. Sidle and Langdon are in the same plight; they took their title with express notice of Canfield's equity, and subject to the consequences of the pending litigation, the burden and expenses of which they agreed to assume. They are entitled to hold the property only on the same conditions attached to it in the hands of Knight and Morrison; they succeeded only to Morrison's title. As against Canfield, the complainant below, however, his equity being the right to redeem the property as against the Bank on the payment of its debt, the same burden rests upon it in favor of the present holders of the title, derived by successive assignments from the Bank. The decree below, as a condition of redemption against Sidle and Langdon, required only the payment by Canfield of the sum of $8,646.55, which was the amount paid in cash, on November 20, 1878, by Sidle and Langdon, to take up two of the notes given by Morrison for the payment of the purchase money from the Bank; but that amount does not represent the full amount of Morrison's payment. The whole amount paid by Morrison for nine tenths of the stock, the aggregate of three notes given at the purchase, was $12,480.48; and Canfield, in the exercise of his privilege of redemption, should be charged with the full amount due on that account.

To the extent of the difference between that sum and the sum actually charged in the decree appealed from, the decree should be modified. In all other respects it is affirmed, the costs in this court being equally divided. The cause is accordingly remanded to the Circuit Court for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

[264] FRANCIS E. HINCKLEY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
PITTSBURGH BESSEMER STEEL COMPANY (Limited).

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 264-278.)

Sales—breach of contract to manufacture—tender—special findings of court below—measure of damages—profits—secondary evidence—practice.

1. In an action to recover damages for the breach of a written contract for the purchase by the defendant of 6,000 tons of steel rails, on the special findings of the court below, it is held: that the failure of the defendant on due notice to furnish drilling directions, together with his request to postpone the delivery of the rails, and also with a notice that he was not ready to accept and pay for them, excused the plaintiff from actually manufacturing and tendering them; and that the measure of damages is the profit the plaintiff would have made, less the profit realized on rails made from the material purchased by the plaintiff with which to perform his contract.

2. This court will not reverse a judgment for alleged errors in the admission of evidence, which could not have prejudiced the plaintiff in error.

[No. 188.]

Argued April 5, 1887. Decided April 18, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Opinion below published, 17 Fed Rep. 584. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Thomas S. McClelland, for plaintiff in error:

The giving of drilling directions, mentioned in the contract, as an option reserved to plaintiff in error, was not a condition precedent to a performance of the contract on the part of the defendant in error; and its failure to manufacture and deliver the goods provided for by the contract was such a breach of the contract by it that it is barred from maintaining this action.

Palm v. Ohio & M. R. R. Co. 18 Ill. 217; Christian County v. Overholt, 18 Ill. 228.

If there is a cause of action against plaintiff in error, the measure of damages should be the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place of delivery, and not the difference between the contract price and the cost of manufacturing and delivering the goods, as found by the lower court.

Pollen v. Leroy, 30 N. Y. 549; 2 Suth. Dam. 359, and cases cited; Masterton v *The Mayor, 7 Hill, 61; 2 Stark. Ev. 7th Am. ed. 1201; Boorman v. Nash, 9 Barn. & C. 145; Story v. N. Y. & H. R. R. Co. 6 N. Y. 85; Maclean v. Dunn, 4 Bing. 722; Leigh v. Paterson, 8 Taunt. 540; Gainsford v. Carroll, 2 Barn. & C. 624.

In an action by a vendee against a vendor for a breach in not delivering the article sold, the measure of damages is the market price at the time of the breach.

Marsh v. McPherson, 105 U. S. 709 (26:1189); Hopkins v. Lee, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat, 109 (5: 218); Douglass v. M'Allister, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 298 (2: 445); Shepherd v. Hampton, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 200 (4:369); Masterton v. The Mayor, 7 Hill, 74, and cases cited.

The defendant in error was bound, both in law and good morals, to exercise due diligence to protect itself, and thereby inflict the least possible damages on the plaintiff in error, even if the latter was guilty of a breach of his contract.

Shannon v. Comstock, 21 Wend. 457; Heckscher v. McCrea, 24 Wend. 309; Hamilton v. McPherson, 28 N. Y. 76.

Mr. John N. Jewett, for defendant in error:

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, by the Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Company (Limited), a Pennsylvania corporation, against Francis E. Hinckley, to recover damages for the breach by Hinckley of a written contract for the purchase by him from the Company of 6,000 tons of steel rails. The contract was as follows: [265]

"Memorandum of Sale.

"The Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Company (Limited) have sold and hereby agree to make and deliver to the order of F. E. Hinckley, Esq., 204 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ills., and the said Hinckley has purchased and agrees to pay for, six thousand gross tons of first quality steel rails, to weigh fifty-two (52) pounds to the yard, and to be rolled true and smooth to the pattern to be furnished by the said Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Company (Limited), pattern No. 5.

"Said rails are to be made of the best quality of Bessemer steel, and to be subject to inspection as made and shipped, and to be well straightened and free from flaws, and to be drilled as may be directed; at least ninety per cent shall be in thirty (30) feet lengths, with not over ten (10) per cent of shorter lengths, diminishing by one foot differences, none to be less than twenty-four (24) feet.

"All second quality rails or excess of shorts which may be made, not exceeding five (5) per cent of each month's shipments, to be taken at the usual reduction of ten (10) per cent in price, and to be piled and shipped separately (painted white on both ends), as may be ordered by the inspector.

* See notes and cases in reference note, and digested citations at close of case, Lawyers' edition. [Ed.]

[266] "Deliveries to begin in May, 1882, in which month one thousand tons shall be delivered, and to continue at the rate of twenty-five hundred tons per month after July 1, 1882, until finished—strikes and accidents beyond ordinary control of said Steel Company, and acts of Providence preventing or suspending deliveries, alone excepted, in which case deliveries are to be delayed for a corresponding length of time only.

"Price to be fifty-eight dollars net, per ton of 2,240 pounds of finished steel rails, ex. ship or f. o. b. cars at Chicago, Ills., seller's option.

"Terms of payment, cash on delivery of inspector's certificate for each five hundred tons as fast as delivered. If shipment is delayed without fault of said Steel Company, payment is to be made in cash upon completion and delivery of each five hundred tons at Chicago and inspector's certificate. Rails to be inspected at mill as fast as completed and ready for shipment.

"In witness whereof, The said Hinckley has hereto set his hand and seal, and the Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Company (Limited), by its duly authorized officers, hath signed and affixed its corporate seal, the day and year aforesaid.

"It is further agreed that the Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Company (Limited) are not to be responsible for delays resulting from failure of railroads to furnish cars, proper efforts having been made to procure them, nor for detentions after shipment has been made.

"It is understood that the purchaser shall have the right to make one half of the order fifty-six (56) pounds per yard, pattern No. 4 of said Steel Company, notice to be given thirty days before the time for the delivery of the rails.

"Chicago, Ills., Feb. 18, 1882.

"C. H. ODELL, Broker."

One copy of the contract was signed by Hinckley, and a duplicate of it was signed by the Company.

The defendant pleaded the general issue, and the case was tried by the court on the due waiver of a jury. The court made the following special finding of facts:

[267] "1. That the written agreement set out and described in the declaration was duly executed by the plaintiff and defendant in said cause, as alleged in said declaration.

"2. That immediately after the making of said contract and before the time to begin the execution thereof, the plaintiff purchased the requisite amount of material from which to manufacture the six thousand tons of steel rails called for by said contract, and that, after the purchase of said supplies by plaintiff there was a decline in the value thereof, before the time for the delivery of any portion of said rails, and that lower prices for such supplies ruled during the months of May, June, July and August, 1882.

"3. That it appears from the parol proof heard on said trial, aside from the provision in said written contract in regard to drilling directions, that it was usual and customary for the purchaser of steel rails to give directions as to the drilling thereof, and that each railroad company has its own special rules for drilling, and the drilling of such rails is considered in the trade as a part of the work of manufacture, and a part of the duty of the manufacturer, in order to fully complete the rails for use.

"4. That, by letters dated April 3, April 20, April 26, and April 28, from plaintiff's agents to defendant, and which letters were duly received by defendant before May, 1882, defendant was requested to furnish drilling directions for the rails to be delivered in May under said contract; and defendant not only neglected to comply with such request and furnish such directions, but defendant also notified plaintiff, in reply to such request, that he, defendant, was not then prepared to receive the rails which were to be delivered under said contract in the month of May.

"Again, about the 15th of June, defendant informed plaintiff that he was becoming discouraged about being able to take the rails.

"That, about June 23, plaintiff notified defendant that it was ready to commence rolling the rails for the July deliveries, as well as to cover the thousand tons specified in the contract for delivery in May, of which plaintiff had postponed delivery at defendant's request, [268] and asked for drilling directions from the defendant, but defendant wholly neglected to give such drilling directions.

"That, about the 26th of July, defendant, in substance, informed plaintiff's agents that his financial arrangements for money to pay for said rails, pursuant to said contract, had failed, and that he could not take said rails unless plaintiff would sell them to him on six and twelve months' credit, for which the notes of the railroad company for which defendant was acting would be given, which defendant would indorse, and also further secure with first-mortgage bonds, as collateral, at fifty cents on the dollar; but, unless he could secure the rails on such terms, he could not take them; and that plaintiff declined to accept said proposition for the purchase of said rails on credit; and I further find that on the 30th of August, 1882, plaintiff notified defendant that the time for the completion of his contract for the purchase of said rails had expired, and requested defendant to advise it whether he would accept the rails or not. To this request defendant made no reply.

"I further find that while plaintiff did not expressly agree with defendant to postpone the time for the delivery of the rails to be made and delivered under said contract, yet plaintiff did in fact delay the rolling and delivery of the rails to be delivered in May, and that, by reason of the repeated statements of defendant that he was not ready to give drilling directions, not ready to use said rails, and not ready to accept them, plaintiff did postpone rolling said rails, and in fact never rolled any rails to be delivered on said contract, but that plaintiff was at all times during the months of May, July and August ready and able, in all respects, to fulfill said contract and make said rails, and the same would have been ready for delivery, as called for by said contract, if defendant had furnished drilling directions, and had not stated to plaintiff's agents that he was not ready to furnish said drilling directions and not ready to accept said rails.

"I further find that on or about the 15th day of September, 1882, defendant was formally requested to furnish drilling directions and to accept said rails, and that he replied to such request that he should decline to take any rails under said contract, and that he had made arrangements to purchase rails of others at a good deal lower price. [269]

"I therefore find, from the testimony in this case, that defendant, by requesting plaintiff to postpone the delivery of said rails, and by notifying the plaintiff that he was not ready to accept and pay for said rails, excused the plaintiff from the actual manufacture of said rails and a tender thereof to defendant.

"And I further find that defendant's statement to plaintiff, on the 26th of July, that he could not pay cash for said rails, as called for by the contract, and that he wished to buy them on credit, was in fact a notice that he would not be able to pay for said rails if rolled and tendered to him by plaintiff.

"I therefore conclude, and so find, as a matter of fact, from the evidence in the case, that said plaintiff in apt time requested defendant to furnish directions for the drilling of said rails, and that defendant neglected and refused to do so, and that, although plaintiff was ready and able to fully perform said contract and make and deliver said rails to defendant, as required by said contract, defendant refused to accept and pay for said rails.

"5. That plaintiff manufactured and sold to other persons 4,000 tons of steel rails, from the materials so purchased with which to perform said contract with defendant, for which said rails plaintiff received $54.60 per ton, delivered at a port on Lake Huron, and that plaintiff made a profit of $1.60 per ton on said 4,000 tons; that by reason of defendant's refusal to accept said rails, the plaintiff had no employment for its mill for a time, and was obliged to stop its mill for about three weeks in the month of August, 1882.

"6. That it would have cost plaintiff $50 per ton to have manufactured and delivered the rails called for by said contract to defendant, according to the terms of said contract; so that plaintiff's profits, if it had not been prevented from fulfilling said contract by the conduct of defendant, would have been $8 per ton on each ton of rails called for by said contract.

[270] "And, because of said facts, I find that defendant was guilty of a breach of said contract, and that plaintiff hath sustained damage, by reason of such breach, in the sum of $42,400."

On these findings, a judgment was entered for the plaintiff for $42,400 damages, and for costs. 17 Fed. Rep. 584. To review that judgment the defendant has brought this writ of error. After the record was filed in this court, it being discovered that there was an error in computation, in entering the judgment for $42,400 instead of $41,600, the circuit court allowed the plaintiff to remit the difference, $800, and an order was entered accordingly, as of the date of the judgment.

On the special findings the only question open for review is whether the facts found are sufficient to support the judgment. There can be no question that, on those facts, the defendant is liable in damages for a breach of the contract. It is provided in the contract that the rails are "to be drilled as may be directed." The circuit court finds that it appears from the proof, aside from the provision in the written contract in regard to drilling directions, "that it was usual and customary for the purchaser of steel rails to give directions as to the drilling thereof;" that each railroad has its own special rules for drilling; that the drilling of the rails is considered in the trade as a part of the work of manufacture, and a part of the duty of the manufacturer, in order to fully complete the rails for use; that, by four letters written in April, 1882, by the agents of the plaintiff to the defendant, and which letters were duly received by the defendant before May, 1882, he was requested to furnish drilling directions for the 1,000 tons of rails to be delivered in May, under the contract; that he neglected to comply with that request, and also notified the plaintiff that he was not then prepared to receive the rails which, by the contract, were to be delivered in May; that, in June, the plaintiff again asked for drilling directions from the defendant, in respect both to the 1,000 tons and to the 2,500 tons to be delivered in July, but the defendant neglected to give such drilling directions; and that, in the latter part of July, he notified the plaintiff, in substance, that he would not perform the contract. The circuit court further [273] finds that, by reason of the repeated statements of the defendant that he was not ready to give drilling directions, not ready to use the rails, and not ready to accept them, the plaintiff postponed the rolling of them, and never rolled any rails to be delivered on the contract, but was at all times during May, July and August, 1882, ready and able to fulfill the contract and make the rails, and the same would have been ready for delivery as called for by the contract, if the defendant had furnished drilling directions and had not stated to the agents of the plaintiff that he was not ready to furnish the drilling directions, and not ready to accept the rails; and that, on or about the 15th of September, 1882, he was formally requested to furnish drilling directions, and to accept the rails, and replied to such request that he should decline to take any rails under the contract, and had made arrangements to purchase rails of others at a lower price. The circuit court also finds that the defendant, by requesting the plaintiff to postpone the delivery of the rails, and by notifying the plaintiff that he was not ready to accept and pay for them, excused the plaintiff from actually manufacturing them and tendering them to the defendant. This conclusion is entirely warranted by the facts found; and on those facts the defendant must be held liable in damages. The only other question open on the findings is as to the proper rule of damages.

The circuit court finds that it would have cost the plaintiff $50 per ton to have manufactured and delivered the rails called for by the contract, according to its terms; that the profits of the plaintiff, if the conduct of the defendant had not prevented it from fulfilling the contract, would have been $8 per ton on each of the 6,000 tons, being $48,000; and that the plaintiff manufactured and sold to other persons 4,000 tons of rails from the materials purchased by it with which to perform the contract with the defendant, and received for such rails $54.60 per ton, and made a profit of $1.60 per ton on the 4,000 tons, being a profit, in all, of $6,400. Deducting this $6,400 from the $48,000 leaves $41,600, for which amount the judgment was finally entered.

[274] The defendant contends that the plaintiff should have manufactured the rails and tendered them to the defendant, and, upon his refusal to accept and pay for them, should have sold them in the market at Chicago, and held the defendant responsible for the difference between what they would have brought on such sale and the contract price. But we think no such rule is applicable to this case. This was a contract for the manufacture of an article, and not for the sale of an existing article. By reason of the facts found as to the conduct and action of the defendant, the plaintiff was excused from actually manufacturing the rails; and the rule of damages applicable to the case of the refusal of a purchaser to take an existing article is not applicable to a case like the present. The proposition that after the defendant had, for his own purposes, induced the plaintiff to delay the execution of the contract until after the 31st of August, 1882, and had thereafter refused to take any rails under the contract, the plaintiff should still have gone on and made the 6,000 tons of rails and sold them in the market for the defendant's account, in order to determine the amount of its recovery against the defendant, can find no countenance from a court of justice.

It is found by the circuit court that, immediately after the making of the contract and before the time to begin its execution, the plaintiff purchased the requisite amount of material from which to manufacture the 6,000 tons of rails; that after the purchase of such supplies there was a decline in their value before the time arrived for the delivery of any part of the rails; and that lower prices for such supplies ruled during May, June, July and August, 1882. It is also to be inferred, from the price at which the 4,000 tons of rails were sold by the plaintiff, that the market price of rails declined below the price named in the contract; and the reason assigned by the defendant in September, 1882, for not taking any rails under the contract, was that he had made arrangements to purchase rails of others at a lower price. Under these circumstances, the defendant is estopped from insisting that the plaintiff should have undertaken the risk and expense of actually making and selling the rails. These considerations also show that the rule of damages adopted by the circuit court was the proper one. It was in accordance with the rule laid down by this court in Phila. W. & B. R. R. Co. v. Howard, 54 U. S. 13 How. 307 [14:157]. In that case a contractor for the building of a railroad sued the company for its breach. On the question of damages this court said, p. 344 [178]: "It must be admitted that actual damages were all that could lawfully be given in an action of covenant, even if the company had been guilty of fraud. But it by no means follows that profits are not to be allowed, understanding, as we must, the term 'profits,' in this instruction, as meaning the gain which the plaintiff would have made if he had been permitted to complete his contract. Actual damages clearly include the direct and actual loss which the plaintiff sustains propter rem ipsam non habitam. And in case of a contract like this, that loss is, among other things, the difference between the cost of doing the work and the price to be paid for it. This difference is the inducement and real consideration which causes the contractor to enter into the contract. For this he expends his time, exerts his skill, uses his capital, and assumes the risks which attend the enterprise. And to deprive him of it, when the party has broken the contract and unlawfully put an end to the work, would be unjust. There is no rule of law which requires us to inflict this injustice. Wherever profits are spoken of as not a subject of damages, it will be found that something contingent upon future bargains or speculations, or states of the market, are referred to, and not the difference between the agreed price or something contracted for and its ascertainable value or cost. See Masterton v. Mayor of Brooklyn, 7 Hill, 61, and cases there referred to. We hold it to be a clear rule that the gain or profit of which the contractor was deprived by the refusal of the company to allow him to proceed with and complete the work, was a proper subject of damages."

In United States v. Speed, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 77 [19:449], where the defendant agreed to pack a specified number of hogs for the plaintiff, and made all his preparations to do so, and was ready to do so, but the defendant refused to furnish the hogs to be packed, this court, citing with approval Masterton v. Mayor of Brooklyn, [276] held that the measure of damages was the difference between the cost of doing the work and the price agreed to be paid for it, "making reasonable deduction for the less time engaged, and for release from the care, trouble, risk, and responsibility attending a full execution of the contract."

These views were again approved by this court in United States v. Behan, 110 U. S. 338 [28:168].

In the present case the ability of the plaintiff to fulfill the contract at all times is found as a fact by the circuit court, as also the fact that, by reason of the defendant's refusal to accept the rails, the plaintiff was obliged to stop its mill for about three weeks, in August, 1882. The defendant received the benefit of all the mitigation of damages which, upon the facts found, he was entitled to claim, and the benefit of all the profits made by the plaintiff which could properly be regarded as a substitute for the profits it would have received had its contract with the defendant been carried out.

The defendant objects that, within the statement of the rule in United States v. Speed, there was no deduction made in this case for the time saved, and the care, trouble, risk and responsibility avoided by the plaintiff by not fully executing the contract; but there are no findings of fact which raise any such question. The finding is that it would have cost the plaintiff $50 per ton to have manufactured and delivered the rails called for by the contract, according to its terms. Under this finding it must be held that every proper element of cost entered into the $50; and it was for the defendant to have requested findings which would authorize an increase of that sum as cost.

There is a bill of exceptions in the case, on which two questions are raised by the defendant as to the admission of testimony. The contract between the parties was negotiated by C. H. Odell, who signed it as broker, between whom and the defendant the correspondence thereafter, down to and including the first of May, 1882, was carried on, Odell acting for the plaintiff. He made the contract under special instructions, his authority being limited to that of a sales agent. On his examination as a witness [277] at the trial he testified that all of his communications with the plaintiff in regard to the business with the defendant were in writing or by telegram. He also testified, without objection, that he kept the plaintiff fully advised of his correspondence with the defendant concerning the rails. H. P. Smith, the business manager of the plaintiff, was then called as a witness for the plaintiff, and was asked if the plaintiff was advised of the correspondence between Odell and the defendant, which had been read in evidence, and if Odell's actions were approved by the witness as manager of the plaintiff. To this the defendant objected, on the ground that the communications between Odell and the plaintiff consisted of letters and telegrams, which were the only competent evidence of the contents thereof. The court overruled the objection, and the witness stated that the Company was advised of the correspondence and actions of Odell, and fully approved and ratified the same. The defendant excepted to the decision admitting the evidence. We see no objection to the admission of this evidence, independently of the fact that Odell had, without objection testified to substantially the same thing. The defendant, in his correspondence with Odell, all of which is set forth in the bill of exceptions, treated Odell as representing the plaintiff, and cannot now be heard to question his authority to do so, or to demand further evidence of such an authority, or of the adoption by the plaintiff of what Odell was doing, saying and asking on behalf of the plaintiff. The question asked of Smith, as to whether he, as manager of the plaintiff, approved of Odell's actions, and the answer he made, were, therefore, unnecessary, and could not affect the merits of the case.

Smith was further asked to state in detail the elements of the cost of rolling the rails in question. He produced a memorandum showing items taken from the plaintiff's books, which, added together, exhibited the cost, in August, 1882, of manufacturing one ton of such rails as those described in the contract; and, on being asked by the plaintiff's attorney to testify to those items, the court, under the defendant's objection, allowed him to read the items from [278] the memorandum. He further testified, under an objection and exception by the defendant, that the actual cost to the plaintiff of making and delivering the rails in Chicago would have been $48.25; that he stated the elements of such cost from a memorandum prepared by himself, the elements being taken from the books of the plaintiff; that he knew the purchase price of all material which went into the manufacture, because he purchased all of it himself; that the statement was prepared by him from his personal knowledge of the cost; that he called off the items from a pencil memorandum to the book-keeper, who wrote them down; that he (the witness) knew the items to be correctly stated; and that the information as to the items was made up from records running through a series of four or five months, and representing an average as to the cost per ton.

The defendant contends that this evidence was inadmissible, in the absence of an opportunity for him to examine the plaintiff's books, with a view to a cross examination of the witness as to the mode of computation adopted by him, the memorandum being, as contended, the result of the conclusions of the witness from the examination of a large number of entries in the books of the plaintiff.

It is a sufficient answer to this objection that the cost of the rails was not taken by the court at the sum of $48.25, the sum fixed by Smith; but the bill of exceptions shows that the cost was taken at $50 a ton, from the testimony of Richard C. Hannah, another witness; so that, even if the testimony was erroneously admitted (which it is not necessary to decide), the defendant suffered no prejudice from its admission.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

HENRY C. HUISKAMP ET AL., Partners as HUISKAMP BROTHERS, Interpleaders, Plffs. in Err., [310]

v.

MOLINE WAGON COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 310-324.)

Attachment, proceedings—fraud—interplea, under Missouri Statute, by preferred creditors—chattel mortgages—evidence—record of trial on plea in abatement as—partnership—payment of individual debt with partnership property—erroneous instructions.

1. Where a debtor in failing circumstances has the right to prefer a creditor, if such creditor has a bona fide debt, and takes a mortgage with the intent of securing it, and not with the purpose of aiding the debtor to hinder and delay other creditors, the mortgage is valid, even though the mortgagee knows that the debtor is insolvent and that his intention is to hinder and delay other creditors.

2. Upon the trial in attachment proceedings of an issue raised by an interplea, under the Missouri Statute, by preferred creditors as mortgagees, the record of the proceedings in a trial on a plea in abatement, including a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, to which proceedings the interpleaders were not parties, is inadmissible as against them.

3. One of two partners, with the consent of the other, may subject partnership property, against which no specific lien exists, to the payment of his individual debt.

4. The fact that a creditor of a partnership, who has acquired no lien, has received no notice of its dissolution, does not affect a bona fide transfer of the partnership property in payment of the individual debts of a member of the firm.

5. A bona fide transfer of partnership property to a member of the firm or a third person, before the interposition of a court is sought, extinguishes the equities of the partners, and the derivative equities of the creditors therein.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western Division of the Western District of Missouri. Opinion below published, 14 Fed. Rep. 156. Reversed, Remanded.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. James Hagerman, for plaintiffs in error:

A debtor in failing circumstances has the right to prefer a creditor; and although the creditor may know that the debtor is insolvent, and that in making the preference he intends to defraud other creditors, yet, if the preferred creditor has a bona fide debt and takes the mortgage with the intent to secure himself, and not with the fraudulent purpose of aiding the debtor to defraud other creditors, then the mortgage is upheld.

The right of the partnership creditors to priority of payment springs from and is worked out through the equitable right of the individual partners.

Case v. Beauregard, 99 U. S. 119 (25: 370); Fitzpatrick v. Flannagan, 106 U. S. 648 (27: 211); McGinty v. Flannagan, Id. 661 (27: 215). See also Locke v. Lewis, 124 Mass. 1; Howe v. Lawrence, 9 Cush. 553.

The bona fides of the transaction is the only test by which to determine the right of joint creditors to have property, which has been transferred upon dissolution to an individual member of the firm, applied to the payment of the joint debts. If the transfer has been honestly made and for a valuable consideration, the property has thereby become separate estate, wholly free from any claim of the joint creditors.

Messrs. S. A. Lynde and C. M. Osborn, for defendant in error:

A conveyance or mortgage of partnership property, made by a partner in his individual behalf, to satisfy or secure the payment of his individual debts, is fraudulent and void as to the partnership and its creditors.

If the purchaser has notice that the property is partnership property, or that the partner is acting without authority from the partnership, he will be held to act mala fide and in fraud of the partnership.

To the validity of a transfer or agreement of dissolution and division of the partnership effects it is an invariable condition that it be bona fide, and if not, it is invalid and a nullity, save only in the case of a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice of the mala fides of the transaction.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 8th of January, 1880, the Moline Wagon Company, an Illinois corporation, commenced an attachment suit in the Circuit Court of Putnam County, in the State of Missouri, against Jacob Rummel and Edwin R. Cutler, copartners under the name of J. Rummel & Son. The suit was brought under a Statute of Missouri, and claimed an indebtedness of $6,722.61. The ground on which the attachment was issued was that the defendants had "fraudulently conveyed or assigned their property or effects so as to hinder and delay their creditors," and had "fraudulently concealed, removed or disposed of their property or effects so as to hinder or delay their creditors," and were "about fraudulently to convey or assign their property or effects so as to hinder or delay their creditors." Under this attachment the sheriff, on the 9th of January, 1880, seized a quantity of goods in the possession of the firm of Huiskamp Brothers, the proceeds of which are the subject of controversy. These goods were subsequently sold as perishable property, and the proceeds, $5,246.50, were placed in court. [311]

On the 15th of March, 1880, the plaintiff removed the suit into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western Division of the Western District of Missouri. Prior to the sale of the goods, and on the 8th of May, 1880, Huiskamp Brothers filed in the suit, under the Statute of Missouri, what is called an interplea, claiming to be the owners of the goods attached, and to have been such owners at the date of the levy of the attachment, and demanding a return of the property.

On the 17th of May, 1880, Rummel filed a plea in the nature of a plea in abatement, denying the indebtedness, denying the several frauds alleged, and praying for an abatement of the attachment and a release of the property. After the sale of the property, and on the 17th of May, 1881, Huiskamp Brothers filed an amended interplea, claiming that when the goods were seized the same belonged to them and were in their possession; that the goods were wrongfully seized; and that the proceeds of their sale in court, amounting to $5,246.50, were their property. The plaintiff answered the amended interplea and denied its allegations. A trial of the interplea was had before the court and a jury in October, 1882, at which a verdict was found that the property attached and the proceeds thereof "were not and are not the property of the interpleaders," on which a judgment was entered for the plaintiff and against the interpleaders, to review which the interpleaders have brought this writ of error.

The mode of procedure by interplea in an attachment suit, where a third party claims the attached property, is authorized by section 449 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri, of 1879, which is as follows: "Any person claiming property, money, effects, or credits attached, may interplead in the cause, verifying the same by affidavit; and issues may be made upon such interplea, and shall be tried as like issues between plaintiff and defendant, and without any unnecessary delay."

[312] The bill of exceptions contains the following statement as to the proceedings had at the trial:

"The interpleaders, in support of their title to the property in controversy, offered testimony, which was admitted, tending to prove such title, as follows:

"First. A chattel mortgage, made by defendant Jacob Rummel, to the interpleaders, on the stock of merchandise, the proceeds of which are in controversy, dated December 24, 1879, and the notes of said Jacob Rummel to said interpleaders secured thereby, of same date, one for $2,500 and one for $1,500, each due one day after date, and bearing 10 per cent interest from date. Said mortgage was signed and acknowledged in due form, and filed for record in the office of the recorder of deeds of Putnam County, Missouri, on January 1, 1880. Said mortgage provided that the mortgagees might sell the mortgaged property at public sale on ten days' notice.

"Second. That said stock of merchandise was actually transferred and delivered to the interpleaders on January 6, 1880, prior to the seizure of the same under the writ of attachment issued in the case of the plaintiffs against the defendants.

"The interpleaders further offered testimony, which was admitted in evidence, tending to show that they were wholesale dealers in boots and shoes in the City of Keokuk, Lee County, Iowa, and had been for many years; that, prior to January, 1878, the defendants Jacob Rummel and Son were partners engaged in business in the Town of Unionville, Putnam County, Missouri, under the firm name of Rummel & Son, and their business was that of general retail merchandise, including farming implements, wagons, etc.; that, in January, 1878, the said partners dissolved said firm and divided the property and business thereof, and both of said partners informed the interpleaders of such dissolution.

"That, after such dissolution, the said Jacob Rummel continued at the same place the general retail merchandise business, and the defendant Ed. R. Cutler engaged in the business of selling agricultural implements, including wagons; that, after January, 1878, as between themselves, the said Rummel had no interest in the profits or losses of the business carried on by Cutler in the agricultural implement business, and Cutler no interest in the profits or [313] losses of the merchandise business; that the indebtedness for which the stock of merchandise was mortgaged or pledged was for goods sold to Jacob Rummel after the dissolution and division of the business and property of the firm of Rummel & Son; that when the interpleaders took the mortgage, and also when they took possession of the stock of merchandise, they understood that the same belonged to Jacob Rummel, and had been led to so believe from the statements of both Cutler and Rummel; that they took said mortgage and possession of said stock of merchandise in good faith, to secure their debt, and not to hinder, delay or defraud, or to assist in hindering, delaying or defrauding, the creditors of the said Rummel or Rummel & Son; that Rummel made the conveyance and transfer to the interpleaders in good faith, to secure their debt, and not with the fraudulent purpose of hindering, delaying or defrauding his creditors, or those of the firm of Rummel & Son."

Luke Huiskamp, one of the interpleaders, testified to the circumstances under which Huiskamp Brothers took the mortgage and entered into possession of the mortgaged property. His testimony shows that they did so upon the understanding and belief, derived from both Rummel and Cutler, that the property belonged to Rummel and that the only purpose of Huiskamp Brothers was to secure bona fide debts due to them, and to certain other creditors, by Rummel.

The bill of exceptions then goes on to state as follows:

"Jacob Rummel, a witness for the interpleaders, on his cross examination, among other things testified that Thomas M. Fee was the attorney of interpleaders, and was present at the time of the taking possession by the interpleaders of the property in controversy, and has been such attorney from that time until the present; that, at the time of the trial of the plea in abatement of Rummel, said Fee was the attorney of Rummel, and was employed by Rummel to assist, and did assist, in the trial of such plea in abatement.

"The plaintiffs offered testimony, which was admitted in evidence, tending to show that the interpleaders took the mortgage on, and possession of, the stock of merchandise in controversy, not in good faith, but to assist the defendant Cutler in hindering, delaying and defrauding his creditors and the creditors of the firm of Rummel & Son; that there was no dissolution of the firm, or division of the firm property, in January, 1878, or afterwards; that Jacob Rummel made the transfer and conveyance to interpleaders with the intent to hinder, delay and defraud his creditors; that plaintiffs were engaged in the manufacture and sale of wagons, and had been for many years, and had, prior to January, 1878, dealt with Rummel & Son, and continued to deal with them, after that time; that they never knew of the dissolution of said firm or division of its property, and there never was any published notice of such dissolution; that the debt on which they brought suit in the attachment proceedings was con- [314] tracted on their part under the belief that the firm of Rummel & Son was still in existence."

The plaintiff then offered in evidence the affidavit on which the attachment was issued in the main suit against Rummel and Cutler, the plea in abatement of Rummel thereto, and that part of the record in the attachment suit which showed the proceedings on the trial of such plea in abatement, including the verdict and the judgment, the verdict being the finding of the issues for the plaintiff, and the judgment being that the plea in abatement be overruled and the attachment sustained. The interpleaders objected to the introduction of the affidavit, plea in abatement; record entries, verdict and judgment, upon the grounds that they were not parties to the trial and issues on the plea in abatement, "And that the issues tried thereon were entirely separate and distinct from the issues upon trial here; and hence the testimony is irrelevant and immaterial, relating to different parties and different subject matter." The bill of exceptions states that "The court overruled the objections of the interpleaders and admitted said papers for one purpose: to show that the conveyance and transfer of the stock of merchandise in controversy to the interpleaders was fraudulent on the part of Jacob Rummel; to which action of the court, in overruling said objections and admitting said testi- [315] mony, the interpleaders at the time excepted."

Under the Statute of Missouri writs of attachment are obtained at the time of or after the commencement of the suit, upon an affidavit specifying one or more of the statutory causes of attachment. Sections 438 and 439 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri provide for the filing, by the defendant in the attachment, of a plea, in the nature of a plea in abatement, putting in issue the truth of the facts alleged in the affidavit on which the attachment was sued out, and for a trial of the issue.

In addition to the ruling as to the proceedings on the plea in abatement, the court, in charging the jury, said: "In the attachment suit between the Moline Wagon Company and Rummel and Cutler, Rummel filed what in law is termed a plea in abatement; that is, he denied the facts alleged in the affidavit made by the Company to obtain the attachment. The law allows attachments to issue and property to be seized in cases only where debtors have dealt, or are about to deal, with their property in an illegal way. The affidavit made by the Moline Wagon Company at the time they sued out their attachment, in appropriate legal language charged that Rummel and Cutler had or were about fraudulently to convey their property so as to hinder and delay their creditors in the collection of their debts. This charge Rummel denied. A trial which was had on this issue resulted in the sustaining of the attachment; that is, the charge made in the affidavit by the Moline Wagon Company, that Rummel had fraudulently conveyed, or was about fraudulently to convey, the property in controversy, to hinder and delay creditors, was true. Cutler, the defendant with Rummel in the attachment suit, did not appear, and thereby confessed the charge of fraud."

The court also said in its charge: "So far as the intent to defraud, hinder, and delay creditors on part of Rummel is concerned, a trial of that issue has been had in this court, with the result brought to your notice by reading from the records. The intention of Rummel in making the mortgage to Huiskamp Brothers was found to have been fraudulent; but this of itself is not sufficient to make the mortgage [316] fraudulent as to Huiskamp Brothers. Huiskamp Brothers may have known, when they accepted the mortgage from Rummel, that he intended to defraud, hinder and delay his creditors by it; yet, if they in no way participated in the fraud of Rummel, did no act to aid or assist him in the illegal act, and intended to secure their debt only, the mortgage as to them is valid, and they are entitled to the benefit of the same; but, on the other hand, if, aside from the securing of their own debt, Huiskamp Brothers, by and through the mortgage, undertook to aid and assist Rummel in his fraudulent purposes to hinder and delay the Moline Wagon Company, or any other creditor, in the collection of their debt, in such case the mortgage is void, and they can claim nothing under it, as against creditors. This is the important question in the case, and you should carefully examine the whole of the testimony bearing upon this point."

The interpleaders excepted to those portions of the charge which referred to the trial of the issues between the plaintiff and Rummel, on the ground that neither the proceedings on Rummel's plea in abatement, nor Cutler's confession of the charge of fraud made in the affidavit, could affect the rights of the interpleaders.

Although the transaction between Rummel and Huiskamp Brothers may have been the subject of the trial on the plea in abatement, we are of opinion that the evidence in question was improperly admitted. In order to invalidate the mortgage of Rummel to Huiskamp Brothers it must have been made with the intent, on the part of Rummel, to hinder and delay his other creditors, and Huiskamp Brothers must have accepted it with the intent of assisting Rummel to hinder and delay his other creditors. A debtor in failing circumstances having the right to prefer a creditor, if the preferred creditor has a bona fide debt, and takes a mortgage with the intent of securing such debt, and not with the purpose of aiding the debtor to hinder and delay other creditors, the mortgage is valid, even though the mortgagee knows that the debtor is insolvent and that the debtor's intention is to hinder and delay other creditors. It was necessary, therefore, for the plaintiff, on the trial of the issue with the interpleaders, to make proof of the unlawful intent of Rummel in making the mortgage, irrespective of any intent of Huiskamp Brothers in accepting it. Such proof could not be made as against the interpleaders, in view of what the evidence which they offered tended to show, by proving that the issue as to the intent of Rummel had been tried and found against him in [329]
the trial on his plea of abatement. That was an issue to which the interpleaders were not parties, and the record of its trial was wholly inadmissible as against the interpleaders. The bill of exceptions states that the papers were admitted to show "that the conveyance and transfer of the stock of merchandise in controversy to the interpleaders was fraudulent on the part of Jacob Rummel." The interpleaders were not parties to the proceedings, did not appear in them, did not control them, and cannot be affected by them. For this error there must be a new trial; but, as there were other parts of the charge of the court, and refusals of the court to charge as requested by the interpleaders, which were excepted to, and which we think were erroneous, and which may recur upon a new trial, it seems proper to consider them.

The following portion of the charge of the court was excepted to: "But if no legal dissolution of the partnership took place in January, 1878, or since, and the partners continued to hold the property in controversy as partnership property, bought, sold, and advertised it as firm property, such property remained partnership property, so far as creditors are concerned, who knew nothing of the division and who trusted the firm. Under the view of the case last presented you will have to determine whether there was a dissolution of the partnership. As already stated, it is an undisputed fact that, up to January, 1878, a partnership between Rummel and Cutler did exist; that that partnership dealt in general merchandise, including farming implements, wagons, etc., and that dealings prior to that time were had between the Moline Wagon Company and the firm of Rummel & Son. The Moline Wagon Company had a right to presume that the persons once composing a firm, and who continue doing business under the firm name, are still partners, and that the partnership continues to exist until notice of a dissolution was given. No agreement or understanding between the partners—no division of the property of the firm—can relieve either the firm or the partners of their legal liability as to creditors who extend credit to the firm; nor are creditors who extend credit to the firm bound to regard pub-[321] lic rumors, even if they heard them, if the partners continue the partnership name and avail themselves of the partnership credit. You are therefore instructed that the partnership between Rummel and Cutler existing in 1878 continued to exist up to the time of the creation of the debts sued on by the Moline Wagon Company, unless public notice of the dissolution of the partnership was given, or actual notice of such dissolution was brought home to the Moline Wagon Company. If, under this view of the law, you shall find, from the evidence, that plaintiff, the Moline Wagon Company, gave credit to the firm of Rummel & Son, composed of Rummel and Cutler, then the firm and each of the partners are liable for the debt thus contracted. All of the assets of the partnership, both merchandise, notes, and accounts, as well as all wages and property of the partnership which Cutler" [Rummel?] "may have handled in his division of the partnership, as well as all notes and accounts which Cutler may have taken, together with all property of the partners, in case of insufficiency of partnership assets, are liable for debts created by the partnership. If you shall find that the partnership once existing between Rummel and Cutler had not been dissolved, and the property in dispute to be partnership property, then Rummel could not take such partnership property and pay an individual debt with it, such as Huiskamp Brothers claim to have, and the mortgage read in evidence, given them, is void as against creditors of the firm."

In connection with this portion of the charge the interpleaders requested the court to give the following instructions to the jury:

"3. If the jury find, from the evidence, that Rummel and Cutler led Huiskamp Brothers to believe that the goods belonged to Rummel, and they accepted the mortgage and took the goods under such belief, then they are entitled to the same rights, by virtue of the mortgage and their possession, as if the goods actually belonged to Rummel at the time the mortgage was made, and when they took possession of the goods."

"4. If the jury find that, as between Rummel and Cutler, the goods belonged to Rummel at the time he made the mortgage and Huiskamp Brothers took possession of the same, then the interpleaders are entitled to recover, although, as to the plaintiffs in this case, the firm of Rummel & Son was in existence by reason of the fact that the plaintiffs had never been notified of any change of the firm of Rummel & Son. In such case, Rummel & Son would be liable to the plaintiffs, but the plaintiffs would have no lien on the stock of goods, and Huiskamp Brothers could acquire title thereto by a valid mortgage from Rummel." [322]

"5. There is a difference between the dissolution of a firm and the settlement of the accounts of the partners between themselves and the firm. A partnership may be dissolved and the property divided in part, leaving the settlement of the accounts between the partners to be effected in the future; and, in this case, if the firm of Rummel & Son was dissolved in 1879, and Rummel took the stock of merchandise, with the consent of his copartner, and was to be charged therewith, then from that time, as between Rummel and Cutler, the former would be the owner of the goods, and could make a valid mortgage of the same in his own name."

"7. The test of a partnership, as between the partners, is the sharing of the profits and the losses of the business; and, in this case, if, after January 18, 1878, Cutler was not to share the profits and losses of the store business, but Rummel alone was to have such profits and bear such losses, then, after that time, as between themselves, they were not partners in fact. If they should lead others to believe that they were partners, then they would be liable to whoever acted on such belief and gave them credit. Such creditors would not, however, have a lien on the property belonging to one of the partners, as between themselves, and could not claim the same from a party who, in good faith, for value, took such property from the partner really owning it."

The court refused to give these instructions, and to its action in respect to each the interpleaders excepted.

The substance of the concluding sentence of the portion of the charge last above recited is that, even though the partnership between [323] Rummel and Cutler was not dissolved, and the property continued to be partnership property, it was not in the power of Rummel, even with the consent of Cutler, to take any of such property and pay with it the individual debt of Rummel to Huiskamp Brothers, and therefore, the mortgage to them was void, as against the plaintiff. The plaintiff had introduced testimony on the trial tending to show that there was no dissolution of the firm of Rummel & Son, nor any division of the firm property, in January, 1878, or afterwards; and the instruction referred to was based upon the view that the jury might find that the partnership was never dissolved, and its property never divided. But the instruction was contrary to the ruling in the case of Fitzpatrick v. Flannagan, 106 U. S. 648, 654 [27: 211, 213], where this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Matthews, said: "The legal right of a partnership creditor to subject the partnership property to the payment of his debt consists simply in the right to reduce his claim to judgment, and to sell the goods of his debtors on execution. His right to appropriate the partnership property specifically to the payment of his debt, in equity, in preference to creditors of an individual partner, is derived through the other partner, whose original right it is to have the partnership assets applied to the payment of partnership obligations. And this equity of the creditor subsists as long as that of the partner, through which it is derived, remains; that is, so long as the partner himself, in the language of this court in Case v. Beauregard, 99 U. S. 119, 125 [25:370, 372], 'retains an interest in the firm assets, as a partner, a court of equity will allow the creditors of the firm to avail themselves of his equity, and enforce, through it, the application of those assets primarily to payment of the debts due them, whenever the property comes under its administration.'"

It follows, from this view, that, even though the partnership of Rummel & Son was not dissolved, Rummel had the right, with the consent of Cutler, to appropriate the property to the payment of his individual debt to Huiskamp Brothers, because the plaintiff, at the time the mortgage was made by Rummel to Huiskamp Brothers, had no specific lien upon the property, and there was no trust impressed upon it at that time, which could be enforced [324] by the plaintiff. It was only necessary that the disposition of the property should have been bona fide on the part of both parties, and without any intent to hinder or delay the plaintiff. Howe v. Lawrence, 9 Cush. 553, and cases there cited; Locke v. Lewis, 124 Mass. 1.

It was also error in the court to refuse to charge, as requested in the fourth prayer of the interpleaders, that if, as between Rummel and Cutler, the goods belonged to Rummel, the interpleaders were entitled to recover, although the plaintiff had not been notified of any change in the firm of Rummel & Son; and error to charge, as it did, the converse of this proposition. The fact of notice or no notice to the plaintiff could not affect the question in issue, so long as the plaintiff had acquired no lien on the goods prior to the mortgage by Rummel to the interpleaders, and that mortgage was made in good faith.

It was also error in the court to refuse to charge, as requested in the fifth prayer of the interpleaders, that "If the firm of Rummel & Son was dissolved in 1879, and Rummel took the stock of merchandise, with the consent of his copartner, and was to be charged therewith, then, from that time, as between Rummel and Cutler, the former would be the owner of the goods, and could make a valid mortgage of the same in his own name." The proposition involved in this request presupposes, of course, that the transaction between Rummel and Cutler was made in good faith, and in that view, the instruction requested was in accordance with the rule laid down by this court in Case v. Beauregard and approved in Fitzpatrick v. Flannagan, to the effect, that "If, before the interposition of the court is asked, the property has ceased to belong to the partnership, if by a bona fide transfer it has become the several property either of one partner or of a third person, the equities of the partners are extinguished, and consequently the derivative equities of the creditors are at an end." See also Howe v. Lawrence and Locke v. Lewis, above cited.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded, with a direction to award a new trial.

CATHERINE M. AIKEN, Admrx. of JOSEPH A. AIKEN, Deceased, JOHN H. MENGE ET AL., Copartners, as JOSEPH A. AIKEN & Co., AND CITY OF NEW ORLEANS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 444-450.)

Constitutional law—wharfage—States may regulate—reasonableness of charges, how determined—tonnage charges—application of proceeds—profit to lessee.

1. In the absence of interference by Congress, a State may establish, manage and carry on works and improvements of a local character, though they necessarily more or less affect interstate commerce.
2. Wharfage is subject to local state laws, Congress having passed no Act to regulate it; and by those laws its reasonableness must be determined.
3. Charges for wharfage, graduated by tonnage of vessels using a wharf, are not open to the objection that they are duties on tonnage within the meaning of the Constitution.
4. Where wharfage charges are reasonable, it in no way concerns those who pay them, what application is made of the proceeds. Their appropriation to maintain, extend, light and police the wharves is unobjectionable, although a profit may be realized by lessees from the city which owns them.

Argued Jan. 5, 1887. Decided April 25, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Reported below, 4 Woods, 208. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John H. Kennard and William W. Howe, for appellants.

Messrs. William S. Benedict, George Denégre and Thomas L. Bayne, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case was filed in the Circuit Court of the United States by the appellants, for themselves and all others in like interest who should come in and contribute to the expenses of the suit, against Catherine M. Aiken, administratrix of Joseph A. Aiken, and others, residents of New Orleans, doing business under the firm name of Joseph A. Aiken & Co., and against the City of New Orleans. The complainants are owners of steamboats plying between New Orleans and other ports and places on the Mississippi River and its branches in other States than Louisiana; and the burden of their complaint is that the rates of wharfage [445] which they are compelled to pay for their vessels at New Orleans are unreasonable and excessive, are really duties of tonnage, and impeed in violation of the Constitution of the United States. The defendants, Joseph A. Aiken & Co., at the time of filing the bill, were lessees of the public wharves belonging to the City of New Orleans, under a lease from the City made in May, 1881, for the term of five years; and, as such lessees, charged and collected the wharfage complained of. The object of the bill, as shown by its prayer, was to obtain an injunction to prevent the defendants from exacting the excessive charges referred to, the complainants expressing a willingness to pay all reasonable wharfage.

The bill alleges that on the 17th of January, 1875, the council of the City of New Orleans adopted an ordinance, "fixing and regulating charges for wharfage, levee, and other facilities afforded by the City of New Orleans to commerce," by which ordinance, among other matters and things, it was ordained that the wharfage dues on all steamboats shall be fixed as follows: "Not over five days, ten cents per ton, and each day thereafter, five dollars per day; boats arriving and departing more than once a week, five cents per ton each trip; boats lying up for repairs during the summer months to occupy such wharves as may not be required for shipping, for thirty days or under, one dollar per day." The entire ordinance was filed with the bill as an exhibit, showing the rates of wharfage to be charged for vessels of every kind.

The bill then states that on the 17th of May, 1881, the council of the City adopted an ordinance directing the administrator of commerce to advertise for sealed proposals for the sale of the revenues of the wharves and levees for the term of five years, upon certain conditions specified, amongst which were the following; viz., to keep the wharves and levees in good repair; to construct such new wharves as might be necessary, not exceeding the expenditure, in any one year, of $25,000; to light the wharves with electric lights; and to pay the City annually the sum of $40,000, of which $30,000 should be devoted to the maintenance of a harbor police for the protection of commerce, and the remaining $10,000 should be devoted exclusively to the payment of salaries of wharf- [446] ingers, signal officers, and other employees on the levees. The sale was to be adjudicated to the persons who should agree to charge the lowest rates of wharfage. Joseph A. Aiken put in a proposal to take the lease on the conditions specified, at the rates of wharfage named in the Ordinance of 1875, with certain reductions which he agreed to make from time to time; and this proposal was accepted by the council.

The power to construct and maintain levees and wharves, and to prescribe and collect rates of levee dues and wharfage, had been conferred upon the city council by its charter (Act of March 16, 1870, No. 7, § 12); and by the Act of March 18, 1871, it was authorized to lease the wharves, upon adjudication, for any term not to exceed ten years at a time. Laws of 1871, No. 48, § 7.

The point raised by the complainants is that the rates of wharfage proposed by the lessees were necessarily enhanced by the condition requiring them to erect new wharves, to maintain electric lights, and to pay the City $40,000 per annum for the maintenance of a harbor police, and the payment of salaries to wharfingers, etc. They argue, therefore, that the rates agreed to be charged were intended, not merely as compensation for the use of wharves already constructed, but as a tax to raise money for the use of the City, to enable it to do those things the expense of which should be defrayed from its general resources; it being contended that wharfage cannot be charged for the purpose of raising money to build wharves, but only for the use of them when built. The complainants contend that the charges are unreasonable and excessive as wharfage, and therefore unauthorized as such, and, in effect, a direct duty, or burden, upon commerce. They offered a good deal of evidence to show that the rates of wharfage charged are onerous and excessive, and that, without the conditions referred to, the lessees could have offered to take much lower rates; or, at all events, that much lower rates would have been a reasonable and sufficient compensation. On the other hand, the defendant's offered evidence to show that the rates were reasonable, and that, with the same or even higher rates, the city itself, before leasing out its wharves, lost every year a [447] large amount of money in their administration. The court below declared "that the exactions of wharfage are substantially expended for the benefit of those using the wharves, and that the proof does not satisfy us that the rates are exorbitant or excessive." Ouachita Packet Co. v. Aiken, 4 Woods, 208, 213. We do not think it necessary to scrutinize the evidence very closely. With the circuit court, we see nothing in the purposes for which the lessees were required to expend or pay money, at all foreign to the general object of keeping up and maintaining proper wharves, and providing for the security and convenience of those using them. The case is clearly within the principle of the former decisions of this court, which affirm the right of a State, in the absence of regulation by Congress, to establish, manage and carry on works and improvements of a local character, though necessarily more or less affecting interstate and foreign commerce. We may particularly refer to the recent cases of Trans. Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691 [27:584]; Morgan v. Louisiana, 118 U. S. 455 [ante, 237]; and Huse v. Glover, 119 U. S. 543 [ante, 487], in which most of the former decisions involving the same principle are cited and referred to. The first of these was a case of wharfage; the second, one of quarantine; and the third, that of a lock in Illinois River constructed by the State of Illinois in aid of navigation. The same principle was applied and enforced in the cases of Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299 [13:996], on the subject of pilotage; in Mobile Co. v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691 [26:238], where a state law provided for the improvement of the river and harbor of Mobile; in the various cases of bridges over navigable rivers which have come before this court, and which are reviewed and approved in Escanaba Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678 [27:442]; and in Turner v. Maryland, Id. 38 [27:370], which related to the inspection of tobacco. The same principle was reaffirmed, with the limitations to which its application is subject, in the recent case of Robbins v. Shelby Co. Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 498 [ante, 694]. In all such cases of local concern, though incidentally affecting commerce, we have held that the courts of the United States cannot, as such, interfere with the regulations made by the State, nor sit in judgment on the [448] charges imposed for the use of improvements or facilities afforded, or for the services rendered under state authority. It is for Congress alone, under its power to regulate commerce with foreign Nations and among the several States, to correct any abuses that may arise, or to assume to itself the regulation of the subject. If, in any case of this character, the courts of the United States can interfere in advance of Congressional legislation, it is (as was said in Morgan v. Louisiana, qua supra), where there is a manifest purpose, "by roundabout means, to invade the dominion of federal authority."

Wharfage, the matter now under consideration, is governed by the local state laws; no Act of Congress has been passed to regulate it. By the state laws it is generally required to be reasonable; and by those laws its reasonableness must be judged. If it does not violate them, as before said, the United States Courts cannot interfere to prevent its exaction. Of course, neither the State, nor any municipal corporation acting under its authority, can lay duties of tonnage; for that is expressly forbidden by the Constitution; but charges for wharfage may be graduated by the tonnage of vessels using a wharf; and that this is not a duty of tonnage, within the meaning of the Constitution, has been distinctly held in several cases; amongst others, in those of Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 80 [24:377]; Packet Co. v. St. Louis, 100 U. S. 423 [25: 688]; Packet Co. v. Catlettsburg, 105 U. S. 559 [26: 1169]; and Trans. Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691 [supra.]

The charges in the present case are professedly for wharfage, and we see nothing in the ordinance fixing the rates inconsistent with the idea that they are such. The City, by its charter, had the power to fix the rates of wharfage, and it established those now complained of. We do not see the slightest pretext for calling them anything else than wharfage. The manner in which the receipts are to be appropriated does not change the character of the charges made. In the case of Huse v. Glover, 119 U. S. 543, 549 [ante, 487, 490], it was said: "By the terms tax, impost, duty, mentioned in the ordinance [the Ordinance of 1787], is meant a charge for the use of the government, not compensation for improvements. The fact that if [449] any surplus remains from the tolls, over what is used to keep the locks in repair, and for their collection, it is to be paid into the state treasury as a part of the revenue of the State, does not change the character of the toll or impost. In prescribing the rates it would be impossible to state in advance what the tolls would amount to in the aggregate. That would depend upon the extent of business done; that is, the number of vessels and amount of freight which may pass through the locks. Some disposition of the surplus is necessary until its use shall be required, and it may as well be placed in the state treasury, and probably better, than anywhere else." And in the case of Transportation Co. v. Parkersburg, we said: "It is also obvious that since a wharf is property, and wharfage is a charge or rent for its temporary use, the question whether the owner derives more or less revenue from it, or whether more or less than the cost of building and maintaining it, or what disposition he makes of such revenue, can in no way concern those who make use of the wharf and are required to pay the regular charges therefor; provided, always, that the charges are reasonable and not exorbitant."

In the present case, however, as already indicated, the appropriation actually made of the receipts, namely, to the objects of keeping the wharves in repair, of gradually extending them as additions may be needed, and of maintaining a police for their protection, and lights for their better enjoyment, is entirely germane to the purpose of wharfage facilities. It is what any prudent proprietor would do; it is what the City itself would do if it managed the wharves on its own account. But even if it were otherwise; if a profit should happen to be realized by the City, or the lessees, beyond the amount of expenditures made, this would not make the charges any the less wharfage. And being wharfage, and nothing else, if the charges are unreasonable, remedy must be sought by invoking the laws of the State, which cannot be done in this suit, inasmuch as the jurisdiction of the court is rested on the supposed unconstitutionality of the charges for wharfage, and not on the citizenship of the parties. If the state laws furnish no remedy (in other [450] words, if the charges are sanctioned by them), then, as before stated, it is for Congress, and not the United States Courts, to regulate the matter, and provide a proper remedy. Such an interposition may become necessary; for although the imposition of unreasonable wharfage by a City or a State is always the dictate of a suicidal policy, the temptation of immediate advantage under stringent pressure will often lead to its adoption.

What measures Congress might adopt for the purpose of preventing abuses in this and like matters, it is not for us to determine. It is possible that a law declaring that wharfage shall be reasonable, and not oppressive, would answer the purpose. It would then be in the power of the federal courts to inquire and determine as to the reasonableness of the charges actually imposed. That no such inquiry, except in the administration of the state law, can be instituted, as the law now stands, is shown in some of the cases to which we have referred. In Transportation Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S.

691, 699 [27:584, 587], we said: "It is an undoubted rule of universal application, that wharfage for the use of all public wharves must be reasonable. But then the question arises, By what law is this rule established, and by what law can it be enforced? By what law is it to be decided whether the charges imposed are, or are not, exorbitant? There can be but one answer to these questions: Clearly it must be by the local municipal law, at least until some superior or paramount law has been prescribed. * * * The courts of the United States do not enforce the common law in municipal matters in the State because it is federal law, but because it is the law of the State."

As the only question determinable in this suit is whether the charges of wharfage complained of were, or were not, contrary to the Constitution or any law of the United States, and as it is clear that they were not, the decree of the Circuit Court must be affirmed.

THE BARQUE JOHN H. PEARSON,
HIRAM TAYLOR, Claimant.

(See S. C. "The John H. Pearson," Reporter's ed. 469–474.)

Admiralty—charter-party—"northern passage" for the benefit of the cargo—meaning should be determined by trial court.

Upon a libel filed by the charterers of a barque, chartered to carry a cargo of fruit from Palermo to Boston by the "northern passage" for the benefit of the cargo, it is held: that the meaning of the words "northern passage" is either a question of fact or of construction applicable to understood facts, and that the court below should have ascertained from the evidence what passages there were between Gibraltar and Boston which vessels were accustomed to take, and then determined which of them the vessel was allowed by the contract to take as the "northern."

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. Reversed, Remanded.

Reported below, 14 Fed. Rep. 749.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. H. W. Putnam, for appellants.

Mr. Frederick Dodge, for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal in admiralty, and presents the following facts:

The Barque John H. Pearson was chartered to carry a cargo, consisting mostly of oranges, for the libelants, from Palermo, Sicily, to Boston, Massachusetts. The charter-party contained the words "captain engages himself to take the northern passage," inserted at the instance of the libelants, for the benefit of the cargo, and written into the printed blank. The cargo was badly damaged on the voyage, and this suit was brought to recover for the loss. The controversy is as to whether the vessel, in going from Gibraltar to Boston, took "the northern passage."

The court has found that "Shippers of fruit consider it of very great importance for the preservation of the cargo that it be kept in as cold a temperature as possible, short of the freezing point, and have been accustomed for many years to instruct masters to take a northerly course;" and, after setting forth other [470] facts, stated as "conclusions of law" the following:

"1. The term 'northern passage' appears, in view of the testimony of merchants and seamen introduced on both sides, to be a term of art, and is, when taken by itself, without the aid of such testimony, unintelligible.

"The testimony introduced by the libelants tended to show that the phrase meant a passage from Gibraltar to the Great Banks, and thence direct to Boston, keeping as much to the north as possible during the entire passage; that anything between that and the southern passage was the middle passage.

"That introduced by the claimant tended to show that it meant anything north of latitudes 30° to 35° or 36°, or of the southern passage; and that the middle passage was anything between the southern passage and the northern as described by the respective witnesses.

"It was admitted that the southern passage was in the trade winds.

"2. Upon this testimony, the court, thinking that the true meaning of the term is very doubtful, does not consider it material, and does not undertake to decide whether a preponderance of the evidence favors one of the above definitions or another, and rules that the claimant is entitled to the least strict definition, and that, as the course of the barque comes within such definition, there is no deviation."

The libel was dismissed, and from a decree to that effect this appeal was taken. The opinion of the circuit court is reported in 14 Fed. Rep. 749.

As the libelants deemed the agreement to "take the northern passage" of sufficient importance to have a printed form changed, so that it might be incorporated in express words into the charter-party, and this "for the benefit of the cargo," which was perishable, it is evident that the words used had some meaning which indicated clearly to the minds of the contracting parties the direction the vessel was to take on her way from Gibraltar to Boston. It is also evident, from the fact that the vessel was bound to take the northern passage, that the parties understood there was more than one passage which vessels were in the habit of taking in making that voyage, according as their bills of lading or their charter-parties required, or the circumstances made desirable. It implies that there were one or more other passages which those engaged in the trade knew by other names or other descriptions. What "the [473] northern passage" as used in this contract means, therefore, is either a question of fact or a question of construction applicable to understood facts.

If it is, as the court below says it appears to be, a term of art, which, taken by itself, without the aid of the testimony, is unintelligible, then its meaning in "the art"—the trade—is one of the material facts in the case on which the rights of the parties depend; and it should have been found and put into the findings of fact which the circuit court was required by law to make. The statement of the court, now in the record, implies that there is in fact some particular passage between Gibraltar and Boston which those engaged in that trade know as "the northern passage." If there is, then that is the passage the vessel was bound to take, and it was error in the court to decide that its determination, according to the preponderance of the evidence, was immaterial, for the choice of passages was matter of obligation, not of convenience merely.

If in point of fact there is no passage to which the name or description of "the northern" has been given in the trade, then the question becomes one of construction as applied to the known facts of the business. The inquiry is not as to which passage would be the quickest, or even the best, or which another contract would require of another vessel, but which is "the northern passage" within the meaning of this contract. The evident purpose of the libelants was to keep the vessel as far as possible in the coolest of the passages that those engaged in the trade were accustomed to take, because it is found as a fact in the case that a cool temperature is necessary to the preservation of the cargo; and that the coolest water is north of the Gulf Stream, owing to the fact that there is a cold current between it and the American coast, moving in an opposite direction.

Under these circumstances, if the testimony failed to show that any particular passage had acquired in the trade the name of "the northern," it was error to rule that the vessel might voluntarily take any other of the known or accustomed passages than one which would carry it in a northerly direction through the coolest waters and into the coolest temperature. That [474] this was the expectation of the parties is shown by the fact that the stipulation as to the passage was made "for the benefit of the cargo," the preservation of which required that it should be kept "in as cold a temperature as possible, short of the freezing point." The court should have ascertained from the evidence what passages there were between Gibraltar and Boston which vessels were accustomed to take, and then determined which of them this vessel was allowed by its contract to choose as "the northern."

The decree is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Landlord and tenant—abandonment by lessee—reletting—deficiency of rent—fraud—former adjudication—estoppel—practice.

1. A judgment against the lessor in an action on a lease to recover rent, the only issue being "that of fraud in procuring the lease," bars a subsequent action on the same lease.

2. The effect of a former judgment is not dependent upon the correctness of the verdict or finding upon which it was rendered.

3. The fact that a former judgment has been vacated since the trial of the action to which it was a bar is not available in this court to obviate an erroneous ruling at the trial.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Reversed, Remanded.

The case and the facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward C. Perkins and John C. Gray, for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff in error established a complete defense to the action in the circuit court, by proving that he had recovered judgment in the marine court on an issue as to the validity of the lease.

Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 351 (24: 195); Lumber Co. v. Buchtel, 101 U. S. 638 (25: 1074); Beloit v. Morgan, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 621 (19: 205); Gardner v. Buckbee, 3 Cow. 120; Bouchaud v. Diaz, 3 Den. 243.

The rule has been repeatedly applied where the question determined in the former suit, and sought to be raised again in the new suit, was purely a question of law.

Tioga R. R. Co. v. Blossburg & C. R. R. Co. 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 137 (22: 331); Pray v. Hegeman, 98 N. Y. 351; Lorillard v. Clyde, 99 N. Y. 196; Collier v. Walters, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 252.

Messrs. Joseph A. Shoudy and Henry T. Wing, for defendant in error:

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 29th of October, 1873, Ann Maria Deen, the plaintiff in the court below, leased to one Mary C. C. Perry, of New York, by an instrument under seal, the house known as No. 4 East Thirtieth Street of that city, with the furniture therein, for the term of two years and ten months from the first day of November, 1873, at the rent of $450 a month, payable in advance, with a clause of re-entry in case of default in the payment of the rent, or in any of the covenants of the lease.

At the same time, and upon the same paper, the defendant, William M. Wilson, of New York, in consideration of the letting of the premises to the lessee, and of the sum of one dollar paid to him by the lessor, by an instrument under seal, covenanted and agreed with her that if default should be made at any time by the lessee in the payment of the rent, and performance of the covenants contained in the lease, he would pay the rent, or any arrears thereof, and all damages arising from the nonperformance of the covenants.

No rent was paid by the lessee except for the first month, and soon after December 1873, she ceased to occupy the house, and abandoned it. In March, 1874, the lessor gave notice to her that, as she had abandoned the house, and there [526] was danger of the furniture being injured, possession would be taken and the premises rented for the remainder of the term; and that the lessor would look to her for any deficiency in the rent and for the expenses of reletting, as well as for all damages that might be sustained by reason of the loss of or injury to the furniture.

In April, 1874, the lessor took possession of the premises, and in November following leased the house, without the furniture, to one Sherman, for two years and five months from December 1, 1874, at $3,600 a year, payable in half-yearly payments, in advance.

For the deficiency of the rent on the original lease, after deducting the amount collected from the new tenant, the present action was brought against the defendant as guarantor for the rent.

To the complaint setting forth the lease, the covenant of guaranty, the new lease, and the deficiency claimed to be due upon the lease, the defendant answered, denying, among other things, the allegations of abandonment of the premises by the lessee, of notice to her of the intention of the lessor to resume possession, and of the amount due; and for a separate defense alleged that in December, 1873, the plaintiff brought an action in the Marine Court of the City of New York against the defendant for the rent of the same premises for that month, and that the defendant recovered judgment therein against the plaintiff in the action, upon the merits thereof, and for costs.

On the trial, to meet the case established by the plaintiff, the defendant, among other things, gave in evidence the judgment book of the marine court, showing a judgment, entered on the 12th of March, 1874, in favor of the defendant William M. Wilson, against the plaintiff Ann Maria Deen, for $55.91 costs; and also the judgment roll in the action containing the summons and complaint, the answer, minutes of the verdict for the defendant, and the judgment in his favor. The complaint was upon the same lease as that upon which this action is brought, and was for rent for the month beginning on the first day of December, 1873. The answer, treating the lease and the covenant upon it as one instrument, set up that "On [527] or about the 29th day of October, 1873, the plaintiff, by false and fraudulent statements, obtained the signature of Mary C. C. Perry and of this defendant to a paper purporting to be a lease of the premises described in the complaint; that the said Mary C. C. Perry and this defendant were both misled by the false representations; and that the said Mary C. C. Perry and this defendant were induced by their belief in the truth of such representations to sign the said paper." It was admitted of record by counsel for the plaintiff that "the only issue tried" in that action in the marine court "was that of fraud in procuring the lease," and that there was no issue as to the payment of the rent or as to the delivery of the lease.

When the evidence was closed and the parties had rested, the defendant moved that the complaint be dismissed, on the ground that the judgment in the marine court was a bar to the action; but the court denied the motion, and the defendant excepted. Afterwards the court directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff for $12,026.89, the full amount claimed, less the rent for the month of December, 1873, which they accordingly did. To this direction an exception was taken.

The conclusion we have reached as to the ef-
[532] fect of the judgment of the marine court renders it unnecessary to pass upon, or even to state the other questions raised in the progress of the trial. There is nothing in the record tending to impair the force of that judgment. Notice of appeal from it to the General Term of the court was given, but it does not appear that the appeal was ever prosecuted. The alleged parol stipulation by counsel, that the judgment might be vacated, is not admitted; but, if made, it is not shown to have been acted upon by any entry on the records of the marine court. The proceedings in the suit in the supreme court to cancel the lease and the ruling of the court of appeals therein, that evidence of cotemporaneous or preceding oral stipulations could not be received to control the lease, have no bearing upon the question before us, and the proceedings in the suit are still pending. As the case stands before us, the judgment of the marine court is in no respect impaired, and the defendant can invoke in his behalf whatever it concluded between the parties. The validity of the lease in suit here was involved there. The answer there alleged that, by false and fraudulent representations, the signature of the lessee was obtained to the lease, and that both she and the defendant Wilson were misled by those representations to sign the paper. The parties admitted that the only issue in that action was "that of fraud in procuring the lease." That issue being found by the verdict of the jury in favor of the defendant, the judgment thereon stands as an adjudication between the parties by a court of competent jurisdiction, that the lease was obtained upon false and fraudulent representations of the plaintiff, and, therefore, was of no obligatory force. It determined not merely for that case, but for all cases between the same parties, not only that there was nothing due for the rent claimed for the month of December, 1873, but that the lease itself was procured by fraud, and therefore void.

In Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 351 [24: 195], we considered at much length the operation of a judgment as a bar against the prosecution of a second action upon the same demand, and as an estoppel upon the question litigated and determined in another action be- [533] tween the same parties upon a different demand, and we held, following in this respect a long series of decisions, that in the former case the judgment, if rendered upon the merits, is an absolute bar to a subsequent action, a finality to the demand in controversy, concluding parties and those in privity with them; and that in the latter case, that is, where the second action between the same parties is upon a different demand, the judgment in the first action operates as an estoppel as to those matters in issue, or points controverted, upon the determination of which the finding or verdict was rendered. Of the application of this rule Gardner v. *Buckbee, 3 Cow. 120, furnishes an illustration. There it appeared that two notes had been given upon the sale of a vessel. On examination the vessel proved to be unseaworthy, and the maker of the notes refused to pay them on the ground of fraudulent representations by the vendor. Thereupon an action was brought by the holder upon one of the notes in the Marine Court of the City of New York. The defendant pleaded the general issue, with notice of a total failure of consideration for the notes, on the ground of fraud in the sale of the vessel, and upon that point judgment was rendered in his favor. The holder thereupon brought an action upon the other note in the Court of Common Pleas of the City of New York, and at the trial the defendant offered in evidence in bar of the action the record of the judgment in the marine court, the defense being fraud in the sale of the vessel, and the judgment having been rendered directly upon that issue between the same parties. The court of common pleas decided that the judgment was not a bar, but the Supreme Court of the State reversed the decision, declaring the law to be well settled that a judgment of a court of concurrent jurisdiction directly upon the point is, as a plea or evidence, conclusive between the same parties upon the same matter directly in question in another court, referring to and following the rule laid down by Chief Justice De Grey in the celebrated case of the Duchess of Kingston. It was urged that [534] the judgment in the marine court did not affirm any particular fact in issue in the common pleas, but was general and indefinite, and that, from the language of the record, it could not be inferred whether the two cases were founded upon the same or a different state of facts; but the court answered that it was true the record merely showed the pleadings and that judgment was rendered for the defendant, but it showed that it was competent on the trial to establish the fraud of the plaintiff; and whether fraud was the point upon which the decision was founded could be proved by extrinsic evidence; and that the admission of such evidence was not inconsistent with the record and did not impugn its verity.

This decision has been frequently cited with approval by this court and the courts of every State. It is everywhere recognized as correctly applying the law as settled in the Duchess of Kingston's Case. It is not possible to distinguish it from the one before us. Fraud in procuring the lease, upon which this action is brought, was the point in issue in the action in the marine court between the same parties, and it having been found by the verdict of the jury against the plaintiff, and judgment having been rendered upon that finding, the fact thus established must necessarily defeat any subsequent action upon the same instrument between those parties. The effect of the judgment is not at all dependent upon the correctness of the verdict or finding upon which it was rendered. It not being set aside by subsequent proceedings, by appeal or otherwise, it was equally effective as an estoppel upon the point decided, whether the decision was right or wrong. Packet Co. v. Sickles, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 580 [18: 550]; Lumber Co. v. Buchtel, 101 U. S. 638 [25: 1074]; Tioga R. R. Co. v. Blossburg & C. R. R. Co. 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 137 [22: 331]; Pray v. Hegeman, 98 N. Y. 351; Merriam v. Whittemore, 5 Gray, 316.

It is stated in the brief of counsel, and it was repeated on the argument, that the judgment of the marine court has been vacated by the Supreme Court of the State since this case was tried, in an action brought for that purpose. If such be the fact, it cannot be made available in this court to obviate an erroneous ruling at the trial.

During the pendency of the case in this court the defendant below, plaintiff in error here, has died, and the executor of his estate has been substituted as a party in his place.

Judgment of the court below reversed, and cause remanded with direction to award a new trial.

ALBANY AND RENSSELAER IRON AND STEEL COMPANY, Plf. in Err., v. GUSTAF LUNDBERG. [451]

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 451–457.)

Sales—breach of contract—irrelevant evidence—hearsay—parties, under New York Code.

1. Under the New York Code of Civil Procedure one who enters into a contract in his own name, but describes himself as agent of a third party, may maintain an action thereon in his own name.

2. In an action to recover damages for the refusal of the defendant to accept Swedish pig iron, tendered by the plaintiff under a contract for its sale, the main question of fact contested being whether the iron tendered fulfilled the plaintiff's warranty that it should not contain more than a certain proportion of phosphorus, it is held, that certain depositions taken in Sweden are inadmissible, because they contain evidence of the proportion of phosphorus contained in the other iron from the same furnace in previous years without showing identity in quality, and because some of the evidence therein contained is hearsay.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Reversed, Remanded.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Edwin Countryman and Amasa J. Parker, for plaintiff in error:

An agent who discloses the name and residence of his principal is not liable personally on a contract for the payment of money or the sale or purchase of movable property. The principal is the proper person to bring an action on the contract against the opposite party.

Whitney v. Wyman, 101 U. S. 392 (25:1050); Hitchcock v. Buchanan, 105 U. S. 416 (26:1078); Metcalf v. Williams, 104 U. S. 93 (26:665); Post v. Pearson, 108 U. S. 418 (27:774); Mechanics Bank v. Bank of Columbia, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 326 (5:100); Baldwin v. Bank of Newbury, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 234 (17:534); Oelricks v. Ford, 64 U. S. 23 How. 49 (16: 534).

It has always been held in New York that a mere agent, not having any beneficial interest in a contract, cannot maintain an action upon it in his own name. Before he can do so he must prove that he has made advances upon the goods sold or has guaranteed the sale to his principal.

Gunn v. Cantine, 10 Johns. 387; Bayley v. Onondaga Co. Ins. Co. 6 Hill, 476; White v. Choteau, 10 Barb. 202; Green v. Clarke, 12 N. Y. 343; Price v. Powell, 3 N. Y. 322; Thompson v. Fargo, 49 N. Y. 188.

Mr. Everett P. Wheeler, for defendant in error:

The action was properly brought in the name of Gustaf Lundberg.

Whitney v. Wyman, 101 U. S. 392 (25: 1050);

Mechanics Bank v. Bank of Columbia, 18 U.S. 5 Wheat. 326 (5:100); Story, Agency, § 160 a.

The English cases unquestionably hold that this suit is properly brought, because it is nowhere stated in the body of the contract that it is executed on behalf of the Swedish principals.

Parker v. Winlow, 7 Ell. & Bl. 942; Paice v. Walker, L. R. 5 Exch. 173. See also DeWitt v. Walton, 9 N. Y. 571; Moss v. Livingston, 4 N. Y. 208.

It would be unreasonable that a merchant who has the right to sell iron, and to receive and give acquittance for its price, should not have the right to sue for the price if it is not paid. The common-law cases on this subject are collected in Considerant v. Brisbane, 23 N. Y. 389.

A person with whom a contract of this description is made is a trustee of an express trust within the definition of the Code.

Considerant v. Brisbane, supra; Cummins v. Barkalow, 1 Abb. Ct. App. Dec. 479; Rowland v. Phalen, 1 Bosw. 43.

Substantial conformity with the warranty is all that is necessary.

Towerson v. Aspatria Agricultural Soc. 27 Law T. Rep. N. S. 276; Schnitzer v. Oriental Print Works, 114 Mass. 123; Pope v. Filley, 9 Fed. Rep. 65, 71; Hargous v. Stone, 5 N. Y. 73, 94; Waring v. Mason, 18 Wend. 425, 436.

Many cases can be cited which require exact compliance with the terms of a contract. But on examination all these will be found to apply only to those terms which are susceptible of exact determination. ' No such rule has ever been applied to cases like the present, where the proof on both sides is that the precise percentage of phosphorus is not determinable with greater accuracy than the one ten-thousandth part. In other words, the agreement is that the iron shall be of the quality naturally to be expected from the given analysis; but it does not import a warranty that no variation from this analysis would be disclosed by other analyses; still less that samples from each pig would yield precisely the same result as the analysis mentioned in the contract.

Woodruff v. Hough, 91 U. S. 596 (23:382); Nolan v. Whitney, 88 N. Y. 648; Chambers v. Jaynes, 4 Pa. 39; Propr. S. Cong. Meeting House v. Hilton, 11 Gray, 407; Lathrop v. Otis, 7 Allen, 435; Hovey v. Pitcher, 13 Mo. 191.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by Gustaf Lundberg, an alien and a subject of the Kingdom of Sweden and Norway, residing at Boston in the State of Massachusetts, against the Albany and Rensselaer Iron and Steel Company, a corporation of the State of New York, upon two contracts for the sale and purchase of Swedish pig iron, the first of which was as follows:

[452] "N. M. HÖGLUND'S SONS & CO., STOCKHOLM;

"GUSTAF LUNDBERG, SUCCESSOR TO NILS MITANDER:

"38 Kilby Street, Boston, February 10, 1880.

'I, Gustaf Lundberg, agent for N. M. Höglund's Sons & Co. of Stockholm, agree to sell, and we, Albany and Rensselaer Iron and Steel Co., Troy, N. Y., agree to buy, the following Swedish charcoal grey pig iron, viz: 500 tons of brand NBGPH, at a price of forty-eight ($48) dollars, American gold, per ton of 2240 lbs., delivered on wharf at New York, duty paid; said iron to be in accordance with an analysis furnished in Gustaf Lundberg's letter of 6th February. Payment in gold in Boston or New York funds within 30 days from date of ship's entry at custom house. Shipment from Sweden during the season, say May next, or sooner, if possible. The above quantity hereby contracted for to be subject to such reduction as may be necessitated by natural obstacles and unavoidable accidents. The seller not accountable for accidents or delays at sea. Signed in duplicate.

"Accepted, GUSTAF LUNDBERG.
Accepted, ALBANY & RENSSELAER IRON & STEEL CO."

The other contract differed only in being for the sale and purchase of "300 tons of brands SBVE and NBBBK."

The analysis referred to in both contracts showed, in the first brand .08, and in the two other brands .024, of one per cent of phosphorus.

The above amount of iron was made in Sweden, that of the first brand at the Pershytte furnace of the Ramshyttan Iron Works, out of ore from the Pershytte mines, and that of the two other brands at the Svana Iron Works, was bought and shipped from Stockholm by N. M. Höglund's Sons & Co. in May, 1880, arrived at New York, in June, 1880, and was thence taken to the defendant's works at Troy. An analysis there made by the defendant's chemist showed in the three brands respectively .047, .042 and .049, of one per cent of phosphorus. The defendant therefore refused to take the iron, and returned it to the plaintiff, who afterwards sold it for less than the contract price, brought this action to recover the difference, and obtained a verdict and judgment for upwards of $15,000. The defendant [453] sued out this writ of error.

The first question presented by the bill of exceptions is whether this action can be maintained in the name of Lundberg, or should have been brought in the name of his principals, N. M. Höglund's Sons & Co.

The paper upon which each of the contracts in suit is written has at its head, besides the name of that firm, the name of "Gustaf Lundberg, successor to Nils Mitander," followed by the street and number of his office in Boston. The contract itself begins with a promise by him in the first person singular, "I, Gustaf Lundberg, agent for N. M. Höglund's Sons & Co. of Stockholm, agree to sell;" the description added to his name in this clause is the only mention of or reference to that firm in the contract; his promise is not expressed to be made by him as their agent, or in their behalf; and the agreement is signed by him with his own name merely.

There are strong authorities for holding that a contract in such form as this is the personal contract of the agent, upon which he may sue as well as be sued in his own name, at common law. Kennedy v. Gouveia, 3 Dowl. & R. 503; Parker v. Winlow, 7 Ell. & Bl. 942; Dutton

v. Marsh, L. R. 6 Q. B. 361; Buffum v. Chadwick, 8 Mass. 103; Packard v. Nye, 2 Metc. 47. In Gadd v. Houghton, 1 Exch. D. 357, the contract which was held not to bind the agent personally was expressed to be made "on account of" the principals; and in Oelricks v. Ford, 64 U. S. 23 How. 49 [16: 534], in which the contract which was held to bind the principal more nearly resembled that before us than in any other case in this court, the important element of a signature of the agent's name, without addition, was wanting.

But it is unnecessary to express a definitive opinion upon the question in whose name, independently of any statute regulating the subject, this action should have been brought.

The Code of Civil Procedure of the State of New York contains the following provision:

"Sec. 449. Every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except that an executor or administrator, a trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. A person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another, is a trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of this section."

Under this provision, the court of appeals of that State has held that an agent of a corporation, to whom, "as executive agent of the company," a promise is made to pay money, is "a person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another," and may therefore sue in his own name on the promise. Considerant v. Brisbane, 22 N. Y. 389. The rule thus established is applicable to actions at law in the courts of the United States held within the State of New York. Rev. Stat. § 914; Sawin v. Kenny, 93 U. S. 289 [23: 926]; Weed Sewing Machine Co. v. Wicks, 8 Dill. 261; U. S. v. Tracy, 8 Ben. 1.

The case then stands thus: If the agreement to sell is an agreement made by Lundberg personally, and not in his capacity of agent of the Swedish firm, the price is likewise payable to him personally, and the action on the contract must be brought in his name, even at common law. If, on the other hand, the agreement must be considered as made by Lundberg, not in his individual capacity, but only as agent and in behalf of the Swedish firm, and for their benefit, then the price is payable to him as their agent and for their benefit, in the same sense in which an express promise to pay money to him as the agent of that firm would be a promise to pay him for their benefit, and therefore, by the law of New York, which governs this case, an action may be brought in his name. In either view this action is rightly brought.

The clause, in each of the contracts sued on, "said iron to be in accordance with an analysis furnished in Gustaf Lundberg's letter of 6th February," is doubtless a warranty that the iron shall not contain a greater proportion of phosphorus than is specified in that analysis. The question of fact most contested at the trial was whether the iron tendered by the plaintiff to the defendant fulfilled this warranty.

There was evidence tending to show that any excess of phosphorus in pig iron would affect the quality of wrought iron or steel made from it, rendering it more brittle, and could be detected by bending the rods after they had been made; and the court, at the request of the defendant, and with the consent of the plaintiff, instructed the jury as follows: "If the jury find either lot of iron differed as much as one one-hundredth of one per cent in excess of the limit of phosphorus stated in the analysis referred to in the contract, that constituted a breach of the warranty and entitled the defendant to refuse to receive the iron."

Each party called as witnesses many experts, who had made analyses of the iron in question since its arrival, some of whom testified that the amount of phosphorus in each brand was no greater than in the analysis referred to, and others testified that it was more than two hundredths of one per cent greater, or nearly twice as much.

The plaintiff also introduced several depositions taken in Sweden, so much of which as is material to be stated was as follows:

O. Anderson, the manager and a part owner of the Ramshyttan Iron Works for the last seventeen years, testified that his experience was in the practical part only of the iron manufacture; that he knew the quality, and the percentage of phosphorus, of the iron sold to N. M. Höglund's Sons & Co. in 1880, only from an analysis made by Bernhard Fernguist of pig iron from the same furnace in 1878; that no special analysis was made of the iron sold to the Höglunds, and "no new analysis was made, because no change in the ore was observed;" that other iron was made in the same furnace in 1880, "but all of exactly the same quality;" and further testified: "In the process of manufacture no special tests were made on this pig iron, but I know that this iron is used in the manufacture of Siemens & Martin's steel and iron, and there found to be good."

Fernguist, a professor of chemistry at Orebro, who had made analyses of irons and ores for twenty years, testified to the analysis made by him of pig iron from the Pershytte furnace in 1878, which showed it to contain .028 of one per cent of phosphorus.

Harold Dillner, "an officer in the metallurgic department in the Board of Iron Masters," who in 1880 and for some years before had assisted the owners and manager of the Ramshyttan Iron Works "as technical assistant at Pershytte furnace," being asked his means of knowledge in regard to the percentage of phosphorus in the parcels of iron sold to the Höglunds, and whether he knew of these parcels, or any of them, having been put to any practical test, testified: "We have trustworthy analyses of the ores from Pershytte mines and of pig iron from Pershytte furnace, which verify the always excellent quality of the ore and the pig iron manufactured of it." "It is generally known that the iron is of excellent quality, and I made no special tests."

A. E. Cassel, manager of the Svana Iron Works in 1879 and 1880, having testified, as to the iron from those works sold to the Höglunds in 1880, that the inspection of its manufacture at the furnaces was conducted "in the same manner as during the preceding years, with the greatest care and attention," and that his means of knowledge as to the percentage of phosphorus in this iron were derived from previous analyses of iron that they manufactured, further testified: "In the pig iron we made, the percentage of phosphorus is about .022 per cent, and of sulphur, 0.23; and I think that the pig iron in question contained about these quantities." "Complete journal is kept of how much of each kind of ore is used for each day. The quality of the ores has not changed materially during the last five years."

The admission of this testimony in the depositions was duly excepted to, and we are of opinion that it was incompetent. Much of it, and especially Anderson's remark that this iron was found to be good in the manufacture of steel and iron by Siemens & Martin, was mere hearsay. All the statements of the deponents as to the proportion of phosphorus in the iron in question were based on analyses by other persons of pig iron made in previous years, none of which were produced, or their contents proved, with the single exception of Fernguist's analysis of iron from the Pershytte furnace two years before. It is not shown, and [457] cannot be presumed, that a difference of one or two hundredths of one per cent in the amount of phosphorus in pig iron could be detected by observation of the ore, or by inspection of the manufacture of the pig iron. Under these circumstances, evidence of the amount of phosphorus in iron made in previous years was wholly irrelevant to the question of the amount of phosphorus in iron made in 1880; and the general expressions of opinion as to the excellence of the pig iron and the care taken in its manufacture did not render that evidence competent, but rather tended to divert the attention of the jury from the real issue, which was whether the particular iron tendered by the plaintiff to the defendant conformed to the express warranty in the contract between them.

The case differs from that of Ames v. Quimby, 106 U. S. 342 [27: 100], where, in an action to recover the price of shovel handles sold to the defendant, evidence of the good quality of other like handles sold by the plaintiff at the same time was admitted, accompanied by direct evidence that the latter were of the same kind and quality as the former.

This testimony being irrelevant and incompetent, and manifestly tending to prejudice the defendants with the jury, its admission requires the verdict to be set aside; and it becomes unnecessary to consider the rulings upon other evidence and upon the question of damages.

Judgment reversed, and case remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to set aside the verdict and to order a new trial.

[457] CHARLES W. BOYNTON, Plff. in Err.,

v.

FLOWDEN H. BALL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 457-468.)

Bankruptcy—discharge after entry of judgment in state court—stay of execution.

1. A bankrupt who was discharged after judgment was obtained against him in a state court, in an action pending at the time he instituted the bankruptcy proceedings, is entitled to a perpetual stay of execution on such judgment.

2. Upon petition for a perpetual stay of execution, it is held: that the debt under which judgment was rendered is the same debt that it was before; that it was provable in bankruptcy, and that the bankrupt might waive his right under section 5106, R. S., to have the action against him stayed pending the bankruptcy proceedings.

[No. 187.]

Argued April 4, 5, 1887. Decided April 25, 1887.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois. Reported below, 105 Ill. 627. Reversed, Remanded.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Leonard Swett and Edward R. Swett, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. A. Crain, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois. The question of federal law, which gives jurisdiction to this court to review the judgment of the state court, arises [463] out of the refusal of that court to give effect to a certificate of discharge in bankruptcy to Boynton, the plaintiff in error.

Ball, the defendant in error, brought suit against Boynton in the Circuit Court of the State of Illinois for Stephenson County, on April 16, 1877. To this Boynton filed his answer April 4, 1878, and judgment was rendered against him on December 9, 1879, for $6,223.99 debt and $5,284.99 damages and costs. Pend this suit in the state court Boynton, on his own application, was declared a bankrupt April 15, 1878, and received his discharge from all his debts December 23, 1880. An execution on the judgment against Boynton in the state court was issued February 21, 1880, and returned unsatisfied. On March 25, 1881, Boynton filed a petition in the state court asking for a perpetual stay of execution on the judgment rendered in favor of Ball, and filed a certified copy of his discharge in bankruptcy, together with certain affidavits. Ball was served with notice of this motion and appeared and made defense. The motion was overruled by the circuit court, from which ruling Boynton appealed to the Supreme Court of the State, which court affirmed the judgment of the court below with costs. 105 Ill. 627.

The question presented for us to consider is whether the discharge in bankruptcy was, under the circumstances of this case, a discharge from the judgment rendered in the Circuit Court of Stephenson County while the proceedings in bankruptcy were pending. It will be perceived that the suit in the state court was commenced before the proceedings in bankruptcy in which the discharge was finally granted. It will also be perceived that the case lingered in the state court from April 16, 1877, until December 9, 1879, when the final judgment was rendered, a period of over two years, but that the plaintiff in error did not obtain his final discharge in bankruptcy until December 23, 1880, which was more than a year after the judgment was obtained against him in the state court.

In Dimock v. Revere Copper Co. 117 U. S. 559 [29:994], decided at the last term of this court, [464] a case very similar to this was presented to us for our consideration. Dimock, being sued in the state court of Massachusetts, made defense, and pending the action was discharged from all his debts under bankruptcy proceedings, receiving his certificate of discharge as a bankrupt a few days before final judgment against him in the state court. Notwithstanding he had this discharge at the time the judgment was rendered against him in the state court, he did not plead it in bar of that action nor bring it in any manner to the attention of the court. He was afterwards sued upon this judgment in the Supreme Court of the State of New York, and there pleaded his discharge in bankruptcy in bar of the action. That court, however, held the certificate of discharge not to be a bar, and rendered judgment against him. This judgment was reversed in the Supreme Court in General Term, and that judgment was in turn reversed by the court of appeals, which restored the judgment of the court in special term. This court, in reviewing that judgment, said that the Superior Court of Massachusetts, in which the first suit was brought, had jurisdiction of the case, which was rendered complete by the service of process and the appearance of the defendant; that nothing that was done in the bankruptcy court had ousted the jurisdiction of that court, which, accordingly, proceeded in due order to judgment; that this judgment having been rendered after the certificate of discharge in bankruptcy, which had not been called to the attention of the court in any manner, nor any stay of proceedings in the state court asked on account of the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings, the question before the Massachusetts Court for decision at the time it rendered judgment was whether Dimock was then indebted to the Revere Copper Company; and we held that it had jurisdiction and rightfully rendered judgment on this question in favor of that company, notwithstanding the proceedings in the bankruptcy court of which it could not take judicial notice. This decision was supported by references to cases heretofore decided involving similar questions in this court and in the courts of the States.

The principle on which the case was decided was that, while the discharge in bankruptcy would have been a valid defense to the suit if [465] pleaded at or before the time judgment was rendered in the Massachusetts Court, it had in that respect no more sanctity or effect in relieving Dimock of his debt to the company than a payment, or a receipt, or a release, of which he was bound to avail himself by plea or suggestion of some kind as a defense to the action in proper time; that, showing no good reason why he should not have presented that discharge and permitting the judgment to go against him in the Massachusetts Court, without an attempt to avail himself of it there, the judgment of that court was conclusive on the question of his indebtedness at that time to the copper company. That case, so parallel in its circumstances to the one now before us, would be conclusive of the latter if Boynton had had his certificate of discharge, or if the order for it had been made by the bankruptcy court before the judgment in the state court. But as we have already seen, the judgment in the state court was rendered more than a year before the the order of discharge in the bankruptcy court, and Boynton therefore had no opportunity to plead a discharge which had not then been granted, as a defense to that action.

Two propositions are advanced by counsel for defendant in error, in support of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Illinois, as reasons why the certificate obtained so long after the judgment in the state court should not have the effect of a discharge of the debt evidenced by that judgment. The first of these is that the original debt on which the action was brought in the Circuit Court of Stephenson County no longer exists, but that it was merged in the judgment of that court against Boynton, and was therefore not released under the Act of Congress, which declares that all debts provable against the estate of the bankrupt at the time bankruptcy proceedings were initiated shall be satisfied by the order of the court discharging the bankrupt. The argument is that the judgment now existing against Boynton is not the debt that existed at the time bankruptcy proceedings were initiated; that by the change of the character of the debt from an ordinary claim or obligation to a judgment of a court of record it ceased to be the same debt and became a new and different debt as of the date of [466] the judgment. Some authorities are cited for this general proposition of a change of the character of the debt by merger into the judgment, and some authorities are also cited by counsel for plaintiff in error to the contrary. See Judge Blatchford, Re Brown, 5 Ben. 1; Re Rosey, 6 Ben. 508.

But this court, to which this precise question is now presented for the first time, is clearly of opinion that the debt on which this judgment was rendered is the same debt that it was before; that, notwithstanding the change in its form from that of a simple contract debt, or unliquidated claim, or whatever its character may have been, by merger into a judgment of a court of record, it still remains the same debt on which the action was brought in the state court and the existence of which was provable in bankruptcy.

The next proposition is that under section 5106 of the Revised Statutes of the United States it was the duty of Boynton to make application to the state court, before judgment in that court, to have the proceedings there stayed, to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of his discharge. That section is in the following language:

"No creditor whose debt is provable shall be allowed to prosecute to final judgment any suit at law or in equity therefor against the bankrupt, until the question of the debtor's discharge shall have been determined; and any such suit or proceedings shall, upon the application of the bankrupt, be stayed to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of the discharge, provided there is no unreasonable delay on the part of the bankrupt in endeavoring to obtain his discharge; and provided, also, that if the amount due the creditor is in dispute, the suit, by leave of the court in bankruptcy, may proceed to judgment for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due, which amount may be proved in bankruptcy, but execution shall be stayed."

This cannot be construed to mean anything more than that where the bankruptcy proceedings are brought to the attention of the court in which a suit is being prosecuted against a bankrupt, that court shall not proceed to final [467] judgment until the question of his discharge shall have been determined. The state court could not know or take judicial notice of the proceedings in bankruptcy unless they were brought before it in some appropriate manner, and the provisions of this section show plainly that it does not thereupon lose jurisdiction of the case, but the proceedings may, upon the application of the bankrupt, be stayed to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of his discharge. Even the direction that it shall be stayed is coupled with a condition that "there is no unreasonable delay on the part of the bankrupt in endeavoring to obtain his discharge;" and with the further provision that "If the amount due the creditor is in dispute, the suit, by leave of the court in bankruptcy, may proceed to judgment for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due."

These provisions exclude altogether the idea that the state court has lost jurisdiction of the case, even when the bankrupt shall have made application showing the proceedings against him. The whole section is also clearly impressed with the idea that this is a provision primarily for the benefit of the bankrupt, that he may be enabled to avoid being harrassed in both courts at the same time with regard to such debt. It is therefore a right which he may waive. He may be willing that the suit shall proceed in the state court for many reasons; first, because he is not sure that he will ever obtain his discharge from the court in bankruptcy, in which case it would do him no good to delay the proceedings at his expense in the state court; in the second place, he may have a defense in the state court which he is quite willing to rely upon there, and to have the issue tried; in the third place, he may be very willing to have the amount in dispute liquidated in that proceeding, in which case it becomes a debt to be paid pro rata with his other debts by the assignee in bankruptcy.

If for any of these reasons, or for others, he permits the case to proceed to judgment in the state court, by failing to procure a stay of proceedings under the provisions of this section of the bankrupt law, or the assignee in bankrupt- [468] cy does not intervene as he may do, Hill v. Harding, 107 U. S. 631 [27: 493], he does not thereby forfeit his right to plead his final discharge in bankruptcy, if he shall obtain it, at any appropriate stage of the proceedings against him in the state court. And if, as in the present case, his final discharge is not obtained until after judgment has been rendered against him in the state court, he may produce that discharge to the state court and obtain the stay of execution which he asks for now. See McDougal v. Reid, 5 Ala. 810.

In Rogers v. Western Marine and Fire Ins. Co. 1 La. Ann. 161, the court, in a similar case, says: "The proposition that Rogers should have pleaded the pendency of the bankrupt proceedings in the original suit, and cannot disturb the execution of the judgment which is final, is untenable. The discharge in bankruptcy was posterior to the rendition of this judgment, and operated with the same force upon the debt after it assumed the form of a judgment as it would have done had the debt remained in its original form of a promissory note."

These and many other decisions under the Bankrupt Law of 1841 are to be found in the brief of the plaintiff in error. The same principle is decided in Cornell v. Dakin, 88 N. Y. 253, and in several cases in the District and Circuit Courts of the United States. There is a very able review of the subject by Judge Hillyer, of the United States District Court of Nevada, in the case of Stansfield, reported in 4 Sawy. C. C. 334.

The same thing was held by the Court of Appeals of New York, in Palmer v. Hussey, 87 New York, 310, which was affirmed in this court on writ of error in Palmer v. Hussey, 119 U. S. 96 [ante, 362].

It follows from these considerations that the Supreme Court of Illinois was in error in failing to give due effect to Boynton's discharge in bankruptcy, and its judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

v.
JOSEPH D. MITCHELL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 411-421.)

Parol trust—estoppel by lapse of time—evidence.

Upon a bill filed by a tenant for life, who holds as such from her father, under a lease or deed executed by him and herself and husband twenty-two years prior to the filing of the bill, and also under her father's will, the bill being filed ten years after his death, to enforce an express parol trust alleged to have been created by the father for her benefit thirty-five years before the filing of the bill, it is held: that the complainant is estopped by the lease and her action in acknowledging and placing it on record, and permitting it to remain unquestioned for twenty-two years, from setting up the parol trust alleged in the property, and that no ground is shown for setting aside the lease.

[No. 210.]

Argued April 11, 1887. Decided April 25, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Mississippi. Opinion below, published 14 Fed. Rep. 883. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Murray F. Smith and Alfred B. Pittman for appellant:

When there has been any fraud or misrepresentations used to induce one already in possession of land to accept a lease, the lessee is not estopped.

Smith, Land. & Ten. 295; Gleim v. Rise, 6 Watts, 45.

The distinction is between a case where a lessor was in possession, and a lessee obtained possession under him, and a case where the person in possession did not obtain it from him, who, under some false pretense, obtained the position of lessor. In the first case the lessee cannot object to the title of him who put him into possession; in the latter he will be permitted to prove the imposition. If he does prove it he is not bound to give up possession, nor is he liable for use and occupation.

Hall v. Benner, 1 Pen. & W. 402; S. C. 21 Am. Dec. 394.

"A lease doth properly signify a demise or letting of land unto another for a lesser time than he that doth let it hath in it."

Shep. Touch, 266; Plowd. 421-432.

Assuming the above authorities to be law, it would seem to be very clear that a man cannot make a valid lease to another who is in possession of land, when such lessor has no interest, title, possession or right of possession in the premises he lets.

The tenant, under a lease made by such lessor, should never be estopped from disputing his landlord's title. To a tenant so circumstanced, the doctrine of estoppel is totally inapplicable, etc.

Whart. Dig. 365, pl. 405; Morris' Lessee v. Vanderen, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 65 (1:38); Marshall v. Sheridan, 10 Serg. & R. 268; Hockenbury v. Snyder, 2 Watts & S. 240; Baskin v. Seechrist, 6 Pa. 163.

It matters not whether the deception practiced originates in voluntary falsehood or in simple mistake, for the immunity it confers springs not so much from the fraud of the usurper, as from the wrong which the deception would otherwise work on the rights of the lessee.

Miller v. M'Brier, 14 Serg & R. 382; Hamilton v. Marsden, 6 Binn. 45; Thayer v. United Brethren, 20 Pa. 60.

If the lessee was in possession at the time the lease was executed, he may resist recovery by proving that he accepted the lease by mistake.

Jackson v. Cuerden, 2 Johns. Cas. 353; Taylor, Land. & Ten. 546, §§ 705, 707.

Courts of equity, although there is no very great evidence of undue influence, will always look with a jealous eye upon donations from a child to a parent, and will set them aside if any advantage has been taken by means of the exercise of parental authority.

Cocking v. Pratt, 1 Ves. 401; Baker v. Bradley, 2 Smale & G. 531; 7 De Gex, M. & G. 597; Wright v. Vanderplank, 2 Kay & J. 1; 8 De Gex, M. & G. 133; Potts v. Surr, 34 Beav. 543, 552; Davies v. Davies, 4 Giff. 417; King v. King, 3 Jur. N. S. 609, 611; Chambers v. Crabbe, 34 Beav. 457.

Mr. A. M. Lea, for appellee.

This suit is an attempt to enforce an express parol trust in land alleged to have been created thirty-five years before the filing of the bill, and eleven years after the death of the alleged trustee. An essential part of the relief sought is in the cancellation of a solemn instrument, executed by the complainant and the dead trustee, the recitals and covenants of which are at war with the idea of the trust, twenty-two years after its execution.

The lapse of all these years, the death of parties and witnesses, the long continued and complete acquiescence of complainant in her father's disposition of his property by deed and will, during all which period she had a perfect knowledge of every fact charged in the bill, present insuperable barriers to relief in a court of equity.

No tribunal has more steadily set its face against the enforcement of trusts so stale than has this court.

The parol trust must be clearly proved.

Mercer v. Starke, 1 Smedes & M. Ch. 487; Dillaye v. Greenough, 45 N. Y. 438; Slocum v. Marshall, 2 Wash. C. C. 397; Smith v. Matthews, 3 De Gex, F. & J. 139; Cook v. Barr, 44 N. Y. 156; Parkhurst v. Van Cortland, 1 Johns. Ch. 237; Steere v. Steere, 5 Johns. Ch. 1.

Not a witness is produced who claims to have any positive knowledge of the assumption of the trust by Joseph E. Davis save the complainant herself, and she cannot be heard to testify. Appellee moved to exclude her deposition in the court below, first because she was not a competent witness under section 858, Rev. Stat. U. S., and second, for incompetency under section 1602, Rev. Code of Mississippi of 1880. Both statutes excluded her.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity filed on the 25th of June, 1881, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Mississippi, by Florida Laughlin, the wife of Edmund C. Laughlin, against Joseph D. Mitchell, and also against Jefferson Davis and Joseph H. D. Bowmar as executors of the last will and testament of Joseph E. Davis, deceased. [413]

The allegations of the bill are substantially as follows: The plaintiff is the owner and in possession of a plantation in Warren County, Mississippi, known as "Diamond Bend." She is a daughter of Joseph E. Davis, deceased. The defendant Mitchell is the grandson of Davis. Davis died in 1870, leaving a last will and testament, which was duly admitted to probate in the proper court, in September, 1870. The will was executed on the 18th of March, 1869. Its second and third articles were as follows: "2nd. I give and devise to my daughter, Florida Laughlin, the estate known as the Diamond Place, in said County of Warren, containing about one thousand two hundred acres, for and during her natural life, with full enjoyment of the profits and privileges thereunto, belonging. 3dly. I give and devise to my grandson, Joseph D. Mitchell, the plantation known as the Diamond Place, in the County of Warren, containing about one thousand two hundred acres, now in possession of and occupied by my said daughter, Florida Laughlin, who has a life estate therein, with appurtenances thereunto belonging on the death of my said daughter, Florida Laughlin, to hold and enjoy the same in fee simple; but in case my grandson, J. D. Mitchell, should not survive my daughter, Florida Laughlin, and should die without issue, I give and devise said Diamond Place to my nephew, Joseph E. Davis, son of Hugh R. Davis, of Wilkinson County, Mississippi." Davis became possessed of the property in question only through the plaintiff and as her trustee, under the following circumstances: on the 7th of June, 1844, the plaintiff was the wife of David Mc Caleb, and she and her husband were then living on the plantation, which had been his property before he married her. There existed a deed of trust of the property, given by Mc Caleb in 1837, the balance of the debt secured by which, amounting to $13,955.80, had been assigned to one Jacobs. In June, 1844, the plaintiff and her husband executed a new deed of trust to Chilton and Searles, as trustees, to secure the payment of said balance to Jacobs, covering the land and sundry slaves and personal property. In May, [413] 1846, the plaintiff and her husband executed another deed of trust, covering the same real and personal property, and some additional slaves, to one McElrath, as trustee, to secure a debt due by the husband to Laughlin, Searles & Co., the debt amounting to $4,201.61 of principal. In addition, Mc Caleb owed other large, pressing debts. The property was then reasonably worth more than $100,000. Chilton and Searles advertised the property for sale under their deed of trust, at public outcry, on the 15th of June, 1846. Before that day, Jonathan Mc Caleb, the uncle of David Mc Caleb, had promised to purchase the property at the sale, to take the title to it in his own name, and to give to David McCaleb time to repay to his uncle such amount as he should advance to make the purchase. Accordingly, the uncle attended the sale, prepared to purchase the property, in trust for the benefit of his nephew. The plaintiff's father had, however, in the meantime, at her solicitation, consented to purchase the property in trust for her, and to hold it so that she and her husband might in time be able to redeem it, the object being to make it secure from the creditors of her husband. On the day of the sale, her father and her husband's uncle being present, it was agreed that the purchase should be made by and in the name of her father, to be held for and sold to her on payment of such sum, with interest, as her father might be required to pay or assume, instead of being bid in by and in the name of her husband's uncle, to be redeemed in like manner by her husband. It was made known at the sale, to all present, that her father was bidding for her, and on that account no bidding was made by any disinterested persons, and, as a result, there was no substantial competition. All of the property, real and personal, was knocked off to her father as the highest bidder, at the sum of $22,531, which was scarcely more than one third of its value. The creditors who were entitled to the proceeds consented that the purchase money should not be required to be paid in cash. The plaintiff was left in the undisturbed possession of the property, without the payment of any money, and her father executed his own note to Jacobs for the [414] principal and interest of the debt to Jacobs, including the expenses of the sale, the intention being that her husband might be able to meet such payment by the proceeds of the crops from the property. On the 15th of June, 1846, a written agreement was executed by Chilton and Searles, as trustees, by Joseph E. Davis, and by Jacobs, which recited the sale under the deed of trust to them, and that Davis had at the sale purchased the slaves and the land for $28,531, and conveyed the property to Davis, subject to the payment of a promissory note which he then gave for the amount of the debt due to Jacobs, the title to all the property to remain in the trustees until the payment of such debt, and then to vest absolutely in Davis; Davis to pay out of the balance of the purchase money the amount due to Laughlin, Searles & Co., under the deed of trust of May 7, 1846, and the remainder of the purchase money to go to David Mc Caleb. After these arrangements, David Mc Caleb continued the cultivation of the crops and exercised dominion over the property in like manner as if the title had been vested in the plaintiff instead of in her father for her use. Her father never, during the lifetime of her husband, exercised any control over the property. No account was kept or demanded as to its rents, issues and profits, and the debts which had been so assumed by her father were considered by him and her husband as her debts, to be paid for by her husband by means of the property. Her husband treated the property as her separate estate, and shipped the crops during his lifetime, and applied the proceeds to the payment of the debts which had been assumed by her father, and of the other incumbrances. David Mc Caleb died in May, 1847, and she shipped the crops of that year, as the crops of the preceding year had been shipped, to agents, to the credit of Diamond Place account, for the Jacobs judgment. In July, 1848, she married Edmund C. Laughlin, her present husband. They continued to live on the plantation, shipping the crops as before, and applying the same, sometimes through their merchants and sometimes by direct payment to her father, to the discharge of said indebtedness. Some years after she had married Laughlin, and after she had paid a large portion of all the incumbrances, and some other indebtedness, she requested her father to [415] make a title to her, and allow her to secure to him any balance for which she might be liable. This request was not complied with by him, but his failure to do so was not accompanied or explained by his advancing any claim of beneficial interest in himself in the property. Her ownership of the property was repeatedly admitted by her father, both orally, and in letters addressed to her and subscribed by him. On more than one occasion he declared to her that he had devised the property to her by his will. Before the year 1858 she had more than repaid to her father all money and debts paid out and assumed by him for her on account of the property. On the 27th of December, 1858 when her father was just beginning to recover from a dangerous illness, and while he was feeble and nervous, he said to the plaintiff, who was then in attendance upon him, that he would like her husband to be sent for (he being then at Diamond Place, several miles away). When her husband arrived, he and the plaintiff were called into the office of her father, and a paper was put into her hands, which he desired her to read aloud. When she had read it, she found it was a lease to be signed by her and her husband, and by her father, in which her father leased the Diamond Place, and the slaves so purchased by him, to the plaintiff, for life. The lease, a copy of which is annexed to the bill, was signed by the three parties. It is dated December 27, 1858, and by it Davis, in consideration of natural love and affection and $100, leases to the plaintiff the plantation called Diamond Place, and certain slaves, horses, mules, colts, cattle, sheep and hogs, for the natural life of the plaintiff. There is a covenant by the plaintiff and her husband that they will manage the plantation and slaves in a proper and husbandlike manner, and at the termination of the lease will quietly surrender the plantation and property unto Davis, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, "in as good condition as the same now is, natural wear and tear and unavoidable accidents excepted, it being hereby acknowledged that the sole legal and equitable title in and to said plantation and slaves and other property is in the said party of the first part, and the right of property in him." On becoming aware of the contents of the paper she was asked to sign, the plaintiff remonstrated with her father, and reminded him that at the trustees' sale of the property he had promised her that as soon as [416] the debt which he had assumed, or would have to assume, was paid to him, he would make her a fee simple title to the place, and she said to him that, notwithstanding all he had ever paid out on the place had been repaid to him, he now wished her to take only a life estate in what she had thus bought and paid for, to which his only reply was, "I think it best for you." She signed the paper under compulsion, seeing the nervous and excited condition of her father and fearing disastrous consequences to him, in his feeble state of health, if she should any longer oppose him She and her husband afterwards acknowledged the deed or lease, on the 31st of May, 1859. The acknowledgment was extorted from them by threats on the part of Davis, if they did not acknowledge it, to take possession of the place and put an overseer on it, and leave to the plaintiff the bare occupancy of the house and garden, with no other provision. From the time the plaintiff was induced by her father to make such acknowledgment up to the time of his death, she expressed to him on all proper occasions, both in letters and personal interviews, her sense of the injustice which had been done to her. From the time she left her father's house, after executing the deed or lease, she never returned to it. After she had signed the instrument she always supposed that by that act she had finally and hopelessly lost her property, and whatever she has said or done or omitted to do since was under that belief. Prior to January 25, 1869, her father suggested to her husband that he should purchase the property at the price of $60,000 for the bare land and tenements, when the market value thereof was trifling compared with their value in June, 1846, when the same lands with the slaves sold for over $28,000. Joseph E. Davis, the son of Hugh R. Davis, who was the devisee, under the will, of the plantation in case Joseph D. Mitchell should not survive the plaintiff and should die without issue, is dead.

Such being the allegations of the bill, its prayer is, "That the lease or instrument in [417] writing whereby your oratrix conveyed her said property to Joseph E. Davis, or acknowledged that the right thereof was in him, be adjudged void and of no effect as against your oratrix; that the devise of said property in and by said will to the defendant Joseph D. Mitchell be decreed to be void; that the beneficial ownership and title to said property be decreed, as against said Joseph E. Davis, deceased, and his devisees, to be in your oratrix; that an account may be taken of the payments which were made by and for your oratrix in the premises, that it may be ascertained whether or not she has, in fact, paid to said Joseph E. Davis the full amount which she was bound to pay to entitle her to the relief hereby prayed, as she has hereinbefore alleged, your oratrix being willing and hereby offering to pay any balance which may be found against her, on such accounting, to the parties entitled thereto; and that upon the ascertainment that your oratrix has fully paid all such sums as in equity she ought to have paid, or upon her payment thereof now, she may be decreed to have the absolute, indefeasible title of said property, as against said defendant."

The answer of the defendant Mitchell puts in issue all the material allegations of the bill on which the relief it claims is founded. It denies every averment setting up any arrangement, agreement, or understanding made by Joseph E. Davis with David McCaleb, or with Jonathan McCaleb, or with the plaintiff, for the purchase of the property in trust for the plaintiff, and alleges that Joseph E. Davis purchased the property at the sale in his own right, and thereby acquired the full beneficial and legal title thereto, and that he paid the full sum which he agreed to pay by the instrument of June 15, 1846. It alleges that David McCaleb and the plaintiff at all times recognized the ownership of Joseph E. Davis in the property, and were fully cognizant of the fact that, although he purchased the property to save the plaintiff from being turned out of her home, he never contemplated giving her the fee in the property, or any other interest than a life estate, and that he did not keep or demand any account of the rents, issues, and profits of the plantation, because he was content that the plaintiff should enjoy the usufruct [418] of the property during her life, as appears by the lease and by the terms of his will. It denies that any crops were shipped for the account of the indebtedness to Jacobs, and denies that either McCaleb or the plaintiff ever paid to Joseph E. Davis any part of the $28,531 which constituted the purchase money of the property. It denies that the signature of the plaintiff or her husband to the lease, or their subsequent acknowledgment of it, was procured by the compulsion, threats, or other undue influence of her father, and alleges that the lease was intended by him as a provision for her, and as an assurance to her of a home for the remainder of her life.

A replication was filed to this answer and proofs were taken, and the case was heard, an order being entered dismissing the bill as to the executors of Joseph E. Davis.

The deposition of the plaintiff was taken as a witness in her own behalf, and afterwards, and at the hearing, the defendant made a motion to exclude the deposition, on the ground that she was not a competent witness. The court made a decree dismissing the bill, from which the plaintiff has appealed. In its opinion (14 Fed. Rep. 882) it says: "It is admitted that the testimony of the complainant as to the understanding and agreement between her and her father, relating to the creation of the alleged trust, is incompetent, and cannot be considered."

The circuit court gives the following as a statement of undisputed facts in the case: "In the year 1846, David McCaleb, then the husband of complainant, was the owner of the land described in the bill and the subject of this controversy. He was largely indebted, and before that time had executed a mortgage or trust deed to secure a debt due to one Jacobs, in which complainant joined, conveying to the trustees, Chilton and Searles, this tract of land, with the slaves and personal property thereon. The trustees, having advertised the time and place of sale, proceeded, on the 15th of June, 1846, to offer the same for sale to the highest bidder for cash. There were present at the sale Jonathan McCaleb, an uncle of David McCaleb, who held a large debt against his nephew, and other creditors, or their counsel, who bid more or less for the property sold; but the whole of it was either struck off to Joseph [419] E. Davis, the father of complainant, or the bids were transferred to him, so that he became the purchaser, the aggregate amount of the sales being $28,581. Said Davis, so far as the creditors were concerned, continued to be the owner of the property; but David McCaleb and wife remained in possession of the property as before the sale, up to McCaleb's death, which occurred about one year thereafter. Complainant remained in possession alone up to her intermarriage with E. C. Laughlin, her present husband and complainant, and they have remained in possession ever since. On the 27th of December, 1858, Joseph E. Davis executed a lease or deed conveying said property, real and personal, to complainant, for and during her natural life. This conveyance contained in it an acknowledgment that said Davis was the sole, legal and equitable owner of the property conveyed. After being duly signed by said Davis, by complainant and her husband, it was delivered to complainant, and some five months thereafter it was duly acknowledged by complainant and her husband, and recorded in the proper office. Joseph E. Davis, by his last will and testament, duly probated and admitted to record, devised to the defendant, Joseph D. Mitchell, this land described as 'Diamond Place,' then occupied by complainant, and in which, as declared by the will, she had a life estate."

As to the disputed facts in the case the court held that the trust alleged was not established by the evidence, aside from the testimony of the plaintiff, the view taken by it being that the evidence established that Davis purchased the property with the purpose of letting the plaintiff and her husband remain on the plantation and control it and the property upon it, intending to hold the legal title to all of it and to make himself personally responsible for the expenses of the plantation, the income to be applied to pay those expenses and the personal expenses of his daughter and her husband, and the remainder of it to the payment of the purchase money for which he was personally liable, and intending, when this was done, to convey, or secure by his will, to her, a title to the property, it not very clearly appearing whether this was to be in fee or only for life; that, after the [420] plaintiff's marriage to Laughlin, she and her husband desired to obtain the legal title to the property, the plaintiff all the time recognizing the title to it as being in her father, and that it was incumbered for the payment of the balance of the purchase money to whomsoever it might be due; that this state of things continued until the execution of the lease; that the lease left the plaintiff in possession of the property for life, free from any obligation to pay any part of the debts of the place or the balance of the purchase money due; that the trust alleged was not established by clear and satisfactory evidence; that, even admitting the understanding between the plaintiff and her father at the time of the sale, as alleged in the bill, the demands referred to had not been satisfied at the time the lease was executed; that there was no fraud or deception or undue influence on the part of the plaintiff's father in respect to the execution of the lease by her or her husband; that, eight days after the execution of the lease, he gave her the option of returning it, and in that event proposed to leave her in possession of the house, garden and appurtenances and an income, in place of the provisions of the lease; that, after waiting nearly five months and deliberating upon the proposition, and without any further influence upon the part of her father, so far as the evidence shows, and with ample time to consult counsel and friends, she and her husband, and not Mr. Davis, placed the lease on record in the proper office in Warren County, thus accepting its terms; and that they enjoyed its benefits, with no attempt to revoke it, until the filing of this bill on the 25th of June, 1881, more than twenty-two years after the execution, acknowledgment and recording of the lease, more than twelve years after Davis' will was made, and more than ten years after his death; and that it does not appear that any intimation was given to Davis, after the recording of the lease, of dissatisfaction with its terms, or that he was advised during his lifetime of any intention to assail it. The opinion of the circuit court says: "On the 18th day of March, 1869, Mr. Davis made his last will and testament, by which he devised the remainder interest in this real estate to the defendant. Ten years thus elapsing after the lease was recorded by Mrs. Laughlin before Mr. Davis made his will, he was justified in the belief that he had the right and power to devise this remainder interest to whom he pleased, and for this reason, if there were no other, I am of opinion that complainant is estopped from assailing this lease now, and is not entitled to have the same declared void, and a cloud upon her title. She was fully cognizant of all the facts in relation to her title and in relation to the execution of the instrument, during the lifetime of her father as well as since. To wait until after his death, and until after the death of most of the persons who could have had any knowledge of the transactions, and after her father, by will, had disposed of his estate, presumably, in some respects, in a manner otherwise than he would have done had he not believed himself possessed of this property, and then attack his will, would be inequitable and unjust."

On the whole case we are of opinion, that, even regarding the deposition of the plaintiff as competent testimony under section 858 of the Revised Statutes, she is estopped by her action in respect to the acknowledgment of the lease, and placing it on record, and permitting it thus to remain unquestioned for over twenty-two years, from setting up the parol trust alleged in regard to the property; that no ground is shown for setting aside the lease; and that the decree of the Circuit Court must be affirmed.

[421] CAROLINE CARSON, Appt.,

v.

C. T. DUNHAM.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 421-430.)

Removal of causes—citizenship—burden of showing, on petitioner—colorable assignment—cause arising under Constitution, laws or treaties of the United States—distinction between jurisdiction on removal from and review of judgments of state courts—amendment of petition, answer as—mortgage made within Confederate lines—unlawful intercourse.

1. Upon petition for the removal of a cause on the ground of citizenship, the burden is on the petitioner to show that the adverse party is not a citizen of the same State.

2. A colorable transfer of a right of action made to deprive the circuit court of jurisdiction is not a ground for removal.

3. Before a circuit court is required to retain a cause, on the ground that it arises under the Constitution, laws or treaties of the United States, it must in some form appear upon the record, by a statement of facts in legal and logical form, such as is required in good pleading, that it really and substantially involves a dispute or controversy so arising.

4. The circuit court is without jurisdiction of a cause upon removal where the defendant by way of defense seeks to enforce an ordinary property right, acquired under judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States, without presenting any question "distinctly involving the laws of the United States."

5. For the purposes of removal the Constitution, or some law or treaty of the United States, must be directly involved; while for the purposes of review it is enough if the right in question comes from a "commission held, or an authority exercised, under the United States."

6. The fact that a mortgage affecting a loyal citizen was made within the Confederate lines does not necessarily imply unlawful intercourse between the parties, and it is not enough to make a suit thereon one arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States.

7. It seems that a petition which shows on its face a right to remove, may be amended in the civil court, and that an answer filed after removal may, for purposes of jurisdiction, be fairly treated as an amendment to the petition for removal.

[No. 1825.]

Submitted Mar. 28, 1887. Decided Apr. 25, 1887.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Clarence A. Seward, James Lowndes, H. E. Young and A. G. Magrath, for appellant:

"A case arising under the laws of the United States" is removable without regard to the citizenship of the parties.

R. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 102 U. S. 135 (26: 96); Ames v. Kansas, 111 U. S. 449 (28:482).

In Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 130 (22:588), in which there was a writ of error to a state court, the plaintiff in error set up in the state court a judgment of the United States, and on the writ of error averred, as the ground of jurisdiction of this court, that the state court had not given effect to that judgment.

This court held that it had jurisdiction of the case on that ground, and that the judgment of a United States Court is a right or title under an authority exercised under the United States.

See also Factors & T. Ins. Co. v. Murphy, 111 U. S. 738 (28:582); New Orleans, S. F. & L. R. R. Co. v. Delamore, 114 U. S. 501 (29:244).

A case concerning a judgment of a United States Court is so much a case arising under the laws of the United States that a suit based upon it is within the federal jurisdiction, without regard to the citizenship of the parties.

Freeman v. Howe, 65 U. S. 24 How. 450 (16: 749); Krippendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 276 (28: 145); Pacific R. R. Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. R. Co. 111 U. S. 505 (28:498).

It is averred in the petition for removal and in the answer that the property in controversy was in the possession of the circuit court when the suit in the state court was begun. This averment presents a case "arising under the laws of the United States."

The bill for foreclosure was filed in the state court on the 11th day of August, 1886, but service was not obtained, and there was no appearance until the 8th of October, 1886. The order of the circuit court appointing a receiver was made on September 7, 1886.

People's Bank v. Calhoun, 102 U. S. 256 (26: 101).

Messrs. William E. Earle and Mitchell & Smith, for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court: [422]

This is an appeal under section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, 18 Stat. at L. 470, from an order of the circuit court remanding a suit which had been removed from a state court. The record shows that on the 11th of August, 1886, C. T. Dunham, the appellee, filed a bill in equity in the Court of Common Pleas of Berkeley County, South Carolina, against Caroline Carson, to foreclose a mortgage made by William McBurney and Alfred L. Gillespie to [423] Edmund Hyatt, which had been assigned to Dunham. It is alleged that Mrs. Carson is in possession of the mortgaged property, and that she and the plaintiff are the only necessary parties to the suit. Service was made on Mrs. Carson by publication, for the reason, as shown by affidavit, that she did not reside in South Carolina, but in Rome, Italy. On the 9th of October, 1886, which was the day service on her was completed, she entered her appearance by counsel, and at the same time filed her petition for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina, on the following grounds:

"I. That all the matters therein have been already adjudged in her favor by the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina.

"II. That the complainant is barred of his present action by a judgment of the said court in her favor on the matter in controversy.

"III. That this court is without jurisdiction because a prior suit on the like matter is pending in the aforesaid court of the United States, which, by its receiver, has possession of the subject matter of this suit.

"IV. That the bond and mortgage sued on are void under the laws of the United States.

"V. That the defendant holds title to Dean Hall plantation, the property involved in this suit and mentioned in the complaint in the above entitled suit, under an authority exercised under the United States; to wit, under a conveyance from the United States Marshal for the District of South Carolina, made under a decree of the United States Circuit Court for the said district, all of which will more fully appear by her answer.

"The controversy in said suit is also wholly between citizens of different States; viz., between the said C. T. Dunham, who, as your petitioner is informed and avers, was, at the commencement of said suit, and now is a citizen of the State of South Carolina, and your petitioner, who was, at the commencement of said suit, and now is, a citizen of the State of Massachusetts; or the controversy in said suit is wholly between Mary A. Hyatt, who was, [424] at the commencement of said suit, and now is a citizen of the State of New York, and who is the sole and only real party in interest in said suit and in said controversy, and your petitioner, who was, at the commencement of the said suit, and now is, a citizen of the State of Massachusetts, and which controversy is the only controversy in said suit; that the said Mary A. Hyatt is the real party plaintiff in said suit, and the said C. T. Dunham is but a nominal and colorable plaintiff, and that his name has been used merely for the purpose of defeating the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina, and that said suit is, in fact, a controversy wholly between the said Mary A. Hyatt and your petitioner, notwithstanding the assignment to the said C. T. Dunham in the complaint in said suit mentioned."

The suit was entered in the circuit court on the 26th of October, 1886, and the next day Mrs. Carson filed in that court an answer to the bill, in which she set up title in herself to the mortgaged property by reason of a purchase at judicial sale under a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States, affirmed by this court, McBurney v. Carson, 99 U. S. 567 [25:378], in a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage belonging to her, superior in lien to that in favor of Hyatt. The particulars of her title, as stated in the answer, will be found reported in Carson v. Hyatt, 118 U. S. 279 [ante, 167], decided by this court at the last term. The claim is that Dunham is estopped by this foreclosure from denying the validity of the mortgage held by Mrs. Carson, and its priority in lien to that on which his suit was brought.

The answer also sets up as a bar to this suit a decree in the suit of Carson v. Hyatt, supra, after it was removed to the Circuit Court of the United States under the order of this court, dismissing the bill on the discontinuance of the complainant therein from whom Dunham claims title by assignment since the rendition of that decree.

The answer also contains these further defenses:

"XVII. The defendant avers that a suit is now pending in this court wherein all the issues involved in this action are raised; that the said suit was begun before this present suit, and that this court obtained jurisdiction thereof before any court obtained jurisdiction of this present suit; and she says that by reason of the said suit the Court of Common Pleas of Berkeley County then had and now has no jurisdiction of this action.

"XVIII. When the bond and mortgage which the complainant is seeking to enforce were executed to the said Edmund Hyatt, the said Edmund Hyatt was a citizen and a resident of the State of New York, a loyal State, and the obligors of the said bond, and the makers of the said mortgage, were citizens of the State of South Carolina, which was then in rebellion against the United States; and this defendant avers that the said bond and mortgage were void under the laws of the United States."

On the 11th of November Dunham filed in the circuit court an answer to the petition of Mrs. Carson for removal, in which he denied that he was a citizen of South Carolina, and averred that he was a citizen of the same State with her; namely, Massachusetts. The issue made by this answer was set down for trial in the circuit court, accompanied by an order "That on such trial the burden shall be upon the defendant, Caroline Carson, to show that the plaintiff, C. T. Dunham, is not a citizen of Massachusetts."

Upon this trial it was substantially admitted that Dunham was at the commencement of the suit a citizen of Massachusetts, and thereupon the suit was remanded. From an order to that effect this appeal was taken.

The circuit court did not err in holding that the burden of proof was on Mrs. Carson to show that Dunham was not a citizen of Massachusetts. As she was the actor in the removal proceeding, it rested on her to make out the jurisdiction of the circuit court. Dunham having denied that he was a citizen of South Carolina, as she had stated in her petition, and having claimed that he was in fact a citizen of Massachusetts, the same as herself, the affirmative was on her to prove that his claim was not true, or, in other words, that he was a citizen of another State than her own. The fact that the suit had actually been entered in the circuit [426] court did not shift the burden of proof. It was decided in Stone v. South Carolina, 117 U. S. 430 [29:962], that all issues of fact made on a petition for removal must be tried in the circuit court. The matter stood for trial in the circuit court, therefore, precisely the same as it would if the law had required the petition for removal to be filed there instead of in the state court, and Mrs. Carson had been called on to prove the facts on which her right of removal rested.

The evidence showed conclusively that Dunham was a citizen of the same State with Mrs. Carson; and consequently the suit was properly remanded so far as that ground of removal was concerned.

The fact, if it be a fact, that the assignment of the mortgage to Dunham was colorable only, and made for the purpose of preventing the removal, gives the circuit court no right to take jurisdiction. That was decided in Provident Sav. etc. Society v. Ford, 114 U. S. 635 [29:261], followed and approved in Oakley v. Goodnow, 118 U. S. 43 [ante, 61].

The important question is, therefore, whether it sufficiently appears that the suit is one "arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States." In Gold Washing and Water Co. v. Keyes, 96 U. S. 203 [24:658], it was decided that, "Before a circuit court can be required to retain a cause under this jurisdiction, it must in some form appear upon the record, by a statement of facts,' in legal and logical form,' such as is required in good pleading, that the suit is one which 'really and substantially involves a dispute or controversy' as to a right which depends upon the construction or effect of the Constitution, or some law or treaty, of the United States." When this suit came into the circuit court from the state court, no such case had been made out. As was further said in the case just cited, "The office of pleading is to state facts, not conclusions of law. It is the duty of the court to declare the conclusions, and of the parties to state the premises." All the statements of this petition, which, for the purpose of removal, performs the office of pleading, are mere conclusions of law, not facts from which the conclusions are to be drawn. If the case had stood on the bill and petition for removal alone, there could be no doubt of the propriety [427] of the order to remand on this ground as well as on that of citizenship.

But after the case got into the circuit court, an answer was filed which did state the facts from which, it is claimed, the conclusions of law set out in the petition necessarily followed. The petition, on its face, made a case for removal by reason of the citizenship of the parties; and the suit was properly taken from the state court and entered in the circuit court on that ground, if not on the others. The statute made it the duty of the state court to proceed no further until its jurisdiction had in some way been been restored. Had it proceeded, its judgment could have been reversed, because, on the face of the record, its jurisdiction had been taken away.

The suit was, therefore, rightfully in the circuit court when the record was entered there and when the answer was filed, which, for the purposes of jurisdiction, may fairly be treated as an amendment to the petition for removal, setting forth the facts from which the conclusions there stated were drawn. As an amendment, the answer was germane to the petition, and did no more than set forth in proper form what had before been imperfectly stated. To that extent, we think, it was proper to amend a petition which, on its face, showed a right to the transfer. Whether this could have been done if the petition, as presented to the state court, had not shown on its face sufficient ground of removal, we do not now decide.

Before considering further this branch of the case it is proper to notice the difference between the provisions of the Act of 1875 for the removal of suits presenting federal questions, and those in section 709 of the Revised Statutes for the review by this court of the decisions of the highest courts of the States. Under the Act of 1875, for the purposes of removal, the suit must be one "arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made or which shall be made under their authority;" that is to say, the suit must be one in which some title, right, privilege, or immunity on which the recovery depends will be defeated by one construction of the Constitution, or a law or treaty of the United States, or sustained by a contrary construction. Starin v. New York City, 115 U. S. 257 [29:390], and cases there cited. But under [428] section 709 there may be a review by this court of the decisions of the highest courts of the States in suits "where any title, right, privilege or immunity is claimed under the Constitution, or any treaty or statute of, or commission held or authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege or immunity specially set up or claimed, by either party under such constitution, treaty, statute, commission or authority." For the purposes of a removal the Constitution, or some law or treaty of the United States must be directly involved, while for the purposes of review it will be enough if the right in question comes from a "commission held, or an authority exercised, under the United States." Cases, therefore, relating to the jurisdiction of this court for review are not necessarily controlling in reference to removals.

This distinction was pointed out and acted on in Provident Sav. etc. Society v. Ford, 114 U. S. 635 [supra], where the suit was brought in a state court of New York on a judgment in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio, and an attempt was made to remove it under the Act of 1875, on the ground among others that "A suit on a judgment recovered in a United States Court is necessarily a suit arising under the laws of the United States, as much so as if the plaintiff or defendant were a corporation of the United States;" but it was decided otherwise, p. 642 [264], because a suit on such a judgment is "simply the case of an ordinary right of property sought to be enforced," unless some question is raised "distinctly involving the laws of the United States." "These considerations," it was further said, "show a wide distinction between the case of a suit merely on a judgment of a United States Court and that of a suit by or against a United States corporation." The expressions in the opinions in Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 184 [22:590], and Crescent City Live Stock etc. Co. v. Butchers Union etc. Co. 120 U. S. 146 [ante, 614], relied on by the counsel for the appellants, and which are thought to be in conflict with this, must be read and construed with reference to the facts of those cases, which came here from the courts of States for review under section 709 of the Revised Statutes.

What we have quoted above from Provident [429]
Sav. etc. Society v. Ford, is equally applicable to the case made on this record. The answer sets up as a defense to the suit the decree in Hyatt v. Carson, and the title acquired by the purchase under the authority of the sale in Carson v. McBurney. It is an attempt to enforce an ordinary property right, acquired under the authority of judgments and decrees in the courts of the United States, without presenting any question "distinctly involving the laws of the United States." The suit, therefore, as now presented, is not one arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, within the meaning of that term as used in the Removal Act of 1875; but if, in deciding the case, the highest court of the State shall fail to give full effect to the authority exercised under the United States, as shown by the judgments and decrees of their courts, relied on to support the title of Mrs. Carson, its decision in that regard may be the subject of review by this court under section 709. The petition for the removal and the answer, taken together, set up and claim in her behalf a right derived from an authority exercised under the United States, but not necessarily under the laws of the United States, within the meaning of that term as used in the Removal Act.

What has been said in reference to the claims under the decrees in the circuit court is equally applicable to the allegation in the answer of the pendency of another suit on the same cause of action in the same court.

The statement in the answer that when the mortgage to Hyatt was made he was a citizen and resident of New York, and the makers of the mortgage citizens of South Carolina, a State whose people were then in rebellion against the United States, is not enough to make a suit arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States. The fact that a mortgage was made in enemy territory to a loyal citizen of the United States does not necessarily imply unlawful intercourse between the parties, contrary to the Proclamation of the President of the date of August 16, 1861, 12 Stat. at L. 1262, under the authority of the Act of July 13, 1861, chap. 3, § 5, 12 Stat. at L. 257. That transactions within Confederate lines affecting loyal citizens outside [430] were not all unlawful was decided in United States v. Quigley, 103 U. S. 595 [26:524]. To make a case for removal the answer should have set forth the facts which rendered the mortgage void under the Nonintercourse Act and the Proclamation thereunder. There has been no attempt to do this.

The order remanding the case is affirmed.

[430] MILWAUKEE AND NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
BROOKS LOCOMOTIVE WORKS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 430-443.)

Railroads—lease by one company of the road of another—entry by trustees under former mortgage of the lessee—garnishee proceedings against them by judgment creditor of the lessor to reach fund due as compensation for use of said road—rights of trustee under a mortgage on said road, who is also assignee of the lease—trustees did not hold under the lease—amount due, the property of the lessor—recovery against garnishees—defense in garnishee proceedings.

1. On January 4, 1879, the trustees under the mortgage of July 1, 1871, of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, took possession of the property of said company and of the road of the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, the Wisconsin Company being at that time the lessee of said road under a lease executed after the execution of said mortgage. Said trustees at once notified the Milwaukee Company, and the trustee under a mortgage on said road, who was also trustee under the lease and assignee of the same, that they declined to assume, affirm, or in any way ratify said lease, and that, unless the parties notified should otherwise elect, they would continue to operate said road temporarily, and for such compensation as it might fairly be worth. The receivers continued to operate said road until May 1, 1879, when they accepted a lease of the same from a receiver appointed in a proceeding then pending for the foreclosure of the mortgage thereon. In garnishee proceedings against said trustees, instituted by a judgment creditor of the Milwaukee Company, it is held: that the trustees under the mortgage of the Wisconsin Central Company did not take possession of the Milwaukee road under the lease to said company as subtenants or otherwise, and that they were therefore not bound to pay rent to the trustee under said lease; that the rent of said road is only payable to him, if at all, either as trustee or assignee for the purposes and upon the trusts expressed in the lease in the assignment, and only when it is made to appear that such trusts have not been fully paid and satisfied; that the sum due from said trustee as compensation for the use of said road from January 8 to May 1, 1879, was the property of the Milwaukee Company at the commencement of said garnishee proceedings; and that said judgment creditor thereby acquired a lien upon said fund to the extent of the amount due upon its judgment against said Company.

2. A garnishee may represent, in his own defense, the rights of a third party to whom he is in law liable.

Argued April 15, 1887. Decided April 25, 1887

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. E. Mariner, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. F. C. Winkler, James G. Jenkins and Davis, Reiss & Shepard, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

The Brooks Locomotive Works on November 30, 1875, recovered a judgment against the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company for the sum of $15,368.72, with interest and costs, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin. Execution thereon having been returned not satisfied, and the judgment being otherwise unpaid and still in force, on July 7, 1879, the plaintiff be- [431 low filed what under the laws of Wisconsin regulating the practice in such cases is called an affidavit of garnishment, in which it was alleged that the defendant, the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, had not property liable to execution sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's demand, and that the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, a corporation of the State of Wisconsin, and Charles L. Colby, Edwin H. Abbot, and John A. Stewart, were indebted to or had property, real or personal, in their possession or under their control, belonging to the defendant in said execution. Summons was accordingly issued, pursuant to said affidavit, against the garnishees, and served on the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, C. L. Colby, and Edwin H. Abbot, as well as upon the defendant, the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company. The defendants filed answers, Edwin H. Abbot answering under oath for himself and John A. Stewart, a citizen of New York, jointly. In this answer Stewart and Abbot set out particularly the circumstances under which they allege that they hold the sum of $28,258.44 as an amount due from them, as trustees for the mortgage bondholders of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, for the use and occupation of the railroad of the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company while operated by them as such trustees; and, being in doubt as to whether the facts stated cast any liability upon them as garnishees, submit the question of their liability to the court. The other garnishees in their answers deny any indebtedness to the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company while operated by them as such trustees; and, being in doubt as to whether the facts stated cast any liability upon them as garnishees, submit the question of their liability to the court. The other garnishees in their answers deny any indebtedness to the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company.

The cause, having come on for trial upon these issues, was submitted to the court, the intervention of a jury being duly waived. The findings of fact and conclusions of law are as follows:

"First: That on the 30th day of November, 1875, the plaintiff above named duly recovered a judgment in this court against the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, defendant herein, for the sum of $15,368.72, damages and costs; that said judgment is still in full force and wholly unpaid and unsatisfied; that there is now due thereon from said defendant, the [432] Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, to said plaintiff, the said sum of $15,368.72, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from the 30th day of November, 1875, amounting at this date to the sum of $23,410.40; and that said judgment was rendered upon certain promissory notes given by said Company to the plaintiff upon the sale of an engine furnished for its railroad on the 6th day of September, 1873; that an alias execution was duly issued out of and under the seal of this court to the Marshal of the Eastern District of Wisconsin upon said judgment on the 7th day of July, 1879, and while the same was in the hands of the said marshal, and wholly unsatisfied, and before the return day thereof, to wit, on the 7th day of July, 1879, this action was commenced, by due service of the garnishee affidavit and summons herein, upon the said defendant and upon the garnishees named in the title of this cause.

"Second. That the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company was, at said last named date, and for many years prior thereto had been, and at all times hereinafter mentioned was, a corporation created by and under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, and owned and operated a railroad from Menasha, in the State of Wisconsin, to Ashland, on Lake Superior, in said State; that the defendant, the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, was during said times a corporation created by and under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, and owned a certain main line of railway extending from the City of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin, to the City of Green Bay, in said State, and a spur line from Hilbert Junction, on said main line, to Menasha aforesaid; that the said Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, on the first day of July, 1871, mortgaged its line of railway aforesaid to secure certain bonds therein mentioned, which mortgage was in the usual form of railway mortgages, and authorized the trustees, upon default, to take possession of said railway, and that at all times hereinafter mentioned the defendants, John A. Stewart and Edwin H. Abbot, were the trustees under said mortgage.

"Third. That the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, prior to the times hereinafter mentioned, had duly mortgaged its said line of railway to secure its bonds, in the usual form of railway mortgages, with authority [433] upon the part of the trustees in said mortgage named to take possession of said railway upon default in the payment of the principal or interest of the bonds thereby secured, and that at the times hereinafter mentioned Jesse Hoyt and A. Warren Greenleaf were the trustees in said mortgage named, a copy of which mortgage is hereto annexed, marked 'Exhibit A.'

"Fourth. That on the 9th day of November 1873, the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company leased to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company its line of railway and appurtenances, motive power and rolling stock, railroad materials, and supplies of every description, for the term of 999 years from and after November 30, 1873, a copy of which lease is hereto annexed, marked 'Exhibit B;' that by supplemental agreements to said lease, of which 'Exhibits C. and D,' hereto annexed, are copies, Jesse Hoyt was substituted as trustee in place of the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company Bank, and that said lease was, on or about January 8, 1878, by said Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, assigned to Jesse Hoyt and A. Warren Greenleaf, trustees under said mortgage, of which the Wisconsin Central Railway Company had notice, copies of which assignment and notice are hereto annexed, marked 'Exhibits E and F;' that the Wisconsin Central Railway Company entered into possession of said road under said lease and continued therein until the garnishees herein, Stewart and Abbot, took possession of said railway in January, 1879, and said company paid rent under said lease.

"Fifth. That at the times herein mentioned Jesse Hoyt was the president of the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, and Angus Smith was the vice president thereof.

"Sixth. That on the 9th day of January, 1875, a foreclosure of the mortgage made by the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company was commenced in this court by Jesse Hoyt, surviving trustee, against the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company and the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, defendants, but that no receiver was appointed therein until the 28th day of April, 1879; on which day the [434] said court, by consent of the parties to said suit, made an order annulling such lease and appointing James C. Spencer receiver, who qualified as such receiver on the 5th day of May, 1879, a copy of which order is hereto annexed, marked 'Exhibit G;' and that said trustees had never taken possession of said railroad and property under said mortgage, nor claimed so to do, until the appointment of said receiver.

"Seventh. That on the 12th day of October, 1875, one James Ludington recovered a judgment at law, in the Circuit Court of the State of Wisconsin for the County of Milwaukee, against the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, and on the 15th day of November, 1875, caused an execution to be issued thereon, which was returned nulla bona on the 18th day of January, 1876, which judgment was rendered upon default and without any appearance of the defendant therein, and the process commencing said action was served only upon Guido Pfister, a director of said Company, and upon no other officer or person.

"Eighth. That on the 17th day of November, 1875, the said James Ludington filed a bill in equity in said Circuit Court for the County of Milwaukee founded upon his said judgment at law, and on the 27th day of December, 1875, obtained a decree therein, directing the sale of the railroad of the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company thereunder; that on the 4th day of March, 1876, under said decree, the sheriff of the County of Milwaukee sold said railroad to Guido Pfister, and on the 29th day of March, 1876, executed a deed thereof to him, but did not make a report of the sale to the court until January 30, 1880, and said sale was confirmed by the court on the 9th day of February, 1880, and that the sheriff's deed to Guido Pfister was recorded in the office of the register of deeds of the County of Milwaukee on the 26th day of February, 1880, but said Pfister never took or claimed possession under said deed.

"Ninth. On the 4th day of January, 1879, the defendants John A. Stewart and Edwin H. Abbot, as trustees under the mortgage of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, said company having theretofore made default under said mortgage, and then being so in default, duly took possession of said Wisconsin Central railroad under the said mortgage, and also took possession of the Milwaukee and Northern railway, and thereupon notified the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company and Jesse Hoyt, trustee of the mortgage of said [435] Company, and trustee under its said lease to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, and as assignee of said lease, of the taking of such possession of the Milwaukee and Northern railway, and notifying that they declined to assume, affirm, or in any way ratify the lease thereof to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, and notifying that unless said parties notified should otherwise elect they would continue to operate said Milwaukee and Northern railway temporarily and for such compensation as that service might fairly be worth, and requesting a personal interview to ascertain their wishes and with a view to a more permanent arrangement, and offering to submit to the parties in interest any proposition which could be jointly recommended with reference to the future possession of said railway, of which notice 'Exhibit H,' hereto annexed, is a copy; that the said Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, or Jesse Hoyt as president or as trustee, or as assignee of said lease, did not, nor did either of them, in any way object to the possession of said railroad by said Stewart and Abbot, or give any attention to said notice until the commencement of negotiations in March, 1879; but said Stewart and Abbot continued to use and operate the Milwaukee and Northern railway without further arrangement or agreement, and without any objection by any of the parties to this proceeding, and with the acquiescence of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, but without any assignment of the lease, until the first day of May, 1879, and until the lease from the receiver as hereinafter found; and said Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company and said Jesse Hoyt, shortly before the first day of May, 1879, in the presence and with the concurrence of all others interested, including the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, had negotiations with them which culminated in an arrangement by [436] which a receiver of the Milwaukee and Northern railway was appointed in the foreclosure suit, as hereinbefore found; that said Stewart and Abbot then entered into a lease with said receiver of said Milwaukee and Northern railway for a certain term commencing on the first day of May, 1879; that on or about the 23d day of July, 1879, after the service of the garnishee affidavit and summons herein, it was arranged and agreed between said Stewart and Abbot, trustees, on the one part, and Jesse Hoyt, as trustee and assignee, upon the other part, that the sum of $28,258.44 was the amount properly payable by the said Stewart and Abbot as trustees to the party lawfully entitled to receive the same out of the moneys received by said trustees from the operation of the Milwaukee and Northern railway from January 3, 1879, to May 1, 1879, and for the use thereof, which amount was a less sum than would have been coming by the terms of the lease to the Wisconsin Central railroad; and that thereupon said Stewart and Abbot paid to said Jesse Hoyt, as such trustee and assignee, the said sum of money upon receiving a bond of indemnity executed by Ephraim Mariner, Guido Pfister, and Angus Smith, indemnifying them against this suit by reason of such payment, copies of which agreement of accounting and bond of indemnity are hereto annexed, marked 'Exhibits I and J.'

"Tenth. That on the 8th day of March, 1880, an order was made in the foreclosure suit of the mortgage of the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company for the sale of said railroad, which sale took place on the 5th day of June, 1880, and was sold to Ephraim Mariner and Guido Pfister as trustees for the holders of the bonds under said mortgage; that on the 9th day of June the report of said sale was filed, and was confirmed by the court, and that thereafter, on the third day of July, 1880, the final report of the receiver was filed, asking for a discharge, and said report was confirmed on the 5th day of July, 1880.

"Eleventh. That from January 3, 1879, to May 1, 1879, the said Stewart and Abbot were not in possession of or operating said Milwaukee and Northern railway under any lease whatever between them and James C. Spencer as receiver [437] of the Milwaukee and Northern railway, as claimed in the answer of the principal defendant herein, nor was the indebtedness of said garnishees for the use and occupation of said railroad during said period owing by them to said James C. Spencer, receiver.

"Conclusions of Law.

"The contention in this case being as to who was entitled to the sum of $28,258.44, agreed upon as the fair compensation for the use of the Milwaukee and Northern railway from January 8 to May 1, 1879, we find:

"First. That it did not belong to and cannot be rightfully claimed by the receiver appointed in the foreclosure suit of the mortgage on the Milwaukee and Northern railway, for the reason that he was not qualified as receiver until a subsequent date, and had never reduced the property to possession, and was only receiver of the mortgaged property.

"Second. That said fund did not belong to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, because such occupation and operation of the road by Stewart and Abbot, trustees, were with its acquiescence, and it is upon record in this cause as denying all indebtedness to the principal defendant herein, and makes no claim to said fund.

"Third. That said fund did not belong to Jesse Hoyt as trustee under said mortgage, because said trustee had not taken possession of said railroad, and was not entitled to the income thereof; that it did not belong to said Jesse Hoyt as trustee under said lease, or as assignee of said lease, because the occupation and operation of said road by Stewart and Abbot, trustees, was not under said lease, but in defiance thereof and in opposition thereto.

"Fourth. That said sum was, at the time of the garnishee proceedings herein, the property of the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, and was liable to be taken and attached for the debts due by said Company; that the plaintiff, by virtue of the garnishee proceedings herein upon Stewart and Abbot, trustees, acquired a lawful claim and lien upon said fund to [438] the extent of the plaintiff's judgment and debt against said Company, and that at the time of said garnishment the said John A. Stewart and Edwin H. Abbot had in their hands belonging to the defendant, the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, and were indebted to and owed said Company for the use and occupation by said Stewart and Abbot of the railway of said Company from January 8 to May 1, 1879, the sum of $28,258.44; and that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against said Stewart and Abbot for the said amount due upon its judgment; to wit, the sum of $23,410.40; that as to the garnishees, the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company and Charles L. Colby, this action should be dismissed.

"Let judgment be entered herein in favor of the plaintiff against John A. Stewart and Edwin H. Abbot for the sum of $23,410.40, with costs to be taxed.

"Dated May 21, 1883.

"JOHN M. HARLAN, Circuit Justice.
"CHAS. E. DYER, Dist. Judge."

Judgment having been entered for the plaintiff below, separate writs of error have been prosecuted by the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company and by Stewart and Abbot.

The main contest in the case is between the plaintiff and Jesse Hoyt. If the fund in the hands of the garnishees, Stewart and Abbot, belongs to the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, the plaintiff is entitled to subject it to the payment of his judgment; otherwise not. Hoyt's claim is that Stewart and Abbot, as trustees of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, were in possession of the Milwaukee and Northern railway under a lease of that road to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, and are indebted to him, as trustee under that lease and as assignee of the lease, for the rent accruing under it, represented by the fund in their hands. The lease was executed on November 8, 1878, and was for the term of 999 years from that date. It stipulated that the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, the lessee, should pay as rent a certain proportion of the gross earnings received from the demised road, installments of which were to be paid monthly to such trustee as should be, from [439] time to time, jointly selected by the parties, "upon the trust to keep the same until the next installment of interest is due upon the bonds issued by the first party under their first mortgage, and then to apply the same, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, to the payment of said interest, when and as payable, and if any surplus remain after payment of said interest to pay the same to the first party, its successors and assigns, unless said surplus, or some part thereof, is due to the second party for advances, as is hereinafter provided, made to or for the benefit of the first party to pay said interest, and if said surplus, or any part thereof, is so due, then to said second party, as hereinafter provided, so much as is due for said advances and interest."

The Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company Bank was appointed trustee under the lease. By a supplemental agreement, made June 1, 1875, between the parties, the lease was modified so that the rent reserved for the three years from June 1, 1875, should be 40 per cent of the gross earnings received from the demised premises, and after that, so much as was necessary to pay the interest coupons of the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, not to exceed 40 per cent of the gross earnings. Under that modified lease, Jesse Hoyt was appointed temporary trustee, in place of the Wisconsin Marine and Fire Insurance Company Bank, for the period of twelve months, which appointment was continued by a further agreement made October 10, 1876.

On January 7, 1878, the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company made a written assignment to Jesse Hoyt and A. Warren Greenleaf, trustees of the mortgage given to secure its bonds, of the lease of the Milwaukee and Northern railway to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, and of all the covenants therein contained, and of all moneys due or to grow due thereon, upon the same trusts, however, as were expressed in the trust deed executed by the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company to Hoyt and Greenleaf as security for the first mortgage bonds of said Company. On the following day a written notice, signed by Hoyt and Greenleaf, was served upon the Wis- [440] consin Central Railroad Company of the fact of such assignment, and directing that company to pay the rent to Jesse Hoyt as theretofore, "such assignment being intended merely as further security for said bonds, and not to disturb the relations of the parties to such lease and modifications." In the meantime, as appears by the sixth finding of facts, Jesse Hoyt, as surviving trustee under the mortgage made by the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, had commenced proceedings to foreclose the mortgage, the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company being a defendant thereto, which proceedings were pending when the garnishees, Stewart and Abbot, as trustees under the mortgage of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, entered into possession of the property of that company, and also took possession of and operated the Milwaukee and Northern railroad, under the circumstances stated in the ninth finding of facts.

It is now contended, in opposition to the third conclusion of law drawn by the circuit court, that upon the facts found the garnishees, Stewart and Abbot, took possession of the Milwaukee and Northern railway under the lease of that road to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, and became bound thereby to pay rent therefor to Hoyt, as trustee under said lease, or as assignee of said lease. Hoyt is not a party to this proceeding, but it is competent for Stewart and Abbot, as garnishees, to represent his rights in their own defense; for, if in law they are liable to Hoyt, they are not liable to the present defendant in error; and in protecting their own interests it is proper for them to assert the right of Hoyt if they are in law liable to him.

There are, however, two answers to the claim put forward on behalf of Hoyt. If the rent of the Milwaukee and Northern railway is payable to him, either as trustee under the lease or as assignee of the lease, it is not due to him in his own right, but merely for the purposes and upon the trusts expressed either in the lease or in the assignment. Those purposes and trusts were to apply the rents to be received by him to the payment of the interest coupons as they became due upon the mortgage bonds of the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company secured by the mortgage to him; but it nowhere [441] appears in the record that there are any coupons in arrears to which this rent could be applied; and in that event the rent is payable to the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company as lessor beneficially interested. It in fact appears by the tenth finding that pending this suit, and before its trial, the Milwaukee and Northern railway was sold under the proceedings to foreclose the mortgage of which Hoyt was the surviving trustee, to trustees for the holders of the bonds under that mortgage, which sale has been duly confirmed by the court. It does not, therefore, appear but that at the time of the trial of this case all the bonds, with the interest thereon, of the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company secured by the mortgage of which Hoyt was trustee, had been fully paid and satisfied. If so, Hoyt had no further interest under the lease, either as trustee or assignee, which entitles him to receive the fund in the hands of the garnishees for any purpose.

In the second place, however, it does not follow as a conclusion of law, from the ninth finding of facts taken in connection with the other facts found, that Stewart and Abbot entered into possession of the railroad of the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company under a lease of that road to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, and thereby became bound to pay the rent reserved therein. They were not as signees of the term of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company under that lease. They were trustees of the mortgage given by the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company to them to secure its bonds, and entered into possession of its railroad by a title antedating the lease to it by the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company. They were not, therefore, bound by the terms of that lease, and were under no obligations to undertake its burdens. They were not bound to take possession of the Milwaukee and Northern railway; they did so merely as a matter of convenience to the parties interested in that road, and for their benefit. On doing so they gave explicit notice of the character of their possession. That notice, dated January 11, 1879, was addressed to Jesse Hoyt, as president of the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company, and surviving trustee under its first mortgage and bonds, and trustee [442] under the lease of its railroad to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, and assignee of said lease. In it they say:

"We beg to inform you that on the third day of January current we, trustees under and by virtue of the provisions of the first mortgage of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, entered upon and took possession of the property covered by that mortgage, and are now operating the Wisconsin Central railroad.

"We find that the said company was operating the Milwaukee and Northern railway under a lease. We are not sufficiently informed upon the subject to warrant us in assuming any obligation under that lease. We therefore notify you that we decline to assume, affirm, or in any way ratify that lease. We wish, however, not to interfere in any way with the welfare of that railway, and, unless you otherwise elect, will continue for the present to operate the same temporarily for such compensation as that service may be fairly worth, and, as far as is necessary, but not in excess of its earnings, to repair the same as the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company was doing, and also to permit the business of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company to be done as heretofore over that railway. We suggest that you arrange for an early personal interview with us, at which you will make known to us your wishes, and confer with a view to a more permanent arrangement.

"We are ready to submit to the parties in interest any proposition which yourself and we are jointly able to recommend."

To this notice no answer appears to have been made, and Hoyt's silence under the circumstances may fairly be taken to be an acquiescence in the arrangement proposed by Stewart and Abbot. The proceedings on the part of Hoyt, as trustee under his mortgage, to foreclose that mortgage, were then pending, and the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company was a party to that suit. If Hoyt was not willing to accede to the terms proposed by Stewart and Abbot in that notice, in respect to the nature of their occupation and operation of the Mil-

[443] waukee and Northern railway, it was open to him to apply for the appointment of a receiver, as he subsequently did on May 5, 1879, or otherwise to take possession of the Milwaukee and Northern railway as trustee under the mortgage. The legitimate inference from his conduct is that which was drawn by the court below, which held, as matter of law deduced from the facts found, that the garnishees were not in possession of the Milwaukee and Northern railway under the terms of the lease to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, and for the value of its use and occupation were not bound to account to Hoyt. There was neither privity of contract nor privity of estate between Hoyt and them. Their obligation to pay for that use and occupation was to the Company that owned the road.

It is argued by the attorney for the plaintiff in error that there is another alternative by which it may be shown that the garnishees do not owe this fund to the Milwaukee and Northern Railway Company; that is, that Stewart and Abbot entered into possession of the Milwaukee and Northern railway as subtenants thereof under the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, the lessee, and are bound to pay rent as such to the latter company. But, as we have already seen, Stewart and Abbot entered into possession of the property of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company itself adversely to it, as trustees under its mortgage, by a title antecedent to the date of the lease. Stewart and Abbot in no sense could be considered as accountable to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company as tenants.

We find no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court, and it is therefore affirmed.

v.

BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF THE COUNTY OF ALBANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 535-552.)

State taxation of national bank shares—uniformity—valuation at par—discrimination—action of assessing officers, judicial and not open to collateral attack—remedies—action at law to recover excess of taxes paid—remedy in equity—practice—trial by court—findings upon questions of fact, conclusive—exclusion of evidence.

1. Overvaluation of property is not a ground of action at law for the excess of taxes paid beyond what should have been levied upon a just valuation. It is only where the assessment is wholly void, or void with respect to separable portions of the property, the amount collected on which is ascertainable, or where the assessment has been set aside as invalid, that an action at law lies for the taxes paid, or for a portion thereof.

2. The action of assessing officers being judicial in character, their judgments in cases within their jurisdiction are not open to collateral attack. If not corrected by some mode pointed out by statute they are conclusive, whatever errors may have been committed in the assessment.

3. Where an overvaluation of property has arisen from the adoption of a rule of appraisement which conflicts with a constitutional or statutory direction, and operates unequally, not merely on a single individual but on a large class, a party aggrieved may resort to a court of equity to restrain the action of the excess, upon payment or tender of what is admitted to be due.

4. Under the Act providing for state taxation of the shares of national banks there must be a uniform rule of appraisement of such shares and other moneyed capital similarly employed, and the same percentage must be charged on the values determined.

5. The uniform assessment of the shares of national and state banks at their par value, although the actual value differs widely, cannot be considered as discriminating against either, both being placed on the same footing.

6. Where a case is tried by the court without a jury, its findings upon questions of fact are conclusive in this court. Only rulings upon matters of law, when properly presented in a bill of exceptions, can be considered here in addition to the question, where the findings are special, whether the facts found are sufficient to sustain the judgment rendered.

7. In the case presented the exclusion of evidence as to an alleged defect in the assessment roll is held to have been proper under a certain stipulation of the parties.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York. Reported below, 21 Blatchf. 249. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Matthew Hale, for plaintiff in error:

The systematic and intentional valuation of other moneyed capital by the taxing officers below its value, while the shares in question are assessed at their full value, or at a greater rate, is a violation of the Act of Congress which prescribes the rule by which they shall be taxed by state authority.

Pelton v. Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 143 (25: 901); Cummings v. Nat. Bank, Id. 153 (25: 903).

There can be no question that the stock in other banks, state and national, may be considered as "other moneyed capital" in inquiring whether the taxation of the shares of this bank was in violation of section 5219. The rights of the assignors of the plaintiff were none the less violated by an assessment at a greater rate than shares in other national banks, than by such assessment at a greater rate than the shares of state banks, or of any other moneyed capital. Under the restriction in section 5219, the state authorities have no right to discriminate against any national bank. The restriction applies to each and every bank. The only question is whether either a material part of other moneyed capital in the assessment district escapes taxation, or is assessed at a substantially lower rate than the shares of the bank under consideration.

Boyer v Boyer, 113 U. S. 689 (28: 1089).

Messrs. Simon W. Rosendale and Wheeler H. Peckham, for defendant in error:

The plaintiff cannot recover because the tax was not void, but voidable only, upon proof of the indebtedness of the shareholder, and of his demand to reduce his assessment, and in a direct proceeding for that purpose.

Supervisors v. Stanley, 105 U. S. 305 (26: 1044).

The assessor had jurisdiction to assess the shares of the plaintiff's assignors as of some value. Having jurisdiction to assess, then their judgment as to what amount will be proper is a judicial judgment made upon a subject over which they had jurisdiction, and though they may have erred in the determination as to value, such error does not oust them of jurisdiction, and so does not render the assessment void.

Williams v. Weaver, 75 N. Y. 30, and cases there cited; S. C. 100 U. S. 547 (25: 708).

To recover back the money the assessment must be void, like a void judgment, a nullity; then the assessment may be recovered back.

Bruecher v. Port Chester, 101 N. Y. 240, 244.

"There is no case in which it has been determined that one part of the same tax, whether on real or on personal estate, laid for a lawful purpose, may be held legal, and another portion illegal and invalid, so that the latter can be recovered back in an action of assumpsit."

Lincoln v. Worcester, 8 Cush. 55, 68.

An assessment or tax which is not wholly void, void in the sense that a judgment rendered by a court upon a subject matter over which it has no jurisdiction is void, cannot be overhauled in a collateral action to recover back money paid under it to the county or town otherwise entitled to receive it.

Swift v. Poughkeepsie, 37 N. Y. 511; Bank of Commonwealth v. The Mayor, 43 N. Y. 184; R. R. Co. v. Supervisors, 48 N. Y. 93; Peyser v. The Mayor, 70 N. Y. 497; Bruecher v. Port Chester, 101 N. Y. 240; Wilkes v. The Mayor, 79 N. Y. 621.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of [542] the court:

The Act of Congress, in providing for taxation of the shares of national banks, by authority of the State in which such institutions are situated, imposes two restrictions upon the exercise of the power; namely, that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State, and that the shares of any national bank owned by nonresidents of the State shall be taxed in the city or town where it is located. R. S. sec. 5219.

In People v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 539 [25: 705], this court held, with reference to taxation thus authorized, that the prohibition against discrimination has reference to the entire process of assessment, and includes the valuation of the shares as well as the rate of percentage charged, and, therefore, that a Statute of New York which established a mode of assessment by which such shares were valued higher in proportion to their real value than other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals, was in conflict with the prohibition, although no greater percentage was levied on such valuation. If this were not so, a rule of appraisement, applied to shares of national banks, different from one applied to other moneyed capital, might lead to such varied valuations as to materially affect the amount of taxes levied, although the same percentage should be charged on the valuations. There must be a uniform rule of appraisement of value, and the same percentage charged on the values determined, to meet the requirements of the statute.

This action is founded upon an alleged disregard of this requirement by the assessing officers of the County of Albany, New York. The plaintiff, Edward N. Stanley, is a citizen of Illinois, and claiming to be assignee of certain shareholders of the National Albany Exchange Bank, located at Albany in New York, sues to recover the amount of certain taxes alleged to have been illegally collected from them upon their shares in that bank during [543] the years from 1874 to 1879, both inclusive, and paid into the treasury of the County of Albany. The original complaint contained several counts, all of which, except the fourth, were substantially the same, except as to the names of the stockholders and the amounts assessed and collected. They alleged the assessment by the board of assessors of the City of Albany of the shares held by the assignors of the plaintiff, acting under color of an Act of the Legislature of New York, passed April 23, 1866, being chapter 761 of the laws of that year, at $100 a share, being the par value thereof, after deducting therefrom such sum as was in the same proportion to such par value as was the assessed value of the real estate of the banking institution to the whole amount of its capital stock, and the collection of the amount levied, and its payment into the treasury of the County of Albany. They also alleged, upon information and belief, that chapter 761 of the laws of 1866, was in conflict with the laws of the United States, and especially with the provision that taxation by state authority of shares of stock in banking associations shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State, for the reason, among others, that the said Act of New York did not permit debts of the owners of the bank stock to be deducted from the value thereof in its assessment, although such deduction of the debts of the owner was at the time, and is still, permitted and required by the laws of New York to be made from the value of every other kind of personal property, and moneyed capital other than bank stock, in assessing the same for the purpose of taxation.

They also alleged, upon information and belief, that the assessment of the shares of stock of the said banking association by the board of assessors was at a greater rate than their assessment upon shares of stock of banks organized under the laws of New York and located in the same ward of the city, and was at a greater rate than was assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the State. For these reasons the plaintiff alleged that the assessment of the shares of stock, and the levy of the tax thereunder, were illegal and void, and that the money received therefor was wrongfully collected and paid into the county treasury, and belonged of right to the shareholders, and not to the County.

The fourth count differed from the others in averring that the assignor of the plaintiff named in this count, Chauncey P. Williams, had presented to the board of assessors an affidavit stating that the value of his personal estate, including his bank stock, after deducting his just debts and property invested in the stock of corporations or associations liable to be taxed therefor, and his investments in the obligations of the United States, did not exceed one dollar, and requested the board of assessors to reduce his assessment to that amount, but that the board had refused to make such reduction; and that thereupon said Williams applied to the Supreme Court of the State for a writ of mandamus to compel the assessors to make the reduction; that the supreme court denied the application on the ground that the Act of the Legislature did not permit such reduction, but required the assessment of the bank stock at its full value; that the Court of Appeals of the State, on appeal, affirmed the decision and judgment of the supreme court; that the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment of the court of appeals, and held that the statute, chapter 761 of the laws of the State of 1866, in that it did not permit a reduction for indebtedness from the assessment of bank stock, which by the laws of the State was required to be made from the assessment of every other kind of personal estate and moneyed capital, was in conflict with the laws of the United States.

The answer of the defendant consisted in a specific denial of the several allegations of the complaint, with an averment that the assessments were duly and regularly made by a board of assessors having jurisdiction of the matter. In a supplementary answer the defendant also set up that the assignment of the amounts in suit to the plaintiff was improperly and collusively made for the purpose of giving the court jurisdiction.

The action was twice tried, at both times by the court without the intervention of a jury, by consent of parties.

[545] On the first trial, which took place in October, 1880, the plaintiff recovered the whole amount upon the first ground stated, that the Act of New York, chapter 761 of the Laws of 1866, was in conflict with the Act of Congress, in not permitting in the assessment of the value of the stock of the bank a reduction for the debts of the holder. The second ground of objection to the validity of the assessment, that it was at a greater rate than was assessed on other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens, was not considered. The case was then brought to this court for review. After full consideration, we held substantially this: that the Statute of New York was in conflict with the Act of Congress, so far as it did not permit a stockholder of a national bank to deduct the amount of his just debts from the assessed value of his stock, while by the laws of the State the owner of all other personal taxable property was allowed to deduct such debts from its value; but that neither the statute nor the assessment under it was for that reason void. If the stockholder had no debts to deduct, the mode of assessment adopted was not invalid as to him; he could not complain of it, nor recover the taxes paid pursuant to it. If he had debts, the assessment without a deduction for them in the estimate of the taxable value of the stock was only voidable. The assessing officers, in making the assessment, were acting within their authority until duly notified of the debts which were to be deducted. In such case, therefore, the duty devolved upon the stockholder to show to the assessing officers what his debts were, and to take such steps as were required by law to obtain a correction of the over assessment. We therefore decided that for the taxes collected upon the assessment alleged in the fourth count the plaintiff was entitled to judgment; this court having held, in People v. Weaver, that assessment invalid, for the reason that the assessors had not allowed any deduction for the debts of the stockholder, 100 U. S. 539 [supra]; but that for the taxes collected upon the assessments alleged in the other counts, no recovery could be had; the stockholders there mentioned not having produced any evidence that they had presented to the assessors an affidavit of the amount which they would be entitled to deduct from the assessment of their shares, if the same rule had been applied to the assessment of bank shares which was applied to the assessment of other personal property, or any evidence that they owed anything whatever to be deducted, [546] or that they had taken any steps under the laws of New York to correct the over assessment complained of. The judgment of the circuit court was accordingly reversed, and judgment ordered for the plaintiff upon the fourth count, and for the defendants on the other counts. Supervisors v. Stanley, 105 U. S. 305, 316 [26: 1044, 1051].

Subsequently, upon the attention of the court being called to the fact that there was evidence in the case upon the allegation that the assessment of the shares of stock in the national banking association was at a greater rate than was assessed upon shares of stock in banks organized under the laws of New York, and located in the same city, and at a greater rate than was assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of the State, upon which the court below did not pass, the judgment was so far modified as to permit that court, in its discretion, to hear evidence on that point, and, if necessary, to allow an amendment of the pleadings to present it properly.

When the case was remanded, on application to the circuit court, all the counts except the fourth were amended. The substance of the amendments consisted in allegations that the assessors, by a rule prescribed by themselves, assessed the shares of the National Albany Exchange Bank at such greater rate; that the rule adopted was to assess all shares of stock in state and national banks in the City of Albany at par, without regard to their actual or market value, making the requisite deduction for real estate owned by the banks; that this rule necessarily resulted in imposing upon the shares of the National Albany Exchange Bank a greater rate of taxation than was assessed upon other moneyed capital generally; that there were in the sixth ward of the city, at the time of the assessments, several banks, state and national; and that the actual value of the stock of the banks varied, that of the shares of stock in the National Albany Exchange Bank being con- [547] siderably less than that of the stock of most of the other banks in the city.

Several of the counts were afterwards abandoned, those remaining applying only to the taxes of the years 1873, 1874, and 1875. The case came on for a second trial in March, 1883, and, after hearing the proofs, the court filed its findings of fact on the issues presented by the pleadings, and gave judgment for the plaintiff on the fourth count, and for the defendants on the other counts. To review this judgment the case is brought to this court on a writ of error.

Several of the assignments of error presented for our consideration are to rulings of the court below upon the evidence before it; to its finding of particular facts; and to its refusal to find other facts. Such rulings are not open to review here; they can be considered only by the court below. Where a case is tried by the court without a jury, its findings upon questions of fact are conclusive here; it matters not how convincing the argument that upon the evidence the findings should have been different. Thus, the principal finding of the court is, "That the plaintiff has failed to establish the allegations in said complaint that the several assessments herein referred to were at a greater rate than was assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of this State." And the first assignment of error is that the court erred in deciding that the plaintiff failed to establish the allegations mentioned, and the greater part of the oral argument of the plaintiff's counsel and of his printed brief was devoted to the maintenance of this proposition; which is nothing more than that the court below found against the evidence —a question not open to review or consideration in this court. Only rulings upon matters of law, when properly presented in a bill of exceptions, can be considered here, in addition to the question, when the findings are special, whether the facts found are sufficient to sustain the judgment rendered. This limitation upon our revisory power on a writ of error in such cases is by express statutory enactment. Act of March 3, 1865, 13 Stat. at L. chap. 86, § 4; R. S. § 700.

The same answer will apply to the exceptions
[548] taken to the refusal of the court to make certain additional findings. If error was thus committed, it was in not giving sufficient weight to the evidence offered—a matter determinable only in the court below.

To recover in this case the plaintiff was required to prove, under the decision when the case was first here, that "the assessors habitually and intentionally, or by some rule prescribed by themselves, or by some one whom they were bound to obey, assessed the shares of the national banks higher, in proportion to their actual value, than other moneyed capital generally."

The court below specially found the negative of this; that the assessors did not, at any of the times in question, habitually or intentionally, or by any rule prescribed by themselves, or by anyone whom they were bound to obey, thus assess the shares of national banks.

The counsel for the plaintiff insists, however, notwithstanding this finding, that the inference of such habitual assessment at a higher rate follows from the findings that within the City of Albany there were nine banks, and that the actual value of the shares in all of them except one exceeded their par value, varying in that respect from 10 to 70 per cent premium, and yet the value of all was assessed at par. The actual value of shares of the National Albany Exchange Bank was 35 per cent above par, and the actual value of the shares of some of the other banks was above and some below that figure. The court found that the method pursued by the assessors was generally satisfactory to the owners of national bank stock in the City of Albany, with the exception of a few stockholders in the National Albany Exchange Bank, and that such method was pursued by the assessors with no purpose or intention of unduly assessing shares of national banks, but simply because it was thought by them to be the most satisfactory one to the owners of such property, and the best in itself. A different method might have led to perplexing difficulties, owing to the great fluctuations to which shares in banking institutions are subject, their value de- [549] pending very much on the skill and wisdom of the managers of those institutions. Intelligent men constantly differ in their estimate of the value of such property, and the stock market shows almost daily changes. Presumptively, the nominal value is the true value, any increase from profits going, in the natural course of things, in dividends to the stockholders. This method, applied to all banks, national and state, comes as near as practicable, considering the nature of the property, to securing, as between them, uniformity and equality of taxation; it cannot be considered as discriminating against either. Both are placed on the same footing. In Mercantile Nat. Bank v. Mayor etc. of City of New York, recently decided, this court said: "The main purpose of Congress in fixing limits to state taxation on investments in the shares of national banks was to render it impossible for the State, in levying such a tax, to create and foster an unequal and unfriendly competition by favoring individuals or institutions carrying on a similar business and operations and investments of a like character. The language of the Act of Congress is to be read in the light of this policy." 121 U. S. 138 [ante, 895].

The method pursued could in no respect be considered as adopted in hostility to the national banks. It must sometimes place the estimated value of their shares below their real value; but such a result is not one of which the holders of national bank shares can complain. It must sometimes lead also to overvaluation of the shares; but, if so, no ground is thereby furnished for the recovery of the taxes collected thereon. It is only where the assessment is wholly void, or void with respect to separable portions of the property, the amount collected on which is ascertainable, or where the assessment has been set aside as invalid, that an action at law will lie for the taxes paid, or for a portion thereof. Overvaluation of property is not a ground of action at law for the excess of taxes paid beyond what should have been levied upon a just valuation. The courts cannot, in such cases, take upon themselves the functions of a revising or equalizing board. Newman v. Supervisors, 45 N. Y. 676–687; Nat. Bank of Chemung v. Elmira, 53 N. Y. 49–52; Bruecher [550]
v. Port Chester, 101 N. Y 240–244; Lincoln v. Worcester, 8 Cush. 55–63; Hicks v. Worcester, 130 Mass. 478; Balfour v. Portland, 28 Fed. Rep. 738.

In nearly all the States, probably in all of them, provision is made by law for the correction of errors and irregularities of assessors in the assessment of property for the purposes of taxation. This is generally through boards of revision or equalization, as they are often termed, with sometimes a right of appeal from their decision to the courts of law. They are established to carry into effect the general rule of equality and uniformity of taxation required by constitutional or statutory provisions. Absolute equality and uniformity are seldom, if ever, attainable. The diversity of human judgments, and the uncertainty attending all human evidence, preclude the possibility of this attainment. Intelligent men differ as to the value of even the most common objects before them—of animals, houses, and lands in constant use. The most that can be expected from wise legislation is an approximation to this desirable end; and the requirement of equality and uniformity found in the Constitutions of some States is complied with when designed and manifest departures from the rule are avoided.

To these boards of revision, by whatever name they may be called, the citizen must apply for relief against excessive and irregular taxation, where the assessing officers had jurisdiction to assess the property. Their action is judicial in its character. They pass judgment on the value of the property upon personal examination and evidence respecting it. Their action being judicial, their judgments in cases within their jurisdiction are not open to collateral attack. If not corrected by some of the modes pointed out by statute, they are conclusive, whatever errors may have been committed in the assessment. As said in one of the cases cited, the money collected on such assessment cannot be recovered back in an action at law, any more than money collected on an erroneous judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction before it is reversed.

When the overvaluation of property has arisen from the adoption of a rule of appraisement which conflicts with a constitutional or [551] statutory direction, and operates unequally, not merely on a single individual but on a large class of individuals or corporations, a party aggrieved may resort to a court of equity to restrain the exaction of the excess, upon payment or tender of what is admitted to be due. This was the course pursued and approved in Cummings v. National Bank, 101 U. S. 153 [25: 903]. In that case it appeared that the officers of Lucas County, Ohio, charged with the valuation of property for the purposes of taxation, adopted a settled rule or system, by which real estate was estimated at one third of its true value, ordinary personal property about the same, and moneyed capital at three fifths of its true value. The state board of equalization of bank shares increased the valuation of them to their full value. Upon a bill brought by the Merchants National Bank of Toledo against the treasurer of the county, in which the bank was established, to enjoin him from collecting taxes assessed on the shares of the stockholders, payment of which was demanded of the bank under the law, it was held that the rule or principle of unequal valuation of the different classes of property for taxation adopted by the board of assessment was in conflict with the Constitution of Ohio, which declares that "laws shall be passed taxing by a uniform rule all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies, or otherwise, and, also, all the real and personal property according to its true value in money," and worked manifest injustice to the owners of shares in national banks; and that the bank was, therefore, entitled to the injunction against the collection of the illegal excess, upon payment of the amount of the tax which was equal to that assessed on other property. That decision was rendered upon a disregard by the assessing officers of a rule prescribed by the Constitution of the State; but the same principle must apply when their action in assessing the shares of national banks is in disregard of the Act of Congress. The plaintiff below did not think proper to resort to this method of obtaining relief, which would have given him all he was entitled to, if in fact his shares were assessed at a greater rate than was assessed on other moneyed capital, because of their illegal overvaluation.
